Within less than five days prior to the adjournment of the last session of the General Assembly, was passed, and sent to the governor for his approval, another act for the regulation, &c., of elections, very similar to the previous act on the same subject, approved March 16, 1870, but containing the following wholly dissimilar provisions to those of section 54 of that act, heretofore quoted, for the composition of the returning officers, to wit:

SEC. 2. That five persons, to be elected by the senate from all political parties, shall be the returning officers for all elections in the State, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum, and have power to make the return of all elections, with power in the board to fill vacancies.

And in the concluding section (71) it is provided that "this act shall take effect from and after its passage, and that all others on the subject of election laws be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

By this act were plainly abolished both the Wharton and Lynch boards, (if the latter had any legal existence at all.) They fell with the law of 1870, out of which they grew. By article 66 of the constitution, as construed and applied in Louisiana, the governor was not required to act on that bill before the first day of the ensuing session of the General Assembly; and the bill at any time prior to that day would become a law upon receiving the approval of the governor. The governor had constitutionally retained that bill, and now, in the dilemma in which he was placed, exercised his constitutional prerogative by taking up that bill and approving and promulgating it.

By section 2 of this new law the returning officers were "to be elected by the senate;" and as the senate was not at the time in session, and so could not elect them, the governor held that this state of fact formed a vacancy within the meaning of article 61, heretofore quoted, of the constitution, to be filled for the time being by the exercise of his appointing power. Accordingly, on the 20th day of November, after the law of that date went into effect, he appointed board No. 4, called the De Feriet board, of returning officers, in pursuance of that law. This board consisted of Messrs. De Feriet, Austin, Taylor, Wiltz, and Isabelle. Those gentlemen were at once qualified and organized. Then the governor, with the concurrence of the Wharton board, turned over all the official election returns to the De Feriet board, and the latter proceeded with the business of canvassing and compiling.

It appears that on the day following the governor was impelled by the state of affairs to issue the following executive proclamation:

STATE OF LOUISIANA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
New Orleans, November 21, 1872.

Whereas, the present condition of public affairs presenting an extraordinary occasion, I do hereby, by virtue of the power in me vested by the constitution, and the laws enacted thereunder, convene the General Assembly elected on the 4th day of November, A. D. 1872, in extra session, for the period of ten days.

Senators and representatives of the General Assembly elected on the 4th day of November, A. D. 1872, and the senators holding over, are, therefore, summoned to meet in their respective chambers, at the Mechanics' Institute, now used as a state-house, in the city of New Orleans, at twelve o'clock noon on Monday, the 9th of December, A. D. 1872.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the State to be affixed, at the city of New Orleans, this 21st day of November, A. D. 1872, and of the Independence of the United States the ninety-seventh.

On the 30th November, 1872, Governor Warmoth brought suit (No. 13579) in the eighth district court, alleging the illegal and revolutionary course of the Lynch-Herron board, &c., with a prayer for an injunction, restraining that board from acting, &c., or interfering, &c. The process was duly issued and served. Whereupon the congressional enforcement law of May 31, 1870, and the amendments thereto, were invoked as a lion in the path, on the petition of the Lynch-Herron board, in the United States court for the district of Louisiana, (Hon. E. H. Durell.) A writ of certiorari was promptly ordered, issued, and served upon Judge Elmore, of the eighth district court, and the cause immediately transferred to the United States district court. Exit cause No. 13579.

On the 6th of December, in the eighth district court, the De Feriet board filed their petition against the Lynch-Bovee board, (that board having now, by virtue of a judgment in the supreme court of the 2d of December, put out Herron and put in Bovee, although the latter was individually ineligible to the returning board, because at this very election he was a candidate for the office of police juror for the parish of Saint James, and had counted himself in,) setting up the facts, and obtained an injunction which was issued and served the same day, restraining them from acting, &c., as returning officers, or interfering with the complainants pending the suit; which defendants disregarding they were ruled to show cause why they should not be attached for contempt. But the rule was prematurely swallowed up in the maelstrom of military conquest.

Samuel Armstead is a colored man. He was a candidate for the office of secretary of state at the election on the McEnery ticket, and returned duly elected by the legal official returns. In the eighth district court, on the 6th of December, he filed his petition and complaint (No. 13596) against the Lynch-Bovee board, alleging their usurpation of the functions of returning officers and their revolutionary and fraudulent combinations, &c., upon which he obtained an injunction, which was duly issued and served, restraining them from acting, &c., and from counting any other returns than the legal official returns in the possession of the governor in pursuance of law.

On the 7th of December, on the petition of defendants in the United States district court, before Judge Durell, proceedings for a writ of certiorari were had as in case No. 13579; and thereupon case No. 13596 was immediately transferred from the eighth district court to the United States district court. Exit No. 13596.

We return to the 16th of November. On that day the prospects of the revolutionists, composing the active managers of the custom-house party, apparently were gloomy and alarming. The legal official returns were fatal to them. By those returns the Kellogg party knew they were inexorably beaten; else why did they not abide by them and pursue their legal remedies? The spirit in the party, never to submit or yield, stimulated into hopeful activity by the well-known appliances of United States Marshal Packard, assured them it was indispensable to their schemes that those returns, even more than the returning officers canvassing and compiling them, must be stifled; yea, even—

> Though you untie the winds, and let them fight > Against the churches; though the yesty waves
> Confound and swallow navigation up;
> Though bladed corn be lodg'd and trees blown down;
> Though castles topple on their warder's heads;
> Though palaces, and pyramids, do slope
> Their heads to their foundations; though the treasure
> Of nature's germins tumble all together,
> Even till destruction sicken.

Wherefore, on the 16th of November, 1872, in the United States district court, for the district of Louisiana, Hon. William Pitt Kellogg filed his petition (No. 6830) in equity vs. Governor H. C. Warmoth, the Wharton board, and the publishers of the official journal of the State, alleging, among other things, that complainant was a candidate for governor; that Warmoth tried to beat him with McEnery; that the registration was fraudulent; that ten thousand persons were refused registration on account of color, race, and previous condition of servitude; that ballots were illegally rejected at the election, to his prejudice; set up and relied upon the enforcement act of May, 1870, together with the amendments thereto; and avers he has the proof prescribed in that act by which to determine the State election in Louisiana; that Warmoth and others are going to make a false count of the returns that Wharton was not secretary of state; that the Wharton board was wholly illegal; that the Lynch-Herron board was the only legal board; that the Wharton board intended to return McEnery duly elected and Kellogg duly defeated; that McEnery was countenancing, aiding, and abetting those fraudulent schemes to defeat the lawful results of the election; that it is all contrary to equity and good conscience, (God save the mark!) wants all the certificates, returns, and statements of election preserved from impending destruction, so that the legal evidence of his right to the office of governor should continue available when the time should come to bring the proper action; that Warmoth intends to overthrow a republican form of government in the State; that unless restrained he will destroy the legal evidence necessary to prove Kellogg's election, before the time comes for the commencement of legal proceedings to establish his right to be governor, &c.; and he prays for the most gracious writ of injunction, restraining Warmoth, pendente lite, from acting as governor, the Wharton board from counting the returns, &c., McEnery from making any claim to the office of governor, &c., and the newspaper, the New Orleans Republican, the official journal, from publishing anything from Governor Warmoth or the Wharton board in relation to the election of November 4, 1872; and further, that the governor be required to make and deposit with the clerk of the court full, true, and exact sworn copies of every paper, document, affidavit, tally-sheet, list, sworn statement, certificate, or letter, from every commissioner or other officer concerned in the election, in order that the same might not be destroyed by Warmoth and his confederates, and that Kellogg might have them to establish his right to be governor of Louisiana in some suit which he might thereafter see proper to institute to that end.

The defendants were cited to show cause on the 19th November why, &c., and in the mean time were restrained, &c., and on the 19th they were enjoined and restrained pendente lite, according to the prayer of the petition.

On the 19th of November Governor Warmoth excepted to the jurisdiction of the court, answered and denied each and every material allegation of the petition, &c.

The De Feriet board had never been enjoined. They made their report, as we have seen, on the 4th of December, and in accordance therewith the governor issued his proclamation of the 4th of December. Thereupon, on the 5th of December, the Hon. E. H. Durell, of the United States district court, issued the following order in the case of Kellogg vs. Warmoth et al.:

Now therefore, in order to prevent the further obstruction of the proceedings in this cause, and further, to prevent a violation of the orders of this court, to the imminent danger of disturbing the public peace, it is hereby ordered that the marshal of the United States for the district of Louisiana shall forthwith take possession of the building known as the Mechanics' Institute, and occupied as the state-house for the assembling of the Legislature therein in the city of New Orleans, and hold the same subject to the further order of this court, and meanwhile to prevent all unlawful assemblies therein, under the guise or pretext of authority claimed by virtue of pretended canvass and returns made by said pretended returning officers, in contempt and violation of said restraining order; but the marshal is directed to allow the ingress and egress to and from the public offices in said building of persons entitled to the same.

E. H. DURELL.

I maintain the enforcement act of May, 1870, and the several acts amendatory thereof, to be unconstitutional and void; but I do not now propose to discuss that question.

The parties to this suit were citizens of the same State, and the bill was an original bill. It related to matters not before litigated in the court by the same persons, standing in the same interest, nor was it ancillary to a case of which the court had jurisdiction. (Constitution United States, art. 3; Shields vs. Barrow, 17 Howard, 130; Christmas vs. Russell, 14 Wallace, 81.)

The jurisdiction, however, claimed by the court in virtue of the twenty-third section of the act is special, and is predicated only on a state of fact or class of cases expressed and enumerated therein; and therefore all other or different states of fact or classes of cases are necessarily excluded therefrom. Now, the pleadings and proof in the cause fail to show that the state of case provided for had yet arisen or existed at the filing of the bill, the making of the orders, or the rendition of the final judgment. Moreover, the proceedings of the court, in deposing the State board of returning officers and in its stead setting up a board of the court's own creation, was a plain usurpation, contrary not only to the spirit of the act, but violative, palpably, of its express terms; because the natural tendency, the actual effect, and the sole intention of these proceedings involved the determination of the election of delegates in Congress and members of the State Legislature—as to each and all which jurisdiction is not only not conferred, but is expressly denied by the very terms of the act itself.

Here is a case, too, where the executive of Louisiana was about to officially execute a State law generally, and especially as a member of the returning board. Not so to execute the law was to violate his oath of office, and to call down upon his own head merited denunciation, together with lawful impeachment and expulsion; whereupon the court steps forward and says to the executive, "You must renounce your convictions, violate your sworn duty, and leave the law unexecuted; and, on the other hand, you must do what I tell you—that which you believe to be unlawful and revolutionary." And this the court proceeds to compel him to do.

The functions of the executive generally, but more especially as a member of the returning board, were not merely ministerial, but, by virtue of the constitution and laws of the State of Louisiana, they were discretionary and judicial in their nature, their details, and their objects, and therefore wholly above and beyond the jurisdiction of the court. And I understand the doctrine to be well settled that on principles of public policy an action will not lie, nor will an injunction issue in a Federal court against a State officer of that description, restraining him from the performance of his public official duty. (4 McLean, 26; 14 Haz. Pa. Reg., 129; Lee vs. Preuss; 3 Cr. C. C., 112; Baldwin's Rep., 205; 1 Cranch, 166; 12 Peters, 524–609; 6 Howard, 100; 6 Wallace, 407; State of Mississippi vs. President Johnson; 4 Wallace, 498–500; United States, &c., vs. James Guthrie; 17 Howard, 304; Decatur vs. Paulding; 14 Peters, 497; Gaines vs. Thompson, 7 Wallace, 347.)

But, I ask, can it now and here be seriously pretended by any one that the action of Judge Durell by such orders and proceedings is of lawful authority to arrest the vital functions of the established State government, paralyze State officials, great and small, in the actual necessary discharge of lawful public duty, and overthrow, toto cœlo, a republican State government in perfect relations with the Government of the United States? Shut our eyes to the fearful enormity of this usurpation in the scope and verge it takes, and look at only one familiar practical effect of it. If the State returning officers, merely, can thus be arrested and enjoined in the discharge of public official duty in the very crisis of an election, then could the supervisors of registration be so arrested and enjoined in the discharge of public official duty—then could the commissioners of election be so arrested and enjoined in the discharge of public official duty—on election day, and so the voter himself be stricken dumb and powerless at the polls, and the whole fabric of State government be so made, by this fly upon the charriot wheel, to fall into the condition, as it were, of a lapsed legacy.

Nevertheless we see such orders and writs were thrown about like fire-brands in the very sanctuary of popular government. Such an exercise of equity and good conscience, and of the most gracious writ, finds no warrant whatever in judicial precedents. It is original and devilish. In Illinois it was held:

If it be meant that a court of equity can grant a temporary injunction to stay the election, or prevent the officers elected from acting until a final hearing, the grounds are not well taken. A temporary injunction is but a matter of discretion, and a court would hesitate long before granting an injunction to stop the holding of an election, or to prevent an officer from entering upon the discharge of official duties, even if equity had jurisdiction, at least until after the final hearing of the case. We are aware of no well-considered case which has enjoined the holding of an election, or prevented an officer of the law from giving the required notices for or the certification of election. To sanction the practice of granting temporary injunctions in such cases would be highly calculated to obstruct the various branches of government in the administration of public affairs. Courts of equity can have no such power; otherwise any and all elections might be prevented. (The People ex rel. vs. City of Galesburgh, 48 Illinois, 489.)

So in the State of New York it was held:

I think there can be no doubt that in actions to oust persons exercising the duties of public offices, under a claim of right, a temporary injunction, restraining them from exercising the duties of the office pending the litigation, will not be granted. I have looked in vain for a single case recognizing such a right. The reasons for refusing such an injunction in such cases are clear and powerful. The exercise of the duties of offices are necessities to the public welfare. Unless the officer de facto is permitted to discharge the duties, they cannot be discharged until the end of the litigation and the legal title is determined. This, in many instances, might involve a long time, and the public might suffer serious injury, loss, and inconvenience. In frequent cases it might block the wheels of state while the petty inquiry was being investigated whether the one or the other of two persons was the legal incumbent entitled to exercise the duties of the office and receive the pay therefor. The controversy is essentially personal, in which view the public have no care. The people, by their laws, require that certain duties essential to the well-being of the State or community shall be exercised by individuals as officers or agents. The body-politic is too unwieldy to act, and the power is delegated, under rules, restrictions, and penalties, that the essential duties may be performed under responsible official sanction. Under these circumstances, it has been deemed better that an officer de facto should discharge the duties of an office rather than they should not be discharged at all. (See cases cited.) If the defendants are public officers within the meaning of the foregoing cases, the injunction should be dissolved beyond any doubt. Even though they be not public officers, the same reasons apply in a lesser degree, why they should not be restrained from discharging the duties of an office which they, in fact, hold, and no one else is authorized to hold in their place or stead. I think the rule applicable to public officers and to officers of corporations is the same, and in neither case will courts exercise their equitable power by injunction in a legal action practically to oust an incumbent from his office during the pending of the litigation brought to determine that very question. (The People vs. Mattier; 2 Abbott's Prac. Rep., 200; 12 Peters, 524; Cross vs. Du Valle, 1 Wallace, 7 Robertson's N. Y. Rep., 280; Taylor vs. Commonwealth, 3 J. J. Marshall, 407.)

The order of Judge Durell is a notable device. If maintained as the settled policy of the country any Federal administration may, at any time, through turbulent or venal politicians and subservient Federal judges, coin a pretext and defeat any popular election in any of the States. It is, indeed, of the very quintessence of centralism. Political liberty and it cannot coexist. Their enmity is organic, implacable, and eternal.

Judicial vengeance was, however, not yet sated; the architect of ruin still raged in the ermine. In the United States district court, on the 7th of December, Cæsar C. Antoine filed his petition (No. 6851) vs. Governor Warmoth, Secretary Wharton, Governor McEnery, the secretary of the outgoing senate, the clerk of the outgoing house, the Wharton returning board, the De Feriet returning board, the newly elected General Assembly, the official journal, the metropolitan police, and everybody and everything not in harmony with the custom-house conspiracy for the overthrow of the government and people of Louisiana. Cæsar C. Antoine, although at that time an officer of the Treasury Department of the United States, was a candidate on the Kellogg ticket for lieutenant-governor, the State constitution to the contrary notwithstanding, to wit:

ART. 52. No member of Congress, or any person holding office under the United States Government, shall be eligible to the office of governor or lieutenant-governor.

In his petition Mr. Antoine alleged everything which Mr. Kellogg had alleged in his petition, (No. 6820,) and much more, to give the injunctions he prayed for room and verge enough to quite encompass and paralyze the whole expanse of government in all its most requisite functions. And promptly, on the same day, Hon. E. H. Durell issued and had served the order "that said defendants, each and every one of them, be, and are hereby, commanded and restrained to the extent and effect as in said bill of complaint prayed for," until the further order of the court in the premises.

On the 4th day of December, 1872, board No. 3, the De Feriet board, completed their returns to the extent only of the election of members of the senate and house; and on that day they filed a copy of such returns, containing lists of the names of senators and representatives elect, in the office of the secretary of state, (in compliance with the law,) with the following sworn certificates:

We, the undersigned returning officers, pursuant to authority vested in us by act No. 98, of 1872, approved November 20, 1872, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct compilation of the statements of votes cast at an election for State senators held in parishes above named, on the 4th day of November, A. D. 1872, as made by the supervisors of registration of said parishes; and we hereby declare that the following-named persons were duly and lawfully elected State senators, [setting out their names.]

The returns being so incomplete in the senatorial districts composed of the parishes of West Baton Rouge, Iberville, Saint Martin, Iberia, Carroll, Madison, Morehouse, and Richland, that we do not feel able to declare accurately the results of the election in such districts, we, therefore, postpone action, and refer the returns to the senate itself for determination.

The same sort of a certificate (setting out the names of persons elected) was sent to the House, concluding as follows:

There being no returns from the parishes of Saint Tammany and Terre Bonne, and only meager, informal, and illegal returns from the parishes of Iberville and Saint James, we do not take the responsibility to declare the result of the election in the same, but postpone action to await the determination of the General Assembly.

A list of persons so returned elected to the senate and house was on the same day duly transmitted to the secretary of the senate and clerk of the house of the last General Assembly, and proclamation of the result was duly made by the governor in accordance with the law, to wit:

STATE OF LOUISIANA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

Whereas P. S. Wiltz, Gabriel de Feriet, Thomas Isabelle, J. A. Taylor, and J. E. Austin, returning officers appointed by the governor to fill vacancies existing in accordance with the constitution and laws of the State of Louisiana, have made declaration of the result of an election held November 4, 1872, and have declared certain persons elected to the senate and house of representatives of the State of Louisiana, as will appear from the returns herewith attached and made a part of this proclamation; and whereas such returns are compiled from the official returns of commissioners of election and supervisors of registration, on file in this office, and are in fact and in form accurate and correct, and made in conformity with law:

Now, therefore, I, Henry C. Warmoth, governor of the State of Louisiana, do issue this my proclamation, making known the result of said election, and command all officers and persons within the State of Louisiana to take notice of and respect the same.

Given under my hand and the seal of the State this 4th day of December, A. D. 1872, and of the Independence of the United States the ninety-seventh.

Both by the second section of the law of November, 1872, and by the fifty-fourth section of the repealed act of March 16, 1870, it is provided that "the returns of the election thus made and promulgated shall be prima-facie evidence in all courts of justice and before all civil officers until set aside after a contest according to law."

On the 9th day of December the General Assembly, as returned elected by the De Feriet board, met in Lyceum Hall (it was excluded from the state-house by United States troops) in pursuance of the governor's proclamation of the 21st November, organized, and proceeded with the public business. On the 11th of December the senate, in pursuance of section 2 of the election law of November 20, 1872, elected as returning officers of election Messrs. Forman, Mitchell, Thomas, Hunsaker, and Todd. Subsequently Thomas resigned from the house, and Mr. Southmayd was elected returning officer to fill the vacancy in the board. This board forms returning board No. 5. Forman was a reformer, Todd and Hunsaker were republicans, and Mitchell and Southmayd were democrats. This board succeeded the De Feriet board. The latter made returns only as to the General Assembly. On the election of the Forman board all the returns of the election were turned over to that board, (by whom they were finally delivered to the committee of the United States Senate;) and the latter went over all the returns of the election—except as to electors for President and Vice-President of the United States—and made their full and complete return thereof to the secretary of state, in pursuance of law. I will not stop to cite the report.

The Forman return was identical with the De Feriet return as to the members of the General Assembly, except in this, as to three members in the house—one from Saint James, one from Iberville, and one from the third representative district in New Orleans—who were excluded by the Forman report.

And as to the State officers, the following is their certificate accompanying their return:

We, the undersigned, returning officers, pursuant to authority vested in us by act No. 98, of 1872, approved November 20, 1872, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct compilation of the statements of votes cast at an election for State officers and Representatives to Congress, held in the several parishes of the State of Louisiana, on the 4th day of November, 1872, as made by the supervisors of registration of said parishes; and we hereby declare that the following-named persons were duly and lawfully elected to the offices set against their names respectively, to wit:

John McEnery, governor; D. B. Penn, lieutenant-governor; Samuel Armstead, secretary of state; H. N. Ogden, attorney-general; James Graham, auditor; R. M. Lusher, superintendent of public instruction; and George A. Sheridan, Congressman at large.

There being no returns from the parishes of Saint Tammany and Terre Bonne, and only meager and informal returns from the parishes of Iberville and Saint James, we do not take the responsibility to declare the result of the election in the same, but postpone action to await the return of the General Assembly.

ARCHIBALD MITCHELL.
B. R. FORMAN.
S. M. THOMAS.
O. F. H. HUNSAKER.
S. M. TODD.

DECEMBER 11, 1872.

Their report shows the following relative votes for the first two offices, and for Congressman at large:

For John McEnery	65,579
For William P. Kellogg	55,973
McEnery's majority	9,606
For D. B. Penn	68,251
For C. C. Antoine	53,194
Penn's majority	15,057
For George A. Sheridan	65,016
For P. B. S. Pinchback	54,402
Sheridan's majority	10,614

Let us return to board No. 4, the Lynch-Herron board. When Mr. Lynch seceded from the original board and left the governor's office on the 14th of November, after Secretary Wharton and the newly-elected returning officers, DaPonte and Hatch, took their seats at the board, it appears that he and Messrs. Herron, Hawkins, and Longstreet resolved themselves into what they called the board of returning officers; and on the 15th United States Deputy Supervisor Longstreet, in the behalf of the Lynch board, his colleagues, in writing demanded the election returns from the governor, who refused them on the ground that the returns were lawfully in his possession as governor of the State and ex officio president of the State board of returning officers. He said he had no lawful authority to surrender them to any one, and he refused to recognize any such self-constituted, illegal combination as the Lynch board. The Lynch board consequently never at any time got possession of the State official returns of election or of any part of them.

Thereupon the Lynch board began the battle of the boards and the comedy of the courts. I have already anticipated many of the ensuing events. On the 2d of December this board changed their minds as to Mr. Herron being the legal secretary of state, and arrived at the conclusion, as we have already seen, that he was not that officer, but that Mr. Bovee was; whereupon they promptly shoved Mr. Herron aside, and shoved Mr. Bovee in his place on their returning board, as secretary of state.

Subsequently, on the 7th day of December, the Lynch-Bovee board (No. 6) published a list of the names of persons declared by the board to have been duly elected to the General Assembly, and the following is their appended certificate:

We, the undersigned, returning officers, pursuant to authority vested in us by act No. 100, approved March 16, 1870, do hereby certify the foregoing is a true, correct compilation of the statements of votes cast at an election for representatives to the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, held on the 4th day of November, A. D. 1872.

The same form exactly was used as to the senators—the first signed by John Lynch, James Longstreet, Jacob Hawkins, and George E. Bovee, returning officers; the second by the three first named only.

Now, as we have seen, the fifty-third section of the law they claim to have pursued provides that—

The supervisor of registration shall make a list of all the names of the persons and offices voted for, the number of votes for each person, the number of ballots in the box, and the number of ballots rejected, and the reason therefor. Said statements shall be made in triplicate, and each copy thereof shall be signed and sworn to by the commissioners of election of the poll, and by the supervisor of registration. * * * The supervisor shall inclose one copy, * * * together with all memoranda and tally-sheets used in making the count and statement of the votes, * * * to the governor of the State.

Such, and such only, form the lawful data for the returning officers; and the act quoted by the Lynch board in their certificates, in pursuance of which they say they acted, imposed upon them the following oath:

I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully and diligently perform the duties of a returning officer as prescribed by law; that I will carefully and honestly canvass and compile the statements of the votes, and make a true and correct return of the election; so help me God.

It will be borne in mind that, in the sworn certificates of the De Feriet board and the Forman board, they asseverate that their respective reports—

Are true and correct compilations of the statements of the votes cast, * * as made by the supervisors of registration of said parishes.

And it will be perceived that no such asseveration is anywhere made in their certificates by the Lynch board.

The report of the latter submits the following comparative results of voting as to the first two officers and Congressman at large:

For William Pitt Kellogg	72,890
For John McEnery	54,029
Kellogg's majority	18,861
For C. C. Antoine	70,127
For D. B. Penn	56,340
Antoine's majority	13,787
For P. B. S. Pinchback	68,947
For George A. Sheridan	58,700
Pinchback's majority	10,247

On the basis of the Lynch board report, a body known as the Pinchback-Kellogg general assembly, under the actual protection of the United States forces, met in the Louisiana state-house (which had been previously surprised, surrounded, and captured by the troops) on the 9th day of December, 1872, under color—but in contempt—of the governor's proclamation of the 21st November, and hastened to organize and proceed with their plans.

At the general State election in 1868 O. J. Dunn had been elected lieutenant-governor for the ensuing four years on the Warmoth ticket, and in the summer of 1871 he died. To fill the vacancy, on the 24th of November, 1871, Governor Warmoth issued his proclamation, and convened the senate in extraordinary session on the ensuing 6th day of December, 1871; and the senate on that day elected "one of their members," to wit, Senator Pinchback, provisional president of the senate, in pursuance of the following provision of the constitution:

ART. 53. The lieutenant-governor shall, by virtue of his office, be president of the senate, but shall only vote when the senate is equally divided. Whenever he shall administer the government, or shall be unable to attend as president of the senate, the senators shall elect one of their own members as president of the senate for the time being.

Senator Pinchback had been elected to the senate in 1868, for the term of four years, and his term expired on the 4th day of November, 1872, at which time he ceased to be "one of their own members," became, and continued, constitutionally ineligible to the office of "president of the senate for the time being," and consequently was, on the 9th day of December, 1872, and continued to be, without even that quasi official status in the senate, indispensable, under article 122 of the constitution, to enable him to act until a successor "shall have been inducted into office."

Nevertheless, Mr Pinchback assumed to be lieutenant-governor of Louisiana, and was presiding officer of the Pinchback-Kellogg senate, which body straightway organized under him, as we have seen, on the 9th day of December.

Being palpably without even color of authority in law, and wholly devoid of the sympathy or countenance of the people, this General Assembly, immediately (with involuntary recreancy) adopted a concurrent resolution calling upon the President of the United States, in their own behalf, to "afford the protection guaranteed each State by the Constitution of the United States, when threatened with domestic violence." Themselves the sole creators of domestic violence, themselves begotten of it in the foul engendering of faction, themselves subsisting upon that, in and of which they had and kept their very being, and by means of which they were themselves shamelessly struggling to overthrow the State government, they yet had the unutterable effrontery to call themselves the State, and the State the thing they were; and then, in the prostituted name of the Federal Constitution, to call upon the Federal Executive to destroy that which his oath of office bound him to preserve, protect, and defend.

A resolution of the Pinchback house was hurried into the senate, impeaching Governor Warmoth of high crimes and misdemeanors, with notice of forthcoming particular articles of impeachment, and a demand then made that the senate take order for the appearance and trial of the State prisoner. The senate without delay resolved itself into a high court of impeachment, suspended the governor, elected Senator Harris presiding officer of the senate, and declared Mr. Pinchback acting governor, the constitution to the contrary notwithstanding.

ART. 53. The General Assembly may provide by law for the case of removal, impeachment, death, resignation, disability, or refusal to qualify, of both the governor and the lieutenant-governor, declaring what officer shall act as governor; and such officer shall act accordingly.

On the 9th of December, 1872, Mr. Pinchback was not a member of the senate, and could not then be its presiding officer. An officer, in the meaning of the constitution, is a person who holds a commission from the government. On the 9th of December Mr. Pinchback held no commission from the government of Louisiana. He was not an officer, and it was not in the power of a constitutional senate to declare him to be the "officer who should act as governor."

Moreover, Mr. Pinchback was, on that day, claiming to have been duly elected a member of the Forty-third Congress from the State at large, and as such member of Congress was ineligible to the office of governor or lieutenant-governor by the constitution of Louisiana, which declares:

ART. 52. No member of Congress, or any person holding office under the United States Government, shall be eligible to the office of governor or lieutenant-governor.

However, constitutions within the last decade have become but the husks of faction, whereon they feed and fatten, in unnatural gluttony, and turn, and overturn again, in all the frenzy of malevolent progression.

On the 10th of December Governor Pinchback sent in his first message to the General Assembly. The emergency was pressing. He recommended a speedy trial of Governor Warmoth; wanted the frauds in elections investigated, and the guilty authors punished; apostrophized suffrage; considered it painful for Congress to interfere with the subject of voting in the States, but was especially thankful for such interference on the present occasion, &c.

To all the resulting events of successful revolution the Lynch board had contributed their full share. The names of the worthies composing it may be remembered as Lynch, Herron, Bovee, Hawkins, and Longstreet.

It is averred to have happened to these gentlemen—and I am not aware that it has been gainsaid—that Mr. Herron received the appointment of recorder of mortgages for the parish of Orleans, worth. Mr. Lynch swears, from ten to twenty-five thousand dollars per annum,

Judge Hawkins received the appointment of judge of the superior district court, (an office created by the Pinchback-Kellogg general assembly which he counted in,) at a salary of $5,000 per annum.

Mr. Lynch's son, John, a minor, received the appointment of inspector of live stock, estimated to be worth $12,000 per annum.

General Longstreet received the appointment of levee commissioner, worth $6,000.

Mr. Bovee, who was a Federal supervisor of election in November, 1872, received the office of police juror, (counted in by his own board.) The police juror has charge of county roads, bridges, paupers, construction of court-houses, and everything of the kind, with power to levy specific taxes for roads, &c.

Mr. Kellogg, declared elected governor, was at and after the election a Senator in Congress.

Mr. Antoine, declared elected lieutenant-governor, was at and after the election United States collector for the port of Shreveport, and therefore a person holding office under the United States Government.

Mr. Clinton, declared elected auditor, was at and after the election sub-treasurer of the United States in the city of New Orleans.

Such are only a few of the peculiar characteristics of the Pinchback-Kellogg dynasty. To the natural vision it appears to have been from top to toe an impure, unmixed, pernicious usurpation.

Said Marshal Packard, when examined under oath:

Question. If the United States authority should be withdrawn entirely from the State of Louisiana and the two governments left to battle it out among themselves, which do you think would triumph?

Answer. I think the McEnery government would triumph.

We have considered the reports of the conflicting boards of returning officers; let us now inquire upon what basis rested those rival reports, in virtue of which the hostile legislative bodies were respectively organized.

We have seen by section 53 of the election law of March 16, 1870, heretofore quoted, that the sworn statements and accompanying papers of the supervisors of registration and the commissioners of election of each poll in each parish, officially sealed and sent to the governor, form the only legal data which the returning officers may and shall canvass and compile and thereof make returns to the secretary of state, &c. And under and in pursuance of this law all the conflicting boards profess to have acted, and to faithfully conform to which all were sworn.

Now the sworn statements, &c., of the sworn officers of election, provided for in that law, were all made and delivered from every poll and parish in the State to the governor, and by him opened and laid before the Wharton board of returning officers of the 14th November, 1872, afterward delivered to the De Feriet board, by that board delivered to the Forman board, (and finally by the latter delivered to the committee of the United States Senate,) in conformity with the provisions of that law. True, it is averred, and I think in some instances proven, that there had been frauds in the registration and frauds in the election—sometimes by one wing of the republican party and sometimes by the other—an evil, however, which had prevailed ever since reconstruction, but plainly in a less degree in the election of 1872, and these were easily susceptible of correction in the mode prescribed by law. But with these exceptional taints, these returns were the constitutional and legal statements, &c., of the election and the only data for the returning officers. These facts cannot be disputed with any propriety. Those identical papers the Lynch board ostensibly tried to obtain, thereby admitting their paramount and exclusive official authority; and they are at this moment in the possession of a committee of the United States Senate, and their identity and integrity sworn to by a cloud of witnesses, who alone, of all men, are best qualified to know the facts whereof they speak, to wit, Messrs. Warmoth, Wharton, Da Ponte, Hatch, De Feriet, Austin, Taylor, Wiltz, Isabelle, Forman, Mitchell, Thomas, Southmayd, Hunsaker, Todd, Bragdon, Woodward, and others. The question of boards was comparatively insignificant. The legal board is but a medium. On the other hand the returns were of the first importance as the only legal, official, decisive proof to be brought out. And the final abandonment of these returns by the Lynch board and the Pinchback-Kellogg party, after failing in their illegal efforts to control them, was the abandonment of the only proper official proof of the results of the election, and was equivalent to a confession of judgment in open court. Here this point is rested.

Now, upon the foundation, such as it is, of the return of the Lynch board rests the whole fabric of the Pinchback-Kellog government. Upon what, then, do those returns rest? Not upon those official statements prescribed by the law as the only foundation for the action of lawful returning officers; hence, for this cause, the so-called returns are illegal and fraudulent—a mere fiction, and the flimsy fabric a fraud built thereon. And as the best proof of this, I will cite to the House and the country some extracts from the sworn statements of Messrs. Lynch, Packard, Bovee, and others:

WILLIAM BOVEE sworn:

Question. The returning board of which you were a member did not return to the office of secretary of state any papers, but simply the result?

Answer. Simply the returns of the canvass.

Q. Not the papers on which they based the returns?

A. No, sir.

Q. Where are they?

A. I think they have been, until recently, in the hands of the Federal supervisor.

Q. Federal supervisor of what?

A. Chief supervisor of Louisiana.

Q. Do you remember whether you had any papers before you as a member of that board returned by the returning officers of the State?

A. We received no statements of votes from the governor. He was the proper party to lay them before us.

Q. Your canvass, then, was made chiefly upon the returns made by the United States supervisors, on a blank furnished by the republican State committee to the republican supervisor at each poll; that was the paper you had before you when you made the canvass?

A. Yes, sir; certainly it was, as far as State officers were concerned.

Q. You do not know what the official returns were from the parishes in Louisiana, then?

A. I never saw the statements of votes made by the State supervisors of registration.

Q. Did you ever see the sworn returns of the commissioners of election from any of the polls?

A. None, except in the parish of Saint James.

Q. Upon what basis did you make the count?

A. Upon the report of the Federal supervisors, and various affidavits.

Mr. LYNCH sworn: We had three classes of returns. We had first the returns made by supervisors of registration, representing the United States, who were in every parish we had then certified copies from State supervisors from certain parishes; and we had the affidavits of individuals. From these three classes of evidence we came to the result.

Q. From whence did you obtain those returns?
A. From the chief supervisor, according to my recollection.
Q. Who was the chief supervisor of election?
A. F. A. Woolfly.
Q. Acting under the act of Congress?
A. Yes, sir; and representing the State. * * * Those returns were turned over to him, and he turned them over to us, at our request. * * * I availed myself of every kind of information within my reach—not only these affidavits, but my former knowledge of the political divisions of the inhabitants of the State, as corroborative of the evidence placed before us.
Q. You estimated the vote upon the basis of what you thought the vote ought to have been?
A. Yes, sir; that was just the fact; and I think on the whole we were pretty correct.
Q. When you speak of the returns from those supervisors of the United States, do you mean that both those supervisors made returns?
A. No, sir; I believe they were generally on one side.
Q. Was not that one side that made those returns the republican side, or the Grant side?
A. They came, generally speaking, sir, from that side.
Q. Do you recollect of an instance where both supervisors outside of New Orleans submitted any returns to you?
A. I do not know that I remember any.
Q. Did you make your canvass upon affidavits, and upon the returns of one supervisor, and general report, and your general knowledge; was that the way?
A. We made up our returns from the reports from the United States supervisors of registration.
Q. Did you have any official returns before you furnished under the laws of Louisiana?
A. Did we have any?
Q. Yes; did you have any?
A. Not unless those I have stated.
Q. Did you have any at all?
A. No, sir; I do not think we had.
Q. You had no official returns furnished in pursuance of the laws of Louisiana before you?
A. No, sir.
Q. You made your canvass without those?
A. Yes, sir; we came to the conclusion that there were no official returns in existence, as the law had been trampled upon.
Q. Would the law having been trampled upon prevent an official return from being an official return as well?
A. No, sir; I suppose not.
Q. There were then official returns somewhere?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. When, as you stated here, you gave notice to Governor Warmoth, did you not suppose he had official returns?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Then there were official returns?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. They were not before you?
A. No, sir.
Q. You counted votes, as you estimate, which were not polled at all, did you?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Well, upon what ground?
A. On the authority of the United States law, and on the ground or principle of justice.
Q. You had no statement from any State officer of fraud, illegality, intimidation, disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influence, which prevented a fair and free and peaceable vote, before you?
A. Not from a State officer.
Q. No State officer whatever?
A. No, sir.
Q. Did you have before you any United States law that induced you to believe that United States officers had a right to make returns to you of persons elected to the Legislature?
A. We gave the law a liberal construction. * * * I believe so; I believe that the law goes into the school districts. * * * *
Q. Then, whatever you got was not from the United States supervisor who was present at the election, but you received them from the general United States supervisor of that State?
A. Yes, sir; we received them through him.
Q. You received nothing from the supervisors at the different polls, except through him?
A. No, sir.
Q. You had no communication, officially or otherwise, with the supervisors in the parishes directly?
A. Not directly, unless through these papers.
Q. Have you any information as to how those affidavits were made which you counted—as to how they were gotten up in those different parishes?
A. No, sir.
Q. Did not all the affidavits and other papers belong to your board?
A. No, sir.
Q. Whom did they belong to.
A. They were transferred to us merely by this officer, Woolfly.
Q. He was the United States officer who sent you the returns of the United States supervisors?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And not the affidavits?
A. The affidavits came mostly through him.
Q. And those that did not come through him?
A. There were very few that did not come through him.
Q. What did you do with those few?
A. They were all returned to that office.

Mr. BOVEE recalled:

Question. Upon what ground was this material, upon which a State board was acting, returned to a man who was not an officer of the State at all?
Answer. I understand it to be through the courtesy of Mr. Woolfly that we received this evidence of the election.
Q. Is it not the duty of the canvassing board to return the papers before them to the office of the secretary of state?
A. That is the law of the State, but we did not get them from the proper officer.

By United States Marshal PACKARD:

Question. You stated yesterday that you had published in advance three forms of affidavits?
Answer. Yes, sir; I think there were four, upon reflection.
Q. Did those affidavits contain anything as to "race, color, or previous condition of servitude?"
A. No sir; the allegation is that the person was deprived of his right to vote as a citizen and legal voter.
Q. Did any of the affidavits as filled up state the person swearing to them had been deprived of the right to vote on account of "race, color, or previous condition of servitude?"
A. I think it was not printed in any of them.
Q. Was it written in any of them?
A. I have not examined scarcely any of them.
Mr. RAY (of the Kellogg party) interposing: I suppose it may go down on the record as admitted that they do not state that it was on account of "race, color, or previous condition of servitude." I will examine the affidavits; and if upon that examination I find the fact to be otherwise I desire to save the question.
Q. I observe that Mr. Ray has been examining the affidavits produced here as having been before the Lynch returning board. I now ask if it is agreed that none of these affidavits stated that the person making the affidavit was excluded from voting on account of "race, color, or previous condition of servitude."
A. (by Mr. RAY.) None of them contain that statement; and I think none of the others do. I will make that admission as to these.

Mr. BOVEE, again:

Question. In regard to the preparation of these affidavits, do you know where they were prepared?
Answer. I think they were prepared in New Orleans, by the republican executive committee.

Mr. PACKARD, again:

Question. You stated that you had printed, before the election, three forms of affidavits?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. How many did you have printed?
A. My recollection is about thirty thousand. I caused them to be distributed to nearly every parish before the election.
Q. To whom were they distributed, * * * to both the United States supervisors of election or only to the republican supervisors?
A. Well, probably to the republicans.
Q. Did you get up a form of returns in your committee for the supervisors to make in the State election?
A. I did.
Q. Did you send them to all the United States supervisors?
A. I said I sent them either to the supervisors or to the chairmen of the republican parish committees.
Q. Were there two supervisors appointed at each polling place throughout the State?
A. There were, generally.
Q. When you stated you sent out those blanks to the United States supervisors, whom did you mean?
A. I referred to the republican supervisors.
Q. You did not send them to the democratic supervisors?
A. In no instance, I think.
Q. Did you have any communication with the persons selected as supervisors on the fusion or liberal side?
A. I do not remember having had any communication with them directly.

I mention, as only a few examples, the proof shows that one man took 25,000 affidavits to the Red River parishes, and that in the following-named parishes affidavits were counted as votes, to wit: In Natchitoches, 1,206; Bossier, 1,159; Rapides, 1,000; Madison, 600; Saint Mary's, 500; Plaquemines, 1,314; Washington, 450, &c.

THEODORE JAQUES, (a Grant republican,) sworn: * * * *
A. I put a thousand names to a thousand affidavits.
Q. Without any authority from those men?
A. Yes, sir; for many of the men were men of straw.
Q. How did you go to Plaquemines?
A. I went in a steam-launch belonging to the Government.
Q. Where did you sign these affidavits?
A. In New Orleans.
Q. Who was present when you went to the office of the returning board?
A. Mr. Bovee, General Longstreet, Colonel Lynch, and leading politicians, and, I think, General Herron, but I won't be positive.
Q. Did you hand these affidavits to the board?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. To what member of the board?
A. I think to Mr. Bovee or Mr. Lynch.
Q. What did Mr. Bovee say to you when you handed to him these affidavits?
A. "Jaques, you are a hell of a fellow."
Q. What did you reply?
A. "George, if you want a few more I can get you some by ten o'clock in the morning."

But I must forbear. Comment is unnecessary. So the so-called returns of the Lynch board had not even the counterfeit semblance of law. They do not come to us in the merely questionable shape of legal official returns, with a taint here and there, susceptible of being purged away from the healthy body by a legal contest. No; they stand transfixed before the world, the guilty embodiment of total depravity. They fall, and with them, toppling down, comes the whole spurious fabric of the Pinchback-Kellogg government.

We recur to Judge Durell's midnight order of the 5th of December, in the case of Kellogg vs. Warmoth. Near eleven o'clock, in the night-time, United States Marshal Packard was sent for by the judge, and arriving at the judge's lodgings the marshal was informed by him that he was going to issue an order for the occupation of the state-house, and he wanted it executed in the morning, and inquired of the marshal if he could get ready for it. The marshal immediately made requisition for the United States forces. And on the 6th—

> At midnight, when mankind is wrapt in peace,
> And worldly fancy feeds on golden dreams,

a detachment of the Army of the United States surprised, surrounded, and captured the state-house of Louisiana, and reduced it to military occupation.

Captain R. M. JACKSON sworn:

Question. What is your position?
Answer. I am a captain in the First Artillery.
Q. Where are you stationed?
A. My station now is Fort Barrancas, in Florida.
Q. Were you at New Orleans?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. During the recent election?
A. No, sir.
Q. When did you go to New Orleans?

A. On the night of the 5th of December.
Q. Did you go there with your company?
A. I went there with two batteries of my regiment.
Q. How many men?
A. Eighty-six.
Q. Did you take possession of the Mechanics' Institute, used as a state-house in New Orleans?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. At what time?
A. I think about two o'clock on the morning of the 6th. * * * I took possession under verbal orders from the adjutant-general of the department, Colonel Duncan. * * * Those orders were to take possession of the state-house and hold it, under the orders of the marshal.

So it appears that the marshal did get ready. The truth is only too plain, that all the foregoing were carefully-prepared proceedings in pursuance of a previously well-digested plot.

And now come thick and fast the unerring proofs of sinister schemes in the no longer disguised confident reliance upon the President and Army of the United States by the Pinchback-Kellogg managers for the successful consummation of their conquest of the government of an unoffending State. Artful bulletins of the current of events, and inflammatory calls to hurry up Federal succors, chased each other back and forth upon the burdened wires, to wit:

On the 16th of November, Marshal Packard (telegram) to Attorney-General Williams, requisition for troops referred to General Ewing to learn desire of Government. Enforcement act defied by Warmoth's returning officers.

On the 2d of December the following ominous order:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, December 3, 1872.

S. B. PACKARD,
United States Marshal, New Orleans:

You are ordered to enforce the decrees and mandates of the United States courts, no matter by whom resisted, and General Emory will furnish you with all necessary troops for that purpose.

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

On December 6 James F. Casey, United States collector of the port of New Orleans, and brother-in-law of the President, hastens exultingly to inform him that Pinchback had taken possession of the state-house; that Judge Durell's sweeping decree against Warmoth, &c., had been rendered; that "if enforced it will save the republican majority and give Louisiana a republican legislature and State government, and check Warmoth in his usurpation;" that the Pinchback legislature would meet in the state-house, under the protection of the court.

On the same day Marshal Packard to Attorney-General Williams, announces the promulgation of the report of the Lynch returning board, &c.

On the 9th of December, the same to the same, states Kellogg's majority.

Another, on the same day, from the same to the same, stating Pinckback had taken possession of the governor's office.

Another, on the same day, from same to same, states the high court of impeachment for the trial of the governor had been duly organized, &c.

Another, on the same day, from same to same, stating supreme court had sent Judge Elmore, of the eighth district court, to jail, and announced republican strength in the Pinchback-Kellogg legislature.

Another, on the same day, from same to same, states Governor Warmoth had been impeached, and that the McEnery legislature was not in session.

On the same day P. B. S. Pinchback to the President of the United States, announces himself as governor of Louisiana, refers to the resolutions of the Legislature, and asks for the protection of the United States Government, &c.

On the 10th of December, Marshal Packard to Attorney-General Williams, says the Pinchback legislature met and counted the vote; that Kellogg is elected governor and Antoine lieutenant-governor.

On the same day, Pinchback to the President, states that a majority of honest citizens approve his course, and declares the democrats are inflammatory and incendiary,

On the 11th of December, Marshal Packard to Attorney-General Williams, says the defiant Warmoth legislature is in session at the city hall.

On the same day, J. R. Beckwith, United States attorney, to Attorney-General Williams, says condition of affairs disturbed; that Warmoth, though suspended, had issued his proclamation against Pinchback and his legislature; feared a collision; says the question is now political, and that Pinchback and his legislature are legitimate.

On the same day, Marshal Packard to Attorney-General Williams, says the Warmoth senate met this day, and that it has only seven bona-fide senators in it.

On the same day, the same to the same, says Warmoth legislature is in session at city hall; that Warmoth issued two proclamations declaring the Pinchback-Kellogg authorities and proceedings wholly illegal, and that he will resist them with all the power of the State, &c.

On the same day the following appeal to the President for fair play and non-interference was made by his former political confrère:

NEW ORLEANS, December 11, 1872.

To the President of the United States:

Under an order from the judge of the United States district court, investing James Longstreet, Jacob Hawkins, and others with the powers and duties of returning officers, under State election laws, and charging them with the duty of compiling the legal returns and declaring the result in accordance therewith, those persons have promulgated results based upon no returns whatever, and no evidence except ex-parte statements. They have constructed a pretended general assembly, composed mainly of candidates defeated at the election, and those candidates, protected by United States military forces, have taken possession of the state-house, and have organized a pretended legislature, which, to-day, has passed pretended articles of impeachment against the governor; in pursuance of which, the person claiming to be a lieutenant-governor, but whose term had expired, proclaimed himself acting governor, broke into the executive office, under the protection of United States soldiers, and took possession of the archives. In the mean time, the General Assembly has met at the city hall, and organized for business with sixty members in the house and twenty-one in the senate, being more than a quorum of both bodies. I ask and believe that no violent action be taken, and no force used by the Government, at least until the supreme court shall have passed final judgment in the case. A full statement of the facts will be laid before you and the Congress in a few days.

H. C. WARMOTH,
Governor of Louisiana.

On the same day, Hon. William Pitt Kellogg to Attorney-General Williams: "If President in some way indicate recognition, Governor Pinchback and Legislature would settle everything. Our friends here acting discreetly."

On the same day, James F. Casey, to the President, says opposition trying to array the people against us; rich against poor. "Our quorum in danger;" delay of troops "disheartening our friends, cheering our enemies;" if requisition of Legislature is complied with, all difficulty will be dissipated, the party saved, and everything go on smoothly.

On the same day, the same to the same: "Important you should immediately recognize Governor Pinchback's Legislature in some manner; I earnestly urge this and ask a reply."

On the same day, Acting Governor Pinchback to Attorney-General Williams: "I suggest the commanding general be authorized to furnish troops upon my requisition upon him for the protection of the Legislature and the gubernatorial office. The moral effect would be great."

On the same day, William Pitt Kellogg and James F. Casey, to the President, again urging compliance with the requisition for troops, otherwise fearing a collision.

Then came the following decisive response:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, December 11, 1872.

P. B. S. PINCHBACK, Governor of Louisiana:

Requisition of Legislature transmitted by you is received. When it becomes necessary in the judgment of the President, the State will be protected from domestic violence.

GEORGE H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

Another appeal for fair play:

NEW ORLEANS, December 12, 1872.

SIR: As chairman of a committee of citizens appointed under authority of a mass meeting recently held in this city, I am instructed to inform you that said committee is about leaving here for Washington to lay before you and the Congress of the United States the facts of the political difficulties at present existing in this State, and further earnestly to request you to delay executive action in the premises until after the arrival and hearing of said committee, which is composed of business and professional men without regard to past political affiliation.

THOMAS A. ADAMS,
Chairman.

His Excellency U. S. GRANT, President of the United States.

On the same day John McEnery to the President:

Claiming to be governor-elect of this State, I beg you, in the name of all justice, to suspend recognition of either of the dual governments now in operation here until there can be laid before you all facts and both sides, touching legitimacy of either government. The people denying the legitimacy of Pinchback government and its legislature simply ask to be heard, through committee of many of our best citizens on eve of departure for Washington, before you recognize the one or the other of said governments. I do not believe we will be condemned before we are fully heard.

On the same day the following:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, December 12, 1872.

Acting Governor PINCHBACK, New Orleans, Louisiana:

Let it be understood that you are recognized by the President as the lawful executive of Louisiana, and the body assembled at Mechanics' Institute as the lawful Legislature of the State, and it is suggested that you make proclamation to that effect; and also that all necessary assistance will be given to you and the Legislature herein recognized to protect the State from disorder and violence.

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

And on the ensuing day the following:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, December 13, 1872.

Hon. JOHN MCENERY, New Orleans, Louisiana:

Your visit with a hundred citizens will be unavailing as far as the President is concerned. His decision is made, and will not be changed; and the sooner it is acquiesced in, the sooner good order and peace will be restored.

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

And on the same day the following:

NEW ORLEANS, December 13, 1872.

Hon. GEORGE H. WILLIAMS, Attorney-General United States:

The entire republican party of this State thank the President and yourself for action of yesterday in recognizing the legal and constitutional State government. This action has prevented the consummation of the most barefaced and outrageous election frauds. Every indication points to quiet and good order. The bogus legislature of Warmoth has adjourned sine die. Police reported last night to Governor Pinchback.

WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG,
C. B. DURELL,
CHARLES CLINTON,
JAMES F. CASEY,
E. C. BILLINGS, &c.

On the 14th of December Acting Governor Pinchback to the President, announcing the Warmoth party in arms and in warlike array to resist him, &c.; says the Warmoth force is too strong for him; says they will surrender only to the United States military force; says he has called on the commanding general of the department for the requisite military force, &c.

On the same day E. D. Townsend, Adjutant-General, to General W. H. Emory, United States Army, commanding, New Orleans, Louisiana:

You may use all necessary force to preserve the peace, and will recognize the authority of Governor Pinchback.

On the same day the following:

NEW ORLEANS, December 14, 1872.

To the Adjutant-General, U. S. A.:

On the receipt of your telegram last night an officer was sent to the contesting parties to ask the evacuation of the arsenal and the dispersion of the armed forces. The demand was promptly complied with, and the arsenal turned over to the State authorities this morning. Everything is now quiet.

W. H. EMORY,
Colonel Commanding, Bv't Maj. Gen.

On the 6th January, 1873, the following:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, January 6, 1873.

S. B. PACKARD, U. S. Marshal, New Orleans, Louisiana:

The report of the committee of two hundred, that the President regards his recognition of the existing government as provisional and temporary, is not true. The recognition is final, and will be adhered to unless Congress otherwise provides.

GEORGE H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

And on the same day the following:

NEW ORLEANS, January 6, 1873.

To General W. T. SHERMAN, commanding the Army, Washington, D. C.:

The day passed quietly. No disturbance whatever.

W. H. EMORY,
Colonel Commanding.

And on the 7th January, 1873, the following:

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
Washington, D. C., January 7, 1873.

Official copy respectfully submitted to the Secretary of War.

W. T. SHERMAN, General.

Such is the succinct chronicle, by telegram, of the decline and fall of Louisiana.

The revolting exhibitions of bad faith, corruption, and conquest, in the dishonored names of peace, order, and the guarantees of the Constitution, infesting the tortuous paths we have now explored, will lead, when unchecked, in the future as in the past, to tyranny, to chaos, and to death:

> When the world bow'd to Rome's almighty sword,
> Rome bow'd to Pompey, and confess'd her lord:
> Yet one day lost, this deity below
> Became the scorn and pity of his foe:
> His blood a traitor's sacrifice was made,
> And smok'd indignant on a ruffian's blade:
> No triumph's sound, no gasping army's yell,
> Bid, with due horror, his great soul farewell.

Such exhibitions cannot be dismissed as forming merely—

> The wily shifts of state, those jugglers' tricks
> Which we call deep designs and politics.

They are of far deeper significance. They form the oft execrated and always execrable orgy of perfidy, usurpation, and spoils, upon the blackened and bleeding body of order, liberty, and law.

Brought face to face with this unhappy conflict for the government of Louisiana by disappointed office-seekers, with the undisputed constitutional administration of the State, what then was the plain, paramount duty of the President in the premises? Why, there was actually nothing whatever difficult or embarrassing in it. His duty was simple and most obvious. The President had merely to be consistent with himself in leaving local affairs to local authorities, by adhering for the time being in his executive action to those authorities and that administration which constantly in every form, at the time, and for years previous, had been officially recognized by all three of the great co-ordinate departments of the United States Government. The State constitutional administration was in the constitutional possession of the only official returns of the election of 1872. The great body of those returns was, in any aspect of the case, by the lawful officials, and, on the face of them at least, in conformity with the forms of law; and therefore, prima facie, legal and conclusive until set aside or purged in the mode prescribed by the constitution and laws of Louisiana in cases of contested elections. By all the sanctions of law and order, by whatever is essential to the authority and stability of constitutional government, general or local, it was absolutely indispensable that they should be recognized and respected on the part of every branch of the Government, State and Federal, and by the entire citizen body everywhere.

By the constitutions of all the States known to this Union the legislative departments everywhere are made, and of necessity must be, the sole judges of the elections, returns, and qualifications of their own members. That has universally been regarded as a legislative, not as a judicial, function.

If one turbulent and unscrupulous man, on the bench, for instance, of an inferior court, or several such men on several such benches, whether local or federal, undertake to obliterate constitutional boundaries; to swell above and overtop the very law-making power by whose arbitrary fiat they live and have their being, and so overspread the whole ocean-bed of political expediency and party strife, surely such pernicious example should be condemned, not sanctioned, in high places.

Wherefore, when one or two unsuccessful candidates for State offices, contrary to the evidence of the only official returns, factiously claim to have been elected, and under the plausible mask of a bill in equity ostensibly to perpetuate testimony, covertly seek through such judicial iniquity to overthrow the laws and subvert the established government of a State of this Union, they have no right to deceive and degrade an American President in his high office to that lower level, the level of a co-operating partisan in Louisiana republicanism. And when in furtherance of such perfidy, that essential and exclusive function of every legislative body is usurped and wielded, and lawful legislatures pulled down and unlawful legislatures pulled up under cover of a writ of injunction in a decree in chancery, it is in the highest degree indecent and scandalous, if no worse, to call upon an illustrious Executive to consummate the brazen crime, under color of officially enforcing the mandates and decrees of an enlightened and virtuous court, adjudicating within the impartial, inviolable, and venerated precincts of the Constitution and the law.

The President is the head of a powerful party, has performed achievements which will outlive States and survive the oblivion of empires, is burdened with military renown, aspires to civic eminence, and ought to be animated by a patriot's and a statesman's love of stainless glory. A virtuous fame cannot afford to deserve the homage of faction and the execration of liberty.

The pendency of a suit, on and after the 16th of November, 1872, in the United States district court for the district of Louisiana, to perpetuate evidence, formed no decent ground for the Executive of the United States to depart from his long-established official recognition of the government of Louisiana in the administration of Governor Warmoth. The legitimacy of that republican administration could not be, and had not been, assailed by any friends of the President. And its constitutional status was everywhere recognized. On the 14th of November, on the 16th of November, and on the 6th of December, 1872, and throughout, that administration had been engaged in the usual lawful way in the business of carrying out the will of the people expressed and evidenced in pursuance of law, at the State November election, and was in the act of lawfully handing over the government to the representatives of the people, who had been legally elected to the succession.

Suddenly, this constitutional, established, universally recognized government is assailed by a knot of men, calling itself the official body, the government. Without official position; without any lawful evidence of election to the succession, unknown to the law, officially unknown to the authorities, State or Federal, this knot of men unable to deny their total destitution of the official returns—that by these returns other persons had been elected to the succession—nevertheless boldly proclaim they believe it to have been elected—if not elected it ought to have been—and à fortiori it is the government of Louisiana.

Having performed those extraordinary feats, they have the effrontery to call upon the Executive of the United States to officially recognize the knot as the government. What ensues? That great department, so fully informed in the premises, that further information is curtly repelled, naively repudiates all its subsisting official relations with the constitutional government of Louisiana, revokes its recognition of the Warmoth administration, and not only recognizes in the place of it this knot, this tertium quid—not only throws around it the whole moral panoply of full Federal communion, but deliberately, in the face of the world, and to the consternation of the devoted people of Louisiana, officially, with the United States Army, escorts it into power and place, and fortifies it there with all the dread blazonry of war.

The constitutional government of Louisiana as represented by its executive continued at the date of those events to have every previous claim upon the constitutional and moral support of the United States, as well in its executive as in all its co-ordinate departments. The revolutionary government never had any such claim, and intrinsically and extrinsically was notoriously misbegotten, illicit, and incendiary.

In Rhode Island in 1841–'42, when a formidable and far more respectable effort was made to overthrow the established government, the executive of the established government invoked Federal protection, and the then President recognized him, adhered to his previous recognition of him as the lawful executive power of the State, and took measures to call out the militia to support his authorty if it should be found necessary for the General Government to interfere. If in the Louisiana case the present President had only followed that judicious and most salutary precedent, what would have been the result? Why, it is conceded by all that if the Federal Executive had merely stood aloof, here as there the established government would have gone on in peace in its accustomed grooves, and the revolutionary government would have instantly sunken, here as there, into the most abject contempt. Unlike the Rhode Island case, it was at all times plain that the great body of the people of Louisiana were faithful to the established government, as represented by the State executive, and that the latter was in no need of Federal protection against threatened disorganization. He did not call for any. He asked only that the local government should be left to its own constitutional resources and the will of the people. The inherently feeble machinations of the knot awakened no uneasiness in Louisiana, until in its support was outstretched the omnipotence of the Federal Executive arm.

Under the fourth section of the fourth article of the Federal Constitution "it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State. For as the United States guarantees to each State a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the State before it can determine whether it is republican or not. And when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority, and its decision is binding on every other department of the Government, and could not be questioned in a judicial tribunal." (Luther vs. Borden.)

The established government of Louisiana, as represented by Governor Warmoth and his successor, was in unison, and up to all the constitutional requirements, as heretofore so authoritatively expounded. The President had, as the case then stood, properly nothing to do with the question. He had nothing to do in that connection but simply to keep on then, as in the past, acquiescing in the statu quo of an established State government which he had no lawful right to control. If the officials of that government had become in point of fact illegal or revolutionary in design, the peaceful pursuance of the course prescribed by the constitution and laws of Louisiana by the aggrieved pointed the only way to tribunals and remedies sure and steadfast, and so in due course of time the wronged could have been righted.

It was pretended by the faction that Federal interference was necessary to insure a republican form of government; pretended in behalf of a faction then engaged in overturning a government long recognized as republican in form by every department of the United States; pretended in behalf of a faction afterward the successful builders of military despotism upon the ruins of a republican form of government. Such pretenses savor of the devil quoting Scripture.

Was Governor Warmoth about to establish an aristocracy, a monarchy, a military despotism? Whatever his faults, he was then in the very act of surrendering power and installing his successor in pursuance of law. Was Governor McEnery about to set up a monarchy, an aristocracy, or a military despotism? He was in the very act of accepting official responsibility by the command of the popular voice, expressed and proved, in pursuance of the constitution and the law.

Boldly reversing the actual condition of the debatants, calling the government insurrection and insurrection the government, it was pretended, in the interest of faction, that the resolute purpose of the Louisiana State government to exercise its constitutional functions and perform its official duties, factious combinations to the contrary notwithstanding, constituted a case of domestic violence, in the meaning of section 4 of article 4 of the Federal Constitution; a case of insurrection against the government, in the meaning of the Federal acts of February 28, 1795, and March 3, 1807: this done, one of the faction was then called governor, and more of the faction a General Assembly; and this combination thereupon, by swift-chasing telegrams, pathetically broke the news to the President that there was great danger of a collision, (with a constable or a capias, I suppose;) they assured the President if he would only recognize them and send the military they would soon settle things, and they begged him again and again to hurry up to their relief and protection "such part of the land and naval force of the United States as shall be judged necessary."

We have seen that in due time the promised aid was received; the regular government of Louisiana immediately succumbed to the military power of the United States, and usurpation and faction, with their loathsome progeny, "in many a scaly fold, voluminous and vast," now sit brooding over a heritage of liberty, the "fairest among ten thousand, and altogether lovely."

In view of those lamentable abuses, is it the part of candor to deny that the President, on his part, has fallen into a grievous mistake; that he has actually invaded and overturned the rights of the people of Louisiana?

A wrong confessed is a right vindicated, and the path of reparation is lighted with the smiles of angels and paved with the plaudits of men.

However, the duty of the Federal Legislature is obvious, the exigency great, and cannot with safety or with fidelity be postponed or evaded. It belongs to the dominant party in this Congress to vindicate the Constitution and uplift a wronged and fallen State. That party holds all the outposts, all the seats of power. It commands the vantage-ground, and wields and is responsible for the initiative. The minority are in themselves powerless. It is only too plain that an anti-republican, a despotic government, has been set up and is being maintained in Louisiana. True, a constitution on paper, republican in form, still exists there, but it exists chiefly in name, and only by sufferance in fact. That constituent element of the government which the administration composes is in deadly antagonism with every part of the fundamental law. Even if in all else, save only as to the persons who wield the power, that republican constitution be administered line by line, precept by precept, that still would not be the constitution acting proprio vigore, but solely by the policy or caprice of successful usurpation and protected crime, in defiance of those essentials of every organic law, its unity and supremacy.

Wherefore it is the inexorable duty of the Congress of the United States to overthrow the monstrous usurpation, recall the statu quo of the constitutional government at the time it was overawed, subjugated, and superseded by the Executive and the Army of the United States, and so restore to the government and people of Louisiana the untrammeled management and control of their own local and domestic affairs, subject only to the Constitution and laws of the United States.

FINANCES—CURRENCY.

Mr. FIELD. Mr. Speaker, early in the session I introduced a bill (H. R. No. 701) entitled "A bill authorizing the issue of 3.65 convertible bonds, to provide for their interchangeability with legal-tender notes, and to lessen the interest on the public debt;" and I will now explain the provisions of the bill and submit my reasons in support of the measure.

The first section provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue on demand, in exchange for legal-tender notes, the bonds of the Government in denominations of fifty dollars and upward, bearing interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum, and principal and interest payable in the legal-tender or lawful money of the United States. I assume that no opposition will be made to this section of the bill. If the people choose to lend our Government money bearing this low rate of interest, I think convenient arrangements should be made to accommodate them.

The venerable Frederick Fraley, president of the National Board of Trade, a gentleman of ripe judgment and large experience, in a speech on the finances before the board at its recent annual meeting, expresses the opinions very generally entertained by our intelligent business men upon the necessity and public utility of this measure. He says:

> During the summer season money accumulates in the great commercial centers of the country and becomes such a drug there that it is loaned for all sorts of speculations. It is not actually demanded for the business purposes of the country, and it is loaned, to a very large extent, to the speculators and gamblers in stocks, and this leads to a very dangerous state of things which is very dangerous to the structure upon which our business rests. Now this proposition for the issue of certificates of debt, bearing a moderate rate of interest, is intended to provide for such a state of things, by giving to those who hold this currency in excess an opportunity of converting it into a security of the highest character, bearing a reasonable but modera'e rate of interest, with the privilege of reconverting it into currency when the necessities of trade and the fluctuations of the season shall demand such proceedings. The issue of such certificates would give an opportunity for investment of the funds of the savings institutions; and it would also give an opportunity for the investment of the surplus currency which might be held by the national banks; it would enable them to get some small return upon their money, instead of throwing it into the vortex of speculation.

The issue of Government bonds convertible into legal-tender notes is also recommended by General Spinner, the distinguished and venerable Treasurer of the United States. In his last report he says:

> At other seasons of the year nothing like the legally fixed quantity of currency is needed; neither can it be used for any legitimate purposes. At such times the holders, naturally desirous to "turn an honest penny," finding all the legitimate avenues of trade closed, either engage in speculations themselves, or place their money at interest with corporations and individuals, who too often use it for purposes that, in point of morality, are but little removed from ordinary gambling and downright swindling. * * * For these notorious evils a remedy should be found and interposed. In looking over the whole ground, no scheme has presented itself that would be so likely to accomplish the end in view as the authorization by Congress of the issue of a certain amount of legal-tender notes, that could at all times be converted into a currency interest-bearing stock of the United States, and for which the holder of such stock so authorized could at pleasure at any time receive legal-tender notes, with the accrued interest, from the day of issue of such stock to the day of its redemption. It is believed that a rate of interest no higher than 3.65 per cent. will be high enough to absorb the desired amount of the circulation when not needed for commercial purposes, and low enough to force the return of the bonds in exchange for legal-tender notes at the times when the business wants of the country shall require more currency.

It is now more than ten years since Congress, on the advice of the Treasury Department, refused to give a willing and patriotic people the privilege of furnishing all the money required for the maintenance and support of the Government at a moderate rate of interest. For some reasons, to the public unknown and unexplained, our financial chiefs and leaders insisted upon selling bonds at extortionate rates of interest and on conditions calculated to facilitate their shipment to Europe, so that at the present time more than one-half of our bonded indebtedness is held by foreign capitalists. If the terms and conditions on which these loans were invited had been more favorable for investment in our own country, the Government would have been supplied with an overflowing Treasury from the hands of the American people. In issuing currency, too, the Government has, upon the largest portion, insisted on paying interest—amounting in the aggregate nearly to $300,000,000—and the issues have been so cunningly arranged that the accruing interest, in nearly every case, instead of going into the hands of the people, was gathered into the swollen coffers of bankers and money-changers. The interest paid on compound-interest legal-tender notes, one and two year 5 per cent. legal-tender notes, and certificates of indebtedness was a gratuitous and shameful waste of public money, and nineteen-twentieths of this interest money fell into the hands of syndicates and bankers. If plain greenbacks had been issued instead of these interest-bearing notes, the burdens of the people in taxation might have been less oppressive, and no man can assert that greenbacks would not have accomplished this purpose just as well, if not better. The issue of compound-interest notes was a stupid compound folly of the Treasury Department for which our tax-payers have paid over $50,000,000 interest.

I aver that the interest paid by our Government was wholly unnecessary and unjustifiable on the following obligations, all of which were national currency in circulation:

Statement of interest paid since 1862 on national currency in circulation.

Compound-interest notes, (legal-tender)	$50,923,993
United States notes, one-year, (legal-tender,) 5 per cent	2,226,000
United States notes, two-year, (legal-tender,) 5 per cent	16,648,000
Certificates of indebtedness, (issued for commissary stores,) one-year, 6 per cent	33,705,194
Temporary-loan certificates, 4 per cent	3,000,000
Temporary-loan certificates, 5 per cent	5,000,000
Three per cent. certificates, (convertible into greenbacks on demand,) 3 per cent	5,100,000
Three-year Treasury notes, 7.3 per cent.,	181,770,000
Total	298,373,187

Now, there is no hidden mystery about this matter. Nearly three hundred million dollars have been needlessly expended for interest on Government obligations, which were a part of the circulating medium of the country; and our hard-working farmers and producers understand these questions, and they can estimate this enormous waste of the public money as well as Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co.

In view of these facts and wrongs, and the stupendous mistakes, if not gross designs, against the Treasury, let us now offer the people a convertible bond, bearing 3.65 per cent. interest, in exchange for the legal-tender greenbacks which Congress on the 25th day of February, 1862, by solemn enactment, promised the American people should be convertible, at the option of the holder, into Government bonds at par. Let us at least make good this express contract in the legal-tender act.

The second section of the bill provides that the convertible bonds shall be issued bearing interest at 3.65 per cent., and the same shall be made payable on demand at the Treasury of the United States, and at such other convenient places as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate for the purpose. I think no objection can be urged to this provision in the bill. It provides at once against plethora or inflation of the currency, assures its elasticity and stability, and, if adopted by Congress, will be hailed with joy by the people, for they will know that on this fiscal arrangement no financial or commercial crisis can disturb the commerce and industries of the country, and for all time to come we may enjoy exemption from the destructive, distressing, and baneful effects of revulsions and financial panics. Let such a law be enacted by Congress, securing, as it will, elasticity to the currency, its volume to be expanded or contracted to meet the exact needs of the societary circulation, in active as well as in passive seasons of business, and we shall have a financial panacea which will exempt our country in the future from the power of the rings, the money-changers, and the swindlers, who, with a fixed and unalterable quantity of lawful money, possess the power to crush commerce and industry to suit their own avarice or caprice. We need at once and forever to clear ourselves from the unflinching grasp of unprincipled and unpatriotic men, who, by cornering and locking up our lawful money in times of stringency and peril, exercise their power to bring upon the country disaster and ruin; and while merchants are in distress, and industries embarrassed or paralyzed, they step in to buy up the hard earnings of a helpless and bankrupt people at their own will and at their own prices. Thus "the rich become richer and the poor poorer." But on the plan proposed in this bill we need have no apprehension of such combinations and misfortunes in the future; the surplus earnings of the people will be lodged with the Government, and whenever the business needs of the country require an increase of the currency, it will be at their easy call furnished by the Government in exchange for its convertible bonds.

The Treasurer of the United States, again, in referring to the necessity for an improvement of the currency, in his last annual report says:

> Few, if any, believe that the volume of the circulating medium, as fixed by law, stands at an amount that is exactly right. It must be obvious to all who have watched the course of the business and financial relations of the country that there are times when the real wants of the country demand, and there should be, an increase of the currency; and that there are other times when the safety of all legitimate business requires that it should be largely reduced. What is really needed is a currency so flexible as to at all times accommodate itself to the real business wants of the whole country.
>
> The greatest objection to an exclusively metallic currency is its want of elasticity. That there are regularly recurring times when the wants of legitimate trade require an expansion of the circulating medium to an amount much greater than is necessary at other times, is a fact that is patent to all observing business men.

From the days of barter among the savage and nomadic tribes, when shells and bark and stamped leather were in use as money, and afterward when bullocks and iron blooms were employed for the purpose, even down to the period of silver and gold currency, the use of credit in exchanges and settlements was wholly unknown; but during the past and present centuries the bank-note and the bank-check have been more universally employed as the instruments of exchange than any other description of money. Like the railroad and the telegraph, they have been the outgrowth, the necessity, and the complement of civilization. They are esteemed by merchants as superior to metallic money, for without their use the business of the wholesale community could not be transacted, and the wheels of commerce would become clogged and blocked. In England, as well as in the large cities of the United States, the bank-check performs the function of currency in volume a thousand times greater than the metallic money. Some idea of the extent of its use may be formed by considering the operations of the clearing-house in the city of New York, where the average daily transactions exceed $100,000,000; and in effecting exchanges of this magnitude very often not a quarter of a million dollars of lawful money is required. But outside of our cities, in the interior sections of our broad country, bank-checks are not so practicable, and the currency of lawful money is a greater convenience, if not an actual necessity, for the people.

There are two kinds of money: first, that created by the sovereign or by the national legislature, called lawful money; second, that of courtesy, which is employed by common consent and convenience, such as bank-notes, bank-checks, letters of credit, promissory notes, bills of exchange, and bank credits. If, however, an abundant and adequate supply of the first or best kind be furnished, a less amount of the second or inferior description would be required and used by the people.

Some ignorant persons have a notion that money should be redeemed, and they call ours "irredeemable currency" and "false promises to pay." Now, the power of transferring a debt from one to another is the true and only function of money. Who ever heard of English sovereigns or American eagles being redeemed in any other sense? Our greenbacks are in fact redeemed every day in effecting exchanges and in the payment of debts. Again, others, still more ignorant, assert that our money should be the money of the world—they never specify what world, nor do they describe the kind of money wanted, nor how Congress is to exercise its "express powers" to provide lawful money for other nations. If they mean gold coin, then what shall be done for China and the East Indies, containing probably one-third of the whole population of the globe, and whose money consists solely of copper and silver? Our sentimental writers on finance should know that the lawful money of one nation becomes merchandise, like corn and pork, in another; our gold coins, when shipped abroad, leave the country like other of our raw products, and bankers draw for the avails at sight. Such persons should also know that Congress can only provide money for the New World; and that our national credit—the greenback—is the best lawful money for the people of the United States.

Owing to a disturbance in private credits, commencing with the failure of Jay Cooke & Co., a shrinkage in discounts began in September; debts could not be paid by the usual currency; a vast volume of promissory notes and bills of exchange became unavailable and useless for settlements and exchanges, and a great manufacturing and trading population were compelled to fall back on the totally inadequate and limited supply of legal-tender and national-bank currency. The banks in New York and throughout the country were obliged to suspend payment in currency and resort to an illegal issue of clearing-house checks, which were used as money to the extent of $24,000,000. An increase of our lawful money was the true and proper remedy for the crisis, and even a knowledge of the fact that legal-tender notes could be had in exchange for Government bonds would have resulted in the complete restoration of confidence and commercial prosperity.

All our bank-notes and legal-tenders are not equal in volume to one in a thousand of other credits used in ordinary times as currency, for the entire circulating power is the circulating medium of the country. The rich trader requires, in ordinary times, but little legal-tender currency; he deals in private credits, such as bank-checks, bills of exchange, and promissory notes. This is the currency of wholesale. But the industrious classes, the day-laborer, and many others of small means, must have small bills for daily use. This is the money of retail.

Unfortunately, our laws fix and limit the volume of legal currency, which has been very much contracted since 1865. In the mean time the business of the country has vastly increased; paid labor now fills the Southern States, while the producing classes of the North and of the great West have multiplied in public and private enterprises until the army of laborers is counted by millions. The boy of eight years ago has now become a man and must have a man's clothes, else he will split his garments in every seam. Money is made for the use of producing classes principally, and its volume should be increased with the increase of population and with the growth of the productive industry of the country.

It is manifest that our money or currency must be increased sufficiently to pay all classes for their daily labor, or we must reduce the work and discharge the workers now employed on our farms, in our mines and workshops. The question is, shall the currency be increased with our increase of labor and business, or shall we reduce the labor and business of the country so as to handle the traffic conveniently with the volume now in circulation? The factory employing one hundred mechanics to-day certainly requires more currency than last year when only ten were employed. The production of wealth by labor has been more than doubled in eight years; in the mean time our national currency has been reduced over $1,300,000,000. While the demand, therefore, has been increasing, the supply has been rapidly diminishing, and the tightening process finally culminated last September in throwing one-half of our laboring population out of work.

The question is, shall we reduce the population of the country, keep one-half of our productive forces out of work, and destroy two-thirds of the wealth and property now on hand for the purpose of accommodating our condition to the present volume of the currency? If Congress shall refuse to augment the currency in order to meet the increasing needs of a growing country, then provision should be made for the annual destruction of our wealth. We should burn up our corn and cotton, our hominy and our hogs, to enable us to effect our exchanges, and thus to suit the views of the ancients on finance and currency. The amount of money required being manifestly proportionate to the number and value of the exchanges made, it follows that as population increases domestic commerce enlarges, and occupations are diversified, an increase of the circulating medium becomes an absolute necessity to growth and prosperity.

The money that will pay one thousand men will not pay two thousand unless the latter reduce the price of labor one-half. Thus, currency must be increased or wages reduced. Which of these alternatives, Mr. Speaker, will you choose?

It is thus apparent that in this question of currency lies the conflict between capital and labor. It is a well-known fact that when money is abundant the laborer receives his full reward, and prospers, but when money is scarce the laborer finds but little employment even at "starvation prices." Thus, then, if we unduly restrict the volume of currency we oppress and pauperize labor, while we give capital more power to deny to the laborer and producer a fair reward for their toil. An abundant supply of currency facilitates and aids production like tools in the hands of the mechanic, and like oil on the axle, it accelerates and expedites. Its volume should not be fixed by law, for its uses are as changeable and variable as the wants of man. A single cup of water may suffice in winter, but the workman during the heat and dust of summer may need another draught; and so it is with currency—more is required at one season than at another.

Under the operation of this bill, the volume of our currency would be self-adjusting, expanding or contracting with the needs of the people, by this simple property of interconversion; for convenient facilities are afforded for changing at any time currency into bonds, or bonds into currency. The total amount of 6 per cent. bonds now outstanding is $1,218,728,150; and should this entire amount within a few years become transferred to 3.65 convertible bonds there would be an annual saving of $28,642,744 in interest on the public debt. On this point I again refer to the able report of the Treasurer of the United States. He says:

> This would change a large amount of the indebtedness of the nation from 6 per cent. gold-interest-bearing bonds to others bearing a lower rate of interest, payable in currency, thus making a great saving to the nation, and at the same time giving to all the people who choose to avail themselves of its benefits a place of safe deposit where they will be able to receive interest on their surplus means.

I have prepared statements showing the large contraction made during the past eight years in the volume of circulation.

On the 1st of September, 1865, the circulating medium consisted, in part, as follows:

United States notes	$433, 160, 569
Fractional currency	26, 344, 742
National-bank notes	300, 000, 000
Compound-interest legal-tender notes	217, 024, 160
Temporary-loan certificates, 10 d-d	107, 148, 713
Certificates of indebtedness	85, 093, 000
Treasury 5 per cent. legal-tenders	32, 536, 901
Treasury notes, legal-tenders past due and not presented	1, 503, 020
State-bank notes	78, 867, 575
Three-year Treasury notes	830, 000, 000
Total	2, 111, 678, 680

On the 1st of December, 1873, the circulating medium consisted in part as follows:

United States notes	$367, 001, 685
Fractional currency	48, 000, 000
Certificates of indebtedness	678, 000
National-bank notes	350, 000, 000
Total	765, 679, 685

It will be perceived by the exhibit here made that the currency has been reduced $1,345,998,995 since September 1, 1865.

The history of panics in England and in our own country discloses the fact that a sovereign and unfailing remedy is obtained by increasing the currency. In England this has been done in violation of law. In America let enlightened legislation prevent the occurrence of financial disorders in the future.

Referring to the existing panic, the Treasurer of the United States says:

> This could not have happened had there been an elastic and flexible instead of our present rigid and unyielding currency. There is scarce a doubt but this financial revulsion has cost the people in the aggregate hundreds of millions of dollars, to say nothing of the loss of revenue to the Government.

The views of the Comptroller of the Currency on the panic and the remedy therefor may be found in his last report, (page 22.) He says:

> It can hardly be doubted that if the surplus means of the country banks which were invested in call loans by their city correspondents had been invested in public funds, convertible into cash upon demand, the disastrous results of the late panic would have been avoided.
>
> A Government issue of certificates, bearing a low rate of interest, to be counted as a certain proportion of the reserve, is the proper remedy for such a state of things. If the surplus of the country banks had been to a considerable extent invested in such Government certificates the drafts upon the city banks would have been proportionately less: and if the surplus funds of the city banks had likewise been held in such certificates, the avails of such certificates would have been quietly withdrawn from the Treasury, and the banks would have found themselves possessed of ready means with which to supply the demands of their dealers.

By the act of March 3, 1863, Congress authorized the issue of fractional currency "not exceeding $50,000,000;" but the traffic of the country not requiring so large a sum of these small bills, the amount issued has never exceeded $48,000,000. The amount outstanding has varied between $25,000,000 and $48,000,000, and probably $10,000,000 of the issue have been worn out and destroyed. I refer to this fact as an illustration of the safe working of the convertible plan contemplated by this bill. The people have taken only $48,000,000 fractional currency, although they might have had $50,000,000; and so it will be with regard to the amount of greenbacks to be issued in exchange for bonds—no more will be taken than the business interests of the country require; and should the volume of currency at any time become redundant, the unproductive or excessive portion could be conveniently exchanged for the interest-bearing bonds.

Now, if the Secretary of the Treasury at the beginning of the existing panic had promptly paid out the $44,000,000 legal-tender reserve in exchange for Government bonds, distributing the same to the principal cities of the country, it would have been checked and ended. The Secretary would not have been under the necessity of asking Congress to tax the people to increase the revenue, for the prosperity of the country—a reserve not to be disregarded—would have continued, the receipts of the Treasury would have been ample for all public expenditures, and the wealth of the nation would have been over $1,000,000,000 greater than it is to-day. No business man of any experience will doubt this statement. Let us, therefore, in behalf of a depressed and paralyzed people, act with signal promptness in adopting measures that will start every workshop and factory throughout the land, set the unemployed laborers at work, and bring contentment and happiness to the people of the whole country.

The experience of England has been similar to ours in commercial revulsions. The panic of 1825 has been graphically described by Mr. Huskisson in the House of Commons, (Parl. Debs., vol. 14, page 230.) He says: "It was impossible to convert into money, to any extent, the best securities of the Government. Persons could not sell exchequer bills, nor bank stock, nor East India stock, nor the public funds." Mr. Baring said that "men would not part with their money on any terms nor for any security. Persons of undoubted wealth and real capital were seen walking about the streets of London not knowing whether they should be able to meet their engagements of the next day." At this juncture of the crisis, December 14, the banks totally changed their policy and discounted with the utmost profuseness. They made enormous advances on exchequer bills and securities of all sorts, and the great London panic of 1825 was completely allayed by the profuse issue of the notes of the Bank of England in excess of the limitation fixed by its charter. Between the 14th and 17th of December the bank issued over £5,000,000 in bank-notes. This bold policy on the part of the Bank of England directors and the ministry was crowned with the most complete success; the panic was stayed almost immediately throughout the kingdom, and private credits were again available for business purposes. (Macleod on Banking, vol. 2, p. 253.)

> All contemporary evidence proves that it was this profuse issue of £5,000,000 of paper by the Bank of England in a few days that stayed the panic. If the bank had persevered in the restrictive policy required by law for three days longer, the total and entire destruction of commercial credits would infallibly have ensued.—Macleod on Banking, vol. 2, p. 252.

I again quote from the same authority, describing the great panic of October, 1847:

> From Monday, the 18th, to Saturday, the 23d, was the great crisis. On Monday the Royal Bank of Liverpool, with a paid-up capital of £800,000, stopped payment, which caused the funds to fall 2 per cent. This was followed by the stoppage of the North and South Wales Bank, also of Liverpool, the Liverpool Banking Company, the Union Bank of Newcastle, heavy runs on the other banks of the district, and other bank failures at Manchester and in the west of England. As the whole commercial world knew that the resources of the banking department were being rapidly exhausted a complete panic seized them. A complete cessation of private discounts followed. The most exorbitant sums were offered to, and refused by, merchants for acceptances and commercial bills.
>
> The continued and ever-increasing severity of the crisis caused the ministry on the 23d to authorize the bank to issue notes beyond the limits prescribed by the bank act, whereupon the bank immediately acted upon it and discounted freely at 9 per cent. The letter of the ministry proposing to submit to Parliament a bill of indemnity for the infringement of the law by the bank was not made public until one o'clock on Monday, the 25th, and no sooner was it done than the panic vanished like a dream.
>
> Mr. Gurney stated that it produced its effects in less than ten minutes. No sooner was it known that notes might be had than the want of them ceased. Not only did no infringement of the act take place, but the whole issue of notes in consequence of this letter from the ministry was only £400,000, so that while at one moment the whole credit of Great Britain was in imminent danger of total destruction, within one hour it was saved by the issue of £400,000 of the Bank of England notes.—Ibid., p. 313.

Now, if the illegal issue of bank-notes saved England from an impending commercial catastrophe, should we not provide by law for the issue of our greenbacks in exchange for Government bonds in times of need, and thus prevent the recurrence of panics and commercial disorders in the United States?

"In every civilized country," says Tooke, "supplying and regulating the circulating medium is a function of sovereign prerogative." This doctrine has been admitted, and the power exercised in all ages; and since the Conquest the legal money of England has been regulated or altered by proclamation of the Crown, or by act of Parliament, one hundred and eighty-four times. Nearly every sovereign has altered the standard of money and legalized variations in its weight and denominations, and it has been so often reduced in value, and its quality from time to time so debased, that the lawful money of England to-day in weight is not one-third what it was in the twenty-eighth year of Edward I. In the days of William the Conqueror the "pound" actually was a pound weight, pure silver, and a shilling was a twentieth part of a pound; but at the present day the pound is coined into sixty-six shillings; and yet the standard of money has been less degraded in England than in any other country.

To fix the standard and regulate money is of necessity a governmental function, and in this country this power has been lodged solely with Congress. All governments have assumed to alter the standard of money, and to change what they had a right to make. The facts in the history of American coinage show the view which Congress has taken of its own powers. On the 6th of July, 1785, the money unit of the United States was adopted, and on the 8th of August, 1786, Congress enacted that the silver dollar should contain 375.64 grains; that the gold eagle, or ten dollars, should contain 246.268 grains; and that the half-eagle, or five dollars, should contain 123.134 grains, all composed of eleven parts fine and one part alloy. The mint price of a pound, troy weight, of uncoined silver was fixed at $9.92. On the 16th of October, 1786, an ordinance was passed establishing the United States Mint, and the mint price of one pound of silver coin was then fixed at $13.77. By the act approved April 2, 1792, the weight of the eagle was increased and fixed at 270 grains, the half-eagle 135 grains, and the silver dollar 416 grains. The dollar was declared to be the unit of Federal money, and both gold and silver coins were made a legal tender for all sums. By the act of June 28, 1834, the weight of the eagle was fixed at 258 grains, the half-eagle at 129 grains, and the silver dollar at 412½ grains, thus reducing the weight of these coins 4 per cent. By act of Congress approved January 18, 1837, the weight of silver and copper coins was altered, and the standard of both silver and gold was altered to nine parts fine and one part alloy. Other changes, exceeding 6 per cent., were made in the standard and quality of money by acts of Congress approved March 3, 1851, and February 21, 1853, and the legal-tender quality of silver was limited to sums of five dollars.

This summary of legislation shows that Congress has exercised the power of determining what shall be legal tender—altering the laws regulating money according to the exigency of circumstances; increasing or diminishing the quantity and purity of gold, silver, and copper coins at its pleasure; changing their intrinsic worth, while retaining the same titles, bestowing upon them the same nominal value, and declaring Treasury notes issued at the close of the war of 1812, and also during the Mormon troubles in 1857, legal tender for certain purposes. The act of Congress approved February 25, 1862, invested the United States notes with the legal-tender quality. They were of small denominations and entered into general circulation, and they continue to be the lawful money of the country. Congress having the power to make these changes has also the same right to make any further changes which may seem to it wise. If it can declare that silver shall not be a legal tender for any amount above five dollars it can declare that it shall not be a legal tender at all, and it may deal in the same way with gold. It is not bound to either except by its own discretion. So, also, if it can alter the intrinsic value of these coins 1, 2, or 6 per cent. without impairing their legal-tender quality at the same nominal value, it may do the same thing to a still greater extent. In one word, Congress has always proceeded upon the assumption that the whole question of creating money and altering it lies within its constitutional competency. Moreover, when changes have been made in the weight and fineness of legal-tender coins, reducing their intrinsic worth, debts contracted before such changes, and made payable in dollars, have been paid in the new coins at their nominal value, and the debts discharged. In every such case the obligation was contracted under one standard and liquidated under another.

It is quite true that not until the late war had any occasion arisen to alter the legal tender except in relation to coinage. Then, however, Congress, in the exercise of those powers which are "necessary and proper" for carrying into execution its express powers, saw fit to invest United States notes with the legal-tender quality. It had the powerful precedent of the English Parliament in the bank act of 1833, wherein the legal-tender quality was imparted to bank-notes, and carried in the House of Commons by a vote of 214 to 156. There is not a clause in the fundamental law of the land, which confines Congress to gold and silver as the materials of which the legal tender must be composed, or which forbids it to use copper or platina, or anything else in its discretion, or restrains it from making any change in quality or kind, which in its judgment may be required by circumstances. There are such clauses in respect to the powers of the States, but none in respect to those of Congress. As to the whole question of creating money, designating its titles, and fixing its value, the people chose to make Congress the sole depository of legal power, without limitations upon its exercise; leaving it to act in the premises, to revise its own action, and from time to time to change its monetary laws according to its best judgment. It is not true, as is too often assumed, that in respect to the laws of Congress the legal-tender property is by the Constitution attached to gold and silver, and to these only. The truth is the Constitution does not make anything money—either gold, or silver, or anything else—but leaves this question with the legislative department of the Government, imposing no restraints or limitations upon its discretion, and assuming that it would be governed by the general principles of expediency and common sense. Now, in view of these antecedents and principles, I feel compelled to regard the powers of Congress over the money of the Republic absolutely sovereign, complete, indivisible, and unrestrained.

By act of Parliament in the time of William IV, the promissory notes of the Bank of England were declared a legal tender. This bank is a private corporation; and yet Parliament deemed it necessary and expedient to declare its notes a legal tender throughout England. Would it not have been more in accordance with the traditions and precedents of England had Parliament conferred this quality of lawful money and legal tender on the credit of the British government? They had not advanced far enough for that, and it remained for the Congress of the United States, representing the most intelligent and the most highly civilized people of the world, to coin "the credit of the nation," and it has thus wisely provided a lawful money for the people, an instrument of exchange more perfect than that of any other nation. In our progress and development a great stride was taken in monetary science when the legal-tender act of 1862 was approved by the President of the United States; and now to perfect our fiscal system is the task which Congress must undertake and accomplish. I have referred to the acts of Parliament and of Congress in relation to metallic money, and the innumerable changes and depreciations made therein by law, for the purpose of showing the superior advantage of choosing the national credit for use as money. Its quality and weight cannot be debased or reduced, nor is it liable to commercial changes in value, like gold and silver. Such commodities are always affected by the condition of foreign trade, and by the law of supply and demand. On the contrary, the credit of a great and powerful and wealthy nation is unchangeable; it possesses, too, intrinsic value, and it represents labor; for the credit of our country was issued in exchange for the labor expended to perpetuate the nation's life. It is less changeable in value than any other thing, and for this reason it is the best instrument ever devised for a circulating medium.

I call the attention of the House to the petitions, the resolutions and declarations, of numerous societies and associations of workingmen, of conventions and granges, throughout the country, demanding expressly the provisions of law embraced in this bill. I will particularly refer to the following resolve of the Detroit Manufacturers' Association, adopted on the 30th of January, 1868:

Resolved, That Congress should now provide for the funding of that portion of the national debt not required for a circulating medium, by the issue of bonds or consols bearing interest not to exceed 3.65 per cent.; and the national money, (greenbacks,) at the option of the holder, should be convertible to such bonds at par, and the bonds should also be convertible to legal-tender notes at par on demand.

They all ask that the principle of interconversion of bonds and legal-tender notes may become the permanent fiscal system of the country. It is not inflation, because when the small notes are paid out the larger bonds are withdrawn; and if this system had been put in operation by the Forty-second Congress, the existing panic could not have visited and desolated our country.

The third section of the bill provides that the money received in exchange for the convertible bonds, after redeeming such as may be presented for payment, shall be used weekly in buying up the 6 per cent. obligations of the Government in open market. Who can object to this? Will it not tend slowly but gradually to transfer our interest-bearing debt from 6 per cent. to 3.65 per cent., the greater portion of which will be lodged in the hands of our own people instead of being transported to foreign countries to be forced back upon us at unpropitious times? If the objection be made that bonds bearing 3.65 cannot be floated at the present time, I have to say that, in view of our financial history since 1861, and the promptness exhibited by our people in taking the temporary-loan certificates, the 3 per cent. certificates, and other similar securities, and with my experience in business affairs for a quarter of a century, I am satisfied that at least $250,000,000 of the convertible bonds would be taken within twelve months, and the difference in interest—a clear saving to the Treasury—even on this amount would enable us to discontinue the stamps now required on bank-checks, druggists' goods, and matches, and the obnoxious, unprincipled, and chafing tax now levied on the leaf-tobacco produced by our farmers. The terms and conditions of a credit have much to do with its value, and the convertible bonds provided for in this bill would be more attractive to thousands and millions of our people than these 6 per cent. non-convertible bonds, on account of the value of the option of converting the same on demand into legal-tender notes. The people want this right, and for it they will lodge their money at a very low rate of interest. A national standard rate of interest as a regulator is thus secured. The rates for the usance of currency when required in moving the great crops of the South and West, and in all our manufacturing and other useful industries, cannot ever rise above the limit of its profitable employment. In short, working with the ease and simplicity of the governor on the steam-engine, a system will be inaugurated, doing good to all and injustice to none, a system which will prevent money-changers and Shylocks from extorting from useful industry a slice or shave for interest, in the past often exceeding the whole earnings of labor, thus cursing and blighting the efforts of toil, and effectually shackling the prosperity of the whole country. In providing, therefore, for the interchange of national bonds and currency the Government is benefited in lessening the interest on the public debt; and at the same time facilities are afforded the people for investing their earnings with a knowledge that they cannot possibly suffer loss. The scheme, therefore, commends itself as a financial reform of the highest importance to the Treasury. I call the attention of the House to the simplicity of the arrangement. There is no useless machinery. It can be plainly understood by every person, the interest being a penny a day on each one hundred dollars of the bonds; and on surrender of the bonds at any Government depository the principal, with the accrued interest, will be paid in legal-tender notes and the bond canceled. If only a part be required, then a new bond will be issued for the difference. In this respect the operation will be similar to the certificates of deposit now issued by the banks. When the certificates are presented for payment and paid they are canceled; when part paid a new certificate is issued for the difference and the old certificate surrendered. The notes of the Bank of England, you know, when once redeemed are never reissued.

Some persons may think that these convertible bonds will not be called for while 5 per cent. ten-year bonds are in the market, but I remind the House that a 3.65 convertible bond would in many cases be preferred, for the convenient conversion of the bonds to greenbacks whenever the necessity of the holder requires is a condition which gives them a greater value than those bearing a higher rate of interest but on long time. The temporary-loan certificates which were authorized by Congress in 1862 to the amount of $175,000,000 were all taken up by the people, although made payable on ten days' notice and at 4 per cent. and 5 per cent. interest. They were held until their surrender was demanded by the order of the Treasury. The 3 per cent. certificates authorized by Congress to the extent of $75,000,000 were also speedily taken and held by the people until their surrender was required; and in like manner the bonds bearing 3.65 as provided for in this bill will be promptly taken; and should the amount in the lapse of a few years be equal to the total amount of the 6 per cent. bonds now outstanding, I see no objection to the working of the measure; on the contrary, a grand fiscal success is achieved, for which a patriotic and intelligent people will be ever grateful to Congress. The British consols or "3 per cents" are owned by Englishmen, for the reason that certificates are not issued at all and the consols are not transferable except on the books of the chancellor of the exchequer at the Bank of England; so our convertible 3.65 bonds would be a domestic loan, and they would remain in the hands of the American people.

I now come to the last section of the bill, which provides that the national banks shall, on and after the 30th of June, 1874, cease to be banks of issue, and that their notes are to be withdrawn in the same manner as now provided by law for banks that are being wound up or choose to discontinue the issuing of bank-notes. I very much question the power of Congress to authorize private associations to issue notes to be used as money by the people; and at any rate it is, in my judgment, a bad bargain for the Government to hire banking associations to furnish money, paying them for the service the handsome sum of $18,000,000 per annum. The banks lodge the national credit in the shape of 6 per cent. bonds to secure their circulation, and which yield them no less than $18,000,000 interest in gold. Now, why should we not cut up this $300,000,000 of 6 per cent. bonds into small notes for circulation bearing no interest, and thus save $18,000,000 per annum? Take notice, it is the national credit for the same amount, but in a different shape; and by making the change we lessen the burden of the people, who will have that much of interest less to pay each year. The banks of course will cry out "inflation," and we must be prepared for that; but it is simply a "stop-thief" dodge. The fact is, our banks in issuing notes effect an actual inflation of credit, for on Government bonds of $1,000,000 they issue, say, another million in bank-notes, making $2,000,000 floating credit instead of $1,000,000. The credit of the Government, being less changeable in intrinsic value than any other thing, is good enough for our lawful money, and we do not require the aid or indorsement of banks in furnishing a circulating medium for the people. Congress has enacted that the credit of the nation should be money; it is our legal tender and lawful money for many purposes; it now requires the act of Congress to make our national greenback currency a legal tender for all purposes, and thus secure for the people a perfect instrument of exchange.

The bill provides for the issue of $5,000,000 of legal-tender notes, and such additional sums as may be required to carry into effect the provisions of the act. If legal-tender notes should be required at any time for the entire issue of convertible bonds, the Government would be benefited thereby to the extent of the interest, for while greenbacks are out no interest is required. My opinion is that $5,000,000 greenbacks would put in operation the financial reform contemplated by the bill and effect the floating of at least $250,000,000 of the convertible bonds within a single year. The views of General Spinner on this subject are so clear and philosophical that I am constrained to make the following quotation from his last annual report. He says:

> It is very probable that the present legally authorized amount of $400,000,000 of legal-tender notes need not be increased in order to carry out this scheme, and it is more than likely that under the then changed condition of the currency, with no tendency to go into wild projects and stock speculations, the minimum amount of $356,000,000 would, on account of its being readily obtained in exchange for the proposed stocks, be sufficient for the easy transaction of the legitimate business of the country at times when commercial wants shall need the largest amount. Should, however, the maximum of legal-tender notes authorized by law be found to be inadequate and insufficient to prevent the brigands and banditti who infest our money marts, and who at times conspire against the public weal by "lock-ups," making money scarce when most needed for business purposes, thereby robbing whole communities to enrich themselves, the Secretary of the Treasury might be authorized by law in such cases, or at any other time when the exigencies of the Treasury may require the same, to issue an additional limited amount of such convertible legal-tender notes in exchange for any United States 6 per cent. stocks.

At the close of the war of the rebellion the circulating medium, as I have shown, was largest, and private credits were very much less in vogue. The farmer and gardener prospered, the merchant sold his goods for cash or on short credit, the manufacturer found a ready sale for his products in exchange for greenbacks, and private credits of all kinds were less resorted to than at any other time in the history of our country. You know we then enjoyed prosperous times. Labor was in good demand and well paid; more work was done at that time, and consequently more wealth created, than at any former period in the history of our country. The cause for this prosperity is to be found in the fact that the tariff shielded our manufacturers and reserved to them the markets of the country, and we had a greater supply of currency than we ever had before or since; but Hugh McCulloch, in an evil hour, induced Congress to put on the screws of "contraction." Our money was wound up tight, and the prosperity of the country with it.

Now, experience has proven that where the public credit is used for such, purposes private credits, such as due-bills, shin-plasters, &c., for workingmen, are less employed, and to the manifest advantage and profit of the people.

It is of the highest importance to the prosperity of the country that Congress should furnish an adequate amount of the public credit for a circulating medium to facilitate the exchanges and settlements of a population of forty millions, and of the vast traffic and business of an active, enterprising, and industrious people, rapidly developing a continent, building up great cities, constructing railways through every State and Territory, and establishing industries of every variety and description, opening mines, digging canals, building churches and school-houses and universities, and adding to our population by immigration four hundred thousand per annum.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I will call your attention to the unhappy situation of our country. Our merchants are embarrassed and business of all kinds is stagnant and unprofitable. Workingmen in processions and mass meetings demand work or bread.

In this situation, Mr. Speaker, the people look to Congress for relief. Sir, will you disappoint them?

Believing that the adoption of the financial reform contemplated in the pending bill will be a great boon to the American people, and a substantial benefit to mankind, I have given much time to its consideration, with the sole purpose of accomplishing an object of vast common interest, involving the advancement and freedom of labor, and the general welfare and prosperity of my beloved country.

Mr. VANCE obtained the floor.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Before the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FIELD] takes his seat I would like to ask him a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee.) If the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] yields for that purpose the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] can proceed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think I understood the gentleman from Michigan to say that since 1865 the circulation of the country has been reduced to the extent of $1,300,000,000. If I correctly understood the gentleman, I would like him to state where he derives that information.

Mr. FIELD. I refer the gentleman to the official reports. The national circulation outstanding on the 1st of September, 1865, is shown by the official statement published at that time. The amount at that time, as I have stated, was over $2,000,000,000.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What do I understand the gentleman to mean by "circulation?"

Mr. FIELD. The gentleman can ascertain that by an examination of the remarks I have already submitted. I embrace in my statement all legal-tenders. I do not confine the estimate to the greenbacks, because the 5 per cent. legal-tenders were currency; the 4 per cent. legal-tenders were currency; so were the compound-interest notes, and other notes which the gentleman will find fully enumerated in my printed remarks. The gentleman will find that my statement is correct.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then the gentleman includes as circulation bonds as well as notes.

Mr. FIELD. I mean——

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman from Michigan will permit the remark, I understand him to mean simply whatever may be held by the banks as a reserve.

Mr. FIELD. I mean whatever was in circulation as currency. I do not embrace in my statement the five-twenties, or any other bonds of the Government.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. Speaker, having been unable to obtain the floor on the civil-rights bill, I propose to devote a portion of my time to the discussion of that subject; and I think I can do so without prejudice and without subjecting myself truthfully to the charge of hatred toward the colored race. In the will of my grandfather (who was one of those who struggled for liberty upon the heights of King's Mountain) he enjoined it upon his children and his grandchildren to treat kindly the colored people upon the plantation. I hope never to forget a sentiment so noble and so worthy of obedience. In fact, as a southern man, as one who has sympathized from my earliest time of knowledge with the South in all the great principles and struggles which have interested her, I have felt it my duty to advance in every laudable way the interests of the colored race in this country. I have even taught a colored Sunday-school of one hundred and fifty scholars. I have endeavored in every way possible to advance the interests of that race. I feel, therefore, that I can speak upon this subject without prejudice.

The charge has been made against the people of the South that their opposition to such measures as the civil-rights bill has arisen from prejudice and hatred. This charge is unfounded; it is untrue. Before the war—in the days past and gone—in the days when there were four million slaves in the South, the churches of the South sent missionaries into the cotton plantations, and down into the orange groves, and out upon the rolling prairies of Texas. Into all parts of the country where great numbers of colored people were collected the churches sent their missionaries, and held up there the standard of the Cross, instructing them in the sublime principles which relate to questions vastly more important than mere earthly things.

I have yet to meet the southern man (and I thank God for it) who does not in his heart rejoice that the colored man is free. In my intercourse with the people of my own land, in my travels through the "sunny South," I have found the feeling everywhere one of gratitude and thankfulness that the chains of the colored man have been broken; that he is now permitted to walk the earth a free man.

Sir, the people of the South were not to blame for the introduction of slavery among them. It came from elsewhere, and became incorporated as a part of our institutions. The old colored women nursed the white children of the South, while kindness and friendship were maintained between the two races. Such an institution could not be readily abolished. It could probably only be done by the shock of arms.

Every southern man who will call to mind the fact that after the thunder of artillery had ceased, when the clang of arms was no more heard in the country, the southern people rallied and took the oath to support the proclamations of Mr. Lincoln, in order that the colored man might be free. Those proclamations, Mr. Speaker, were regarded at the time as unconstitutional; yet the southern people were willing that the colored man should enjoy his freedom, and all over the South they came forward and took the oath to support those proclamations.

Following hard upon that, the conventions of the Southern States assembled, and by a solemn act ratified the freedom of the colored man, confirming it forever by statute upon the records of their governments.

What else did they do? They went to work and secured the colored man in all his civil rights, or what may properly be termed civil rights. The people there consented that he should vote; they consented he should hold office; they consented he should serve upon juries; they consented that he should hold property, and that he should be a witness in court. All the real rights properly known as civil rights were guaranteed to the colored man in that section; and the charge cannot justly be made against this people that they are opposed to according civil rights to the colored man on account of any prejudice or hatred, for it is not in their hearts.

Why, then, do we oppose the civil-rights bill? That is the question; and speaking as I do, and feeling as I speak, without prejudice, I will show what is the real objection to the bill known as the civil-rights bill. I think gentlemen of the House will bear me out when I say the title of the bill we had before us ought to be changed, and made to read thus: "A bill to protect the colored people in their social rights." That is the way it should read.

Now, Mr. Speaker the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] laid down the law, and it has not been controverted, that all men are entitled under the law to the right to go to a hotel, to ride in a public railway carriage, to interment, and to be taught in the public schools sustained by moneys raised by taxation.

It is laid down as the common law of the land. Now, let us see for a few minutes, Mr. Speaker, how the case stands. There is no railway car in all the South which the colored man cannot ride in. That is his civil right. This bill proposes that he should have the opportunity or the right to go into a first-class car and sit with white gentlemen and white ladies. I submit if that is not a social right. There is a distinction between the two. Now, there is not a hotel in the South where the colored man cannot get entertainment such as food and lodgings. That is his civil right. The bill of the committee provides that there shall be no distinction. Even if he is allowed to go into the dining-room, and is placed at a separate table because of his color, it will be a violation of this law. Placing him, therefore, at the same table with the whites is a social right.

Now, sir, provision has been made for free schools in my own native State of North Carolina. We have cheerfully taxed ourselves there for the education of our people, including the colored race; but separate schools are organized for the instruction of the latter. One of the civil rights of the colored man undoubtedly is the right to be educated out of moneys raised by taxation. His children, under the law, have that right; but this bill goes further, and provides that colored children shall go into the same school with white children, mixing the colored children and the white children in the same schools. I submit to the House whether that is not a social right instead of a civil right. Therefore it is I say this bill ought to be changed, or rather its title ought to be changed. The real objection, then, to civil rights, so called, is that it is not best for both races; that in fact it will be detrimental to the interests of both races.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I propose to show briefly how that will be. In the first place, the true policy in regard to the intercourse of mankind all over this broad earth is in the recognition of the fact that such intercourse is one made up of mutual interests. It is the interest of the hotel-keeper to entertain his guests, it is the interest of the railway company to transport passengers; the interests are mutual; and that is the true policy all the world over. But whenever you undertake to force persons of color into their social rights, then, in my judgment, you have done the colored man a serious damage. Let the people of the South alone, sir, and this thing will adjust itself. It will come out all right. In coming to this city the other day colored men were sitting in first-class cars with their wives, where they were admitted by the managers of the road; and I am told in this city one of the first hotels admits colored men as guests. It will adjust itself if let alone; but if you undertake to coerce society before it is ready, you will damage the colored man in all his interests, and at the same time do damage to the white race.

There are between four and five millions of colored people in the South, whose interests are intimately and closely connected with those of the white people. The one cannot well do without the other. Where does the colored man get his place to live, where does he obtain employment? In a great measure from the white men of the country, and almost entirely from those opposed to this bill. And I tell the House now, through you, Mr. Speaker, that the great majority of the people of the Southern States, of all political shades of opinion, are opposed to anything like force in this matter.

Look at my own State, sir. As I went home from the capital during the holidays I met with republican members of the Legislature of North Carolina who stated that we ought to oppose this bill. Republicans do not want it. They think it is wrong. A resolution was introduced into the Legislature of North Carolina in regard to this subject, and it received a very small vote. It did not receive the vote of the republican party. And, sir, it is my opinion that the colored people of the South en masse do not want it. They do not want to be brought into apparent antagonism to the white people, because their interests are closely connected together. The colored man cannot do well in the South, he cannot prosper, unless he has the sympathies, unless he has the fostering hand, unless he has the kind care, of the white man extended to him; his interests will suffer if this should not be the case.

And, sir, it is necessary anyhow in this world of ours that there should be kindness running from heart to heart. There has been enough trouble and enough sorrow in this world already. War has stamped its foot upon human sympathies. It has left its scars upon every human heart, sir; and now there ought to be sympathy, there ought to be kindness, there ought to be oneness of interest pervading the whole land. And these people need that thing. You rob the colored man by the passage of this bill more or less of the friendship of the owners of the soil in the South. And you rob him, sir, of the opportunity of education. Gentlemen may treat this statement lightly. The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] said the other day that he would not act under a threat. He regarded the declaration made here that the schools would be broken up as a threat. It was not a threat, sir, it is a solemn fact.

I ask the attention of the House to this fact: the University of South Carolina was one of the most honored in all the land. That university has turned out some of the most eminent men of this country—Presidents, Senators, governors, and distinguished military chieftains. Where, sir, is it now? In what condition is the University of South Carolina? A law was passed in South Carolina that colored students should be received into that institution. What has been the effect? Some time since there were only from six to nine scholars in the University of South Carolina; while the professors are paid out of moneys raised from the people by taxation. This is no threat, sir. It is a plain, simple truth, that in passing bills of this kind and having mixed schools you destroy the school system of the South. That is to be the effect; and you thereby lessen the chances of the colored children for an education.

There is another point to which I ask the attention of the House. A bill like this gives rise to an antagonism of races. If the people are let alone in the South they will adjust these things and there will be peace in the country. But by passing a bill of this kind you place a dangerous power in the hands of the vicious. Here comes a vicious colored man and presents himself at a hotel and demands that he be permitted to go to the table with the whites, and that he shall have his choice of rooms. The hotel-keeper, acting upon his right as he understands it, handed down from all ages, that "every man's house is his castle;" that no man can come into his house without his consent, recognizing that as being the old Anglo-Saxon law of our ancestors, may refuse. Then you have it placed in the power of this man to have the hotel-keeper arrested, tried, and fined a sum not less than $100 nor more than $5,000. And that, sir, would be placing a dangerous power in the hands of the vicious.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, will, more or less, bring about an antagonism of the races; and that state of things would not be best for the colored man. I submit it in good faith, that if the question is ever presented in the South, shall this country be ruled by white men or ruled by colored men? the colored man is not able to stand any such an antagonism as that; he will necessarily, sir, go down. I ask what race has ever been able to stand before the Caucasian? Look at the history of the world. Where is the Indian? Why, sir, less than two centuries ago on this spot the Indian reared his wigwam and stood upon these hills and looked upon the broad, beautiful Potomac, or his eye swept over the hunting grounds of the West; and he had the title to this magnificent country. Where is he now? He has gone back, step by step, before the advancing march of the white man. No race, sir, in the world has been able to stand before the pure Caucasian. An antagonism of races will not be good for the colored man.

There is another objection to this bill. It begets hopes and raises an ambition in the minds of the colored man that can never be realized. It is true, sir, that we can find some ten or twelve members of Congress here from densely-populated regions of the South where the colored race is dominant. But how is it in other States? Where is the colored man from Massachusetts? Is he here? Where is even Fred Douglass, who is acknowledged to be a man of ability? Is he here? No, sir; he has not found his way into this House. This bill, therefore, as I have said, begets in the minds of these people hopes and an ambition that can never be realized; and in that view of the case it is unfortunate for them. And I say, sir, that it is not for the best interest of the white race that this bill should pass. And why? Because if the common schools are to be destroyed, which are beneficial to the colored man, their destruction will also be against the interests of the whites, and the poor white children of the South will fail to receive those educational advantages which they ought to have; and in that respect it will not be best for the white race.

Another view of this question, Mr. Speaker, is this: that by placing the colored race and the white race continually together, by throwing them into social contact, the result will be more or less that the distinction between them will be broken down, and that miscegenation and an admixture of the races will follow. Sir, it must necessarily follow on such close intercommunication. I presume that no man will stand upon this floor and say that it is best for all the races of men on the face of the earth to become one by amalgamation.

Let us look for a moment and see how it is. We are told that colored men have not succeeded in this country because they had been borne down by chains and slavery. I admit, sir, that the colored man when in a state of servitude had not much opportunity to develop his mind and expand the powers that God has given him; but will any gentleman on this floor undertake to say that the colored race has not had an equal chance in the world with the white race? I suppose no man will controvert the theory that colored men were at the tower of Babel, and that when God confounded the languages of men and sent them forth into the world the colored race was among them. Some went one way and some went another. Some went north and some south, some east and some west; they went into all portions of the world. Well, sir, what has been the history of the Caucasian race? It has gone on progressing; it has whitened every ocean on the globe with the sails of commerce; it has reared monuments which will be everlasting; it has stamped its language on the world—the strong German, the elegant French, the soft Italian, and the ever-living and ever-spoken English. What language has the colored man given to the world? He started on an equal footing with the white race—what has he done? Look at Africa. There she is, bowed down by superstition and under the shadow of death.

Sir, it is absurd for gentlemen to talk about the equality of the races. But let us give to the colored man the opportunity of improvement; let us give him an education. I for one will vote cheerfully and gladly for the appropriation of a portion of the proceeds of the splendid domain of this country for the education of the colored race; but I think it ought to be done in separate schools. Sir, we have already given him the opportunity to be educated; we have allowed him to hold office; we have seen and heard colored men on this floor; they are here now.

The bill ought not to pass; the matter ought to be left to the States. I will not undertake to argue the constitutionality of this question; that has been done by others, and well done. I have only spoken to the effect of the passage of such a measure, and what is best for the interests of both races; and I submit in concluding my remarks that we have really extended to the colored man everything that I think he ought to ask at our hands. If I belonged to the colored race I would not stand here and ask the passage of a law to force me into what are termed my civil rights. If I belonged to the colored race I would come up by my own merit. I would wait for time and opportunity, and I would not ask any help from Congress. I would not stand here as a beggar asking for these social rights; I would depend on my own merits. Sir, it reminds me of an anecdote that I heard up in the mountains of my own district which illustrates this point. There was a camp-meeting up there, and it was a very good time, and there were a great many shouting. The presiding elder went up to an old colored man and said to him, "Shout on, brother; shout on, if you feel like it; we shall all be white in heaven." The old fellow replied, "Bless the Lord, I feel the white coming now." [Laughter.] Now the rights of the colored man are coming on, and if he will place himself in a proper attitude he will secure them.

I hope if the bill is to pass that the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHITE] will be adopted, leaving it to the school districts or townships to decide whether they will have mixed schools or not.

I thank the House for its attention.

Mr. RAINEY. Before the gentleman sits down I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. VANCE. Certainly.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman has just said that if he was a colored man he would not ask Congress to pass the civil-rights bill, which has for its object the removal of the disabilities imposed upon us by prejudice. I ask him what he thinks of those Southerners who ask Congress to remove from them their political disabilities on account of their action toward this Government?

Mr. VANCE. I might have expected something of that kind. I find that everywhere men are disposed to bring up the horrid skeleton of the war. Wherever a southern man goes he is almost sure to be confronted with the fact that he was a rebel, if you please; yes, sir, a rebel. I say it was right for the Congress of the United States to remove the disabilities of those men, and place them on an equality with others before the law. We have now been placed equal before the law. The colored man is placed equal before the law. I ask gentlemen why it is that the war is always flaunted in our faces? The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] the member from South Carolina, [Mr. ELLIOTT,] and the one just now questioning me, are all anxious, it seems, to bring up the troubles of the war. We do not want to deal with the dead past. Let the dead past bury its dead. Let the war be gone. No southern man is ashamed, thank God, to stand here and say that he did what he thought was right. No, sir. God Almighty has not branded the mark of Cain upon the brow of the southern man. He stood with his own sunny South; he stood with his own land; he stood with his own brethren and kindred. And, sir, at Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge, in the Wilderness, at Spottsylvania, and at Petersburgh, everywhere, the bones of my kindred and my countrymen lie in their narrow graves, wrapped in their bloody blankets, because of what they conceived and believed to be the best interests of human rights in this country of ours. Thank God, I am not ashamed of it; and I will not go back upon their memory.

Mr. FORT. Will the gentleman answer me a question?

Mr. VANCE. I will.

Mr. FORT. Does the gentleman still think that rebellion was right?

Mr. VANCE. Under the circumstances, yes; that is, place us back as we were, with the same surroundings.

Mr. FORT. I was going to ask you if you would do it again.

Mr. VANCE. Do not misunderstand me. I say, under the same circumstances. But they can never come up again. Secession is settled forever. No one wants or ever expects it to be revived. Now I will ask you a question. Would you not have done as we did if you had been there with us?

Mr. FORT. I think not. I cannot think of any circumstance that would induce me to raise my hand against my Government.

Mr. VANCE. I want to say this only: I have sworn with this right hand of mine to support the Constitution of the United States of America, and I intend to do so to the best of my ability.

When General Lee surrendered at Appomattox there was beheld the most sublime sight this world ever saw.

Mr. FORT. I want to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. VANCE. Wait until I get through.

I say a more sublime sight never was seen than after the surrender of General Lee, with his ragged boys, and eight thousand muskets, at Appomattox. These men went home, resumed their labors in the field and elsewhere, and all over that land there was a generous outburst of sympathy for the return to the Government of their fathers and the old flag they had loved in the days past and gone.

Sir, I stand here to-day to defend the people of the South. They are true to this Government. But I would draw this line; it is that loyalty, as men choose to call it, does not, thank God, consist in devotion to a party. What is it? It is a true allegiance to the Constitution of our fathers. Gentlemen, we have rallied around that sacred instrument. Under it we propose to discuss questions and to dischargeour duties.

But I was going on to remark that when these men returned from Appomattox, there was a universal sentiment of good will and love springing up in their hearts. But what was the result? Instead of love and kindness we were met with disabilities and reconstruction. I could point gentlemen, if I had time, to the history of Russia. I wish I had here now a book called the Life of Catherine the Great. There was a revolution in Russia, and one hundred thousand lives were lost before it was quelled. What did they do? Did every stump-speaker throughout the land discuss the rebellion? No, sir; they did not do that. What did they do in Russia? They passed a law that no man should even allude to the rebellion. I commend this fact in history to the consideration of gentlemen.

And I say now the war has been over for these many years—how many I can hardly tell—and yet southern men are all the time confronted with this thing. Very well; if it is necessary for gentlemen to get up here and rake up this grinning skeleton, and to uncover the wounds of the war, in order to support a failing cause, let them do it.

I, for one, stand here under the broad flag of my country. Gentlemen may say what they will, but I am true to it; and I stand here to say that my position is for peace and fraternity.

We desire to meet our brethren of the North cordially, and to shake with them the hand of friendship. When that old philosopher, Greeley, said that he would shake hands with us across the bloody chasm, we looked and saw his hand with no weapon in it; and then the South rushed forward to the opening of the chasm with a desire to extend the hand across it and grasp the philosopher in that embrace, which we thought was right under the Constitution.

Mr. FORT. Will the gentleman answer me another question before he takes his seat?

Mr. VANCE. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WHITEHEAD.]

Mr. FORT. I desire to ask the gentleman from North Carolina——

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I hope this will not be taken from my time. I am not going to speak on the war. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORT. The gentleman from North Carolina, I believe——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. VANCE. I leave it with my friend from Virginia whether I shall do so. He can dispose of his time as he pleases.

Mr. FORT. I understood the gentleman from North Carolina to say that he had sworn to support the Constitution——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] cannot proceed unless it be taken from the time of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I do not yield, because I do not want this discussion of the late war to proceed further. I propose to discuss the proposition for increased taxation on the production of tobacco.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia declines to yield.

Mr. FORT. Has that gentleman the floor?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. FORT. Then I wish to state that, at a proper time, I wish to ask the gentleman from North Carolina another question.

Mr. VANCE. I am willing the gentleman should ask his question if my friend from Virginia will yield the time.

Mr. FORT. I hope it will not be taken out of the time of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I never was discourteous, either on the battlefield or anywhere else; but I do not see that any good is to come from fighting over what was settled eight years ago to my entire satisfaction. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORT. We do not wish to fight the war over; but we wish to understand the position of the gentleman from North Carolina. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will yield for my question.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I will yield if you will give me about three minutes' additional time afterward.

Several MEMBERS. We will do that.

Mr. FORT. We are very forbearing and generous on this side of the House, and no doubt the gentleman from Virginia can have his time extended if necessary. Let me now put my question to the gentleman from North Carolina. He says that he has sworn to support the Constitution and the Government. Now I wish to know whether the leading men who engaged in the rebellion had not taken such an oath before they tried to overthrow the Government.

Mr. VANCE. Certainly. That question amounts to nothing. Everybody knows that leading men of the South had taken such an oath; and everybody knows that, after their States seceded, the oath was not considered binding, when the persons who had taken it were acting in another capacity. But it is not worth while to undertake to argue that matter.

Mr. FORT. I do not wish to argue it; but I wish to ask the gentleman another question. He states with much flow of language that, coming now into this Hall, he has again sworn to support the Constitution and the Government, and he vaunts his love for the flag. Yet he says that under like circumstances he would join in secession again. Now, I wish to ask him whether he would consider that perjury or not?

Mr. VANCE. Not. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORT. Then how much more is the second oath worth than the first? If the oath the gentleman has taken be worth anything, is not its violation perjury? I want an answer to this question. The gentleman from Virginia need not be so nervous about his time. If he wants time I presume he can have all he asks for.

Mr. VANCE. I submit that I did not bring up this discussion. I was going on to argue the civil-rights bill when I was interrupted. I have determined to be as polite as any other living man; and when the member from South Carolina [Mr. RAINEY] asked me a question I was disposed to answer it civilly. I did not bring on this discussion; but I say that I am not ashamed of what I did in the late war. I acted conscientiously in the sight of God; and I say that under similar circumstances I would do the same again. But I say to the gentleman that I hope such circumstances will never arise again.

Mr. FORT. I hope so, too.

Mr. VANCE. I do not believe they ever will.

A MEMBER. They never can.

Mr. VANCE. No, they never can; and that settles the question for all time. Now, I say to the gentleman that if he will come to my room, 608 M street, I shall be happy to talk over this matter with him; or, if he will come down into North Carolina among the "tarheels," I shall gladly discuss the matter with him. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORT. I hope the gentleman does not mean to insinuate a challenge.

Mr. VANCE. O, no!

Mr. FORT. For if so, I shall have to decline, because my State by law forbids me to engage in a duel.

TAXATION ON TOBACCO, ETC.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped "this cruel war was over." [Laughter.] I propose to submit some remarks upon the proposition now before the Committee on Ways and Means to impose additional taxation upon the production of tobacco and other products of my State. I am more interested in this question than in any military matters. I do not see that any good is to come from a discussion here upon what occurred before the surrender at Appomattox. I take it for granted that others who, like myself, surrendered at that time intend to support the Government as good citizens; or at least, like "Miss Nancy Jane" in the song, we want to "try and do the best we can." [Laughter.]

I ask attention to the consideration of the proposition of the Secretary of the Treasury that increased taxation be raised, in part, by an increase of four cents a pound in the tax upon tobacco, and by an increase of taxation on brandy, whisky, sugar, and coffee. In this subject I am vitally interested. I am not speaking for "buncombe;" I am not speaking specially to have my remarks printed; I desire the attention of members of the House to what I shall say, because my State is particularly interested in this subject. We raise better tobacco than is raised anywhere else on the face of the earth. By this system of taxation we are subjected to annoyances and oppression. The laboring man and the land-holder of my State are directly injured by the present internal-revenue system. I think I can show this to the satisfaction of any man who knows anything about this subject, and I think to the satisfaction of a great many here who in times past have seemed to know nothing about it.

Now, sir, the present tax on tobacco is twenty cents a pound upon the manufactured article. It is one-half of 1 per cent. upon tobacco in the hands of the planter, which is taken out of his pocket before he draws his money, by the operation of this internal-revenue system. Take the impoverished State of Virginia. When we came out of the war we had nothing but our bare land, and were laborers who worked it. That State has paid, even in its impoverished condition, millions of dollars out of the pockets of our people every year because of this unjust internal-revenue tax on tobacco. We paid in 1873, from a State well known to members of this House, if they paid any attention to the subject at all, to have been by war left destitute in its resources, $7,353,000 of internal-revenue tax. There are States which by the operation of the war made money, and which have never yet been oppressed until at this day, when the cry of a financial crisis is heard throughout the land, and then they come here, through their Representatives, demanding that Congress shall impose additional taxation upon us who have already been taxed again and again. Take Vermont, for instance, and it pays the miserable sum of $78,000 of internal-revenue tax. Maine pays only $214,000 of internal revenue. And while this is so, the proposition of the Secretary of the Treasury is not to impose any tax upon these States, which have not been affected by this internal-revenue taxation as we have been—not to go upon the incomes of the millionaires in those States, who have not been affected—not to increase the tariff, which might perhaps affect the North more than it would us; but the proposition of the Secretary of the Treasury is to impose still further taxation upon us in the South who are engaged in the raising of tobacco.

The internal revenue derived by the United States from tobacco in 1873 was $34,365,629, of which the State of Virginia paid $6,470,684; one-fifth of the whole revenue derived from the whole tobacco tax raised in the United States.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Let me ask the gentleman from Virginia whether the people out West who chew tobacco, and the people of Vermont who chew tobacco, do not really pay the tax which is imposed upon it?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. That is a mistake you everlastingly fall into, and which seems to satisfy your conscience; you suppose the tobacco tax is really paid by you of the West and North, when in reality it is paid by the tobacco-growers of the South.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Is not the tax paid by those who consume the tobacco?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I am going to argue out that point to the fullest extent; I will show how it is in my own State. I will show to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE,] who I know is friendly and will help us if he can do so conscientiously on this subject, there is a tax, and not a small one, which the farmer pays absolutely. In the city of Lynchburgh and in the city of Richmond, in the State of Virginia, there are, every summer, buyers of tobacco from Canada. The effect of this internal-revenue law has been to drive the manufacture of tobacco into Canada, and a great deal of the manufactured article I believe is smuggled across the line into Michigan, thereby underselling the men who manufacture tobacco in this country. In Canada there is no tax upon tobacco, nor upon the sugar, licorice, or rum which enters into its manufacture; there is entire exemption in favor of tobacco by the laws. These men from Canada come into our State every summer and buy tobacco for the purpose of shipping it to Canada for manufacture. One-half of 1 per cent. is deducted as internal-revenue tax when the bills are made out, and that tax is paid by the farmer who raises the tobacco, and not by the buyer in Canada, who purchases it for shipment. The Canadian manufacturer carries it to Canada without taxes. The result is that the Canadian manufacturer has, in effect, driven us from the markets of Mexico, and of the West Indies, and almost everywhere else in the world.

And more than that. You think the tax of twenty cents a pound upon chewing-tobacco, and upon the famous brands of smoking-tobacco, is paid by those who chew and smoke in Vermont and Iowa. I will show you that such is not the case. You do not pay it. The fact can be shown by proof, if necessary, that you do not pay one cent more for tobacco now than you paid for the best tobacco before the war. You do not pay for the best chewing-tobacco, what we call "plug-tobacco," and I believe you call "cavendish," more than you did before the war, or for the best brands of smoking-tobacco, "Lone Jack," "Brown Dick," and "Highlander." You do not pay for any of them more now than you did before the war. Who, then, pays the twenty cents per pound tax upon this tobacco, when we know it brings no more now than when there was no tax imposed upon it? How is that tax paid?

Now I think I will show you, sir. This list of sales in the cities in my State will show that before the war the price of fine fillers, which I may state, if you do not understand the operation, make the interior of plug, and of fine wrappers, which make on its outside the beautiful yellow color which you see on the tobacco—the price of those tobaccos now in our markets is from 50 to 100 per cent. less than it was before the war; while the prices of shipping tobacco, the coarse, heavy tobacco of Missouri and Kentucky, and made only on the richer lands of our State, are higher than before the war, because it is never manufactured and never pays the tax of twenty cents, but only pays the tax of one-half of 1 per cent., which the dealer in tobacco takes out of it; and that is all it pays when shipped to England; so that there is a discrimination in favor of foreign markets against the peculiar tobacco of Virginia and North Carolina—the fine chewing and smoking tobacco. Now, it is to the interest of my people, as well as to the interest of the people of North Carolina, to make this fine tobacco. But we cannot make it, because it takes more care, more attention, and more capital; and, therefore, it cannot be made, when bringing less in price, in competition with heavier shipping tobaccos, which require less attention, and they are ceasing to make this finer tobacco in my country. That is being driven from the country by this law, and we are making the coarser tobacco, coming into competition with our friends in Kentucky and Missouri, and reducing the price of all.

How does it operate? A planter comes into market to sell his tobacco. He has the tobacco suitable for the fine kinds of chewing and smoking. The manufacturer has to pay twenty dollars per hundred-weight, for it is estimated by the hundred-weight in my country, not by the pound; he has to pay the tax of five dollars as a buyer; he has to pay at least $2.50 per hundred-weight to make the boxes to receive the peculiar stamp which is necessary in order that the Government may not be cheated; and that is twenty-seven and a half cents per pound. Then he has to pay nine cents on his licorice, and the tariff on rum, sugar, and other ingredients. All that has to come out before that tobacco is put upon the market, besides the cost of manufacturing. And then if he should get as high a price as he expects, he must guarantee himself in the event of the tobacco spoiling by an accident—he must make himself his own insurer—and he does that by "backing" the price on the farmer. And there is a tacit agreement among all the manufacturers that they will not give beyond so much for a certain class of fillers and a certain class of wrappers; so that the farmer has the price of that kind of tobacco reduced. I have seen cases where the man has got fourteen dollars per hundred-weight for the class of tobacco for which he got nine dollars before the war, and cases where a man has got only fifteen dollars for fine tobacco for which he got forty-five dollars before the war.

Now, if that is not an objection to this whole system as far as the producer is concerned, I will add this to it. At any rate, whether the producer is thus made to pay the whole of the tax or not, it is divided between him and the consumer. But the manufacturer in no case intends to lose any of it, because he quits the business before he becomes a loser, so that when there is a division of the extra cost between the consumer and producer, every one knows that it is easier to cut down the price of an article when it is thrown upon the market by the farmer, who finds it necessary to sell, than it is to raise the price in the market after it is given out to the consumer.

Now, there is another objection to this law. There is a general objection—and every man who pretends to be a statesman knows it—there is a general objection to that system of taxation by means of espionage which invades every man's house, which sets a gauger to watch every distillery, and a detective to watch every tobacco manufacturer. Such a system renders the Government and the law offensive to the people, offensive to their ideas of liberty and to their general ideas of the treatment which should be given to the people by an honest government. It is a costly system also, and all its costliness, be it remembered, comes out of the pockets of the producer in the end.

I believe it was reported in Congress a year or two ago that one-fourth of the internal revenue was "lost" in the collection. I would not put it exactly in that way. I would spell the word "s-t-o-l-e-n." One-fourth of the internal revenue lost in the collection! Lost wheer? Lost precisely where this law is offensive—among the host of officers sent to watch the tobacco-houses of the men who make the tobacco.

Now all these taxes, as I have said, are offensive to the people; and while I do not come from a country that has spoken very strongly in favor of tariff, I beg to say that I would go for a tariff or anything else to abolish this law which operates burdensomely upon the people and to the injury of the standing of the Government among the simple people of the country, who find themselves harassed by officers, and in many instances taken and carried before courts at great expense on account of mere mistakes in the entries. I know of one case in my country where an honest old Tunker, one of the people known as Mennonites, who had never intended to do anything wrong in his life, left the stamp on his boxes. The Government had said that after the tobacco was sold the producer should destroy the stamp or be liable to a fine of $500 or to be put in the penitentiary. The man I speak of, not having seen that regulation, thought he would show his fidelity to the United States Government and his own honesty by leaving the stamp on the boxes, which he considered would show every one that he paid the Government its taxes, and acted on the principle of Mr. Wesley's doctrines that a man could not get to heaven who had cheated the Government out of its revenue. Well, a revenue officer went and told him that he had violated the law. He was very much astonished and said that he could not possibly have done it. The officer told him that he had, for he had left an uncanceled stamp upon the box. The old fellow replied that he had left it there expressly to show that he had paid the tax. He was indicted, and it cost him $200 or more to get out of the difficulty.

Now this law is not popular down my way where tobacco is grown and brandy made. It is not our fault, but the fault of those who made the law. The question is, who pays the tax, the consumer or the producer? Who paid the tax on cotton that you had here? There was a tax of five cents on cotton; why was it taken off? It was taken off simply for the selfish reason that you of the majority manufactured the whole of the cotton. Why was the income tax taken off? We raised, in 1867, $52,000,000 from that source, more than enough to supply the deficiency of which the Secretary of the Treasury now complains. In 1868 we raised $32,000,000, and in 1869 $34,700,000, from the same source. Why was that tax taken off? You took it off because you were paying it, and we were too poor to have any incomes on which to pay taxes. I wish to meet this question fairly and honestly; but this enormous amount of taxation is to be raised out of the black and white labor of my State and others which raise tobacco. If it is a luxury to you or to me to roll under our tongues the sweet morsel, it is no luxury to the hard-fisted man who makes it up in the mountains of my district. If it is a luxury, you must satisfy me that this tax comes from the consumer and not from the producer. The amount produced is less than in 1860, and yet the price is less.

Now, there is a reason why my State and the State of North Carolina are particularly interested in this subject. Missouri is very little interested in it. She makes a large, strong, coarse tobacco, that is shipped to Europe, but there are only two counties in which she makes fine tobacco. Limestone land will not make fine chewing-tobacco. That is a chemical and agricultural fact. You may put licorice in it, and rum, and weak brandy, and make it look like good chewing-tobacco, but it will be of the Navy sort. They made such tobacco in the North during the war. Our men, during the war, when on picket duty, used to swop genuine tobacco for genuine coffee, for we had been drinking coffee made out of grain, and the enemy had been chewing tobacco made out of the devil only knows what. [Laughter.] Why, sir, Massachusetts turned up a tobacco State during the war, and Connecticut went to raising tobacco, and Ohio manufactured a chewing-tobacco; and, sir, it would knock the horns off a bull to chew it. [Laughter.] I admit that you have got to making a considerable quantity of tobacco up that way, but you never can make tobacco that a gentleman will chew. You can only raise that kind of tobacco on the slopes of the Blue Ridge in Virginia and North Carolina.

Mr. CROSSLAND. I hope the gentleman will include Ballard County, Kentucky.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Is that a mountain county?

Mr. CROSSLAND. It is.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Then, I think, may be you may raise a little of it there; but I tell you, sirs, in all seriousness that the tax upon this sort of tobacco amounts to a direct tax upon the maker of it, and the result in my State is, that the cultivation of this kind of tobacco is being driven out and giving way to the cultivation of a coarse tobacco which has to be doctored and fixed up before any man can chew it.

Sir, I claim to be tolerably loyal, and I do not object to my State paying its share of taxes to the United States Government, although I do wish that some financial gentleman here would invent some scheme to raise the money in another way; but my State complains of this tax, because it is an unjust one. It has not complained of paying a fair proportion of the taxes necessary to support the Government; it has not raised any row here about salaries; it has not made any mock professions of honesty and economy; but we have paid more than we ought to have paid, and we never knew how to make anything out of the Government. To be sure we dodged the reconstruction laws, borrowed a governor, and are here to-day as well off as any of you. I am not going to war upon this subject with my friend opposite from Illinois, [Mr. FORT,] but I want a fair chance in this matter. If you want to tax agricultural products, tax cotton and wheat and tobacco and other products alike, and give all a fair chance.

But if you intend to tax tobacco and not corn, I would like some gentleman to show me the religious reason for doing so. [Laughter.] If you want to tax brandy, I will tell you what is done in my State. I saw last fall an orchard with apples——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MELLISH obtained the floor.

Several MEMBERS. Let the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WHITEHEAD] go on.

Mr. BURCHARD. I move that the time of the gentleman from Virginia be extended if he desires it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For how long?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I will not take more than three minutes to round up on apples. [Laughter.]

Several MEMBERS. Give him five.

Mr. BURCHARD. I move that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

There being no objection, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I want to say a word on this brandy tax. We are not interested much in whisky. Of fourteen hundred and twenty-one distilleries in Virginia, only twenty-one make whisky, and I think they must be run by western men. Virginians know how to make brandy, but I do not believe they know much about making whisky, except one or two celebrated brands in Judge HARRIS's district.

The fear of being involved in trouble with the internal-revenue officers, and the uncertainty in regard to the tax, has had the effect, in places far distant from railroads, to stop almost entirely the process of distilling. Men have been dragged great distances to answer before the courts for an unintentional and innocent violation of the revenue laws in regard to distilling. One old man, who moved a keg of liquor a few hundred yards before it had been stamped, had to pay about $300 in consequence of being brought up to answer for violating that provision of the law which forbids the removal of distilled spirits from the place of distilling before stamping. That is a specimen of the troubles growing out of this law. A distinguished friend of mine in Virginia was made a wholesale liquor dealer without his knowledge or consent by an internal-revenue officer. [Laughter.] He did not know it at the time, nor understand how it was done.

The result of our internal-revenue system has been a real oppression to the people. Orchards have been left standing, and the fruit unsold. In a fine orchard in my section where at Christmas time thousands of bushels of apples were lying upon the ground more than six inches deep, the apples were offered at six and a quarter cents a bushel, with nobody to buy them. That statement sounds very much as if it might be put in an almanac, [laughter;] but it is the truth. This condition of things operates very unjustly to two important interests in our State, the interest of the land-holder and of him who works the land. We in our State have very little besides land; but we have as good land as any of you ever saw.

A MEMBER. Where?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. In Virginia. [Laughter.] The man who asked that question ought to have known the answer before asking it.

The result of this system of taxation upon brandy has been that in the county of Southampton, which formerly produced $60,000 of fruit every year, the production has been curtailed two-thirds. All over the State the produce of the orchard has been reduced, so that shortly after the war it was not one-fourth what it had been. We are doing a little better now, because the tax has been reduced to fifty cents. But, sir, if the tax were taken off altogether, we would cease to compete with the West, and under certain circumstances would cease to compete with any one, in regard to grain and meat, and would turn our attention wholly to the fine classes of tobacco and fruits. This would be an advantage to all sections of the country. It is desirable that our people should see that when they labor in the manufacture of tobacco and the production of fruit, they are not alone to be taxed upon the invitation of the Secretary of the Treasury, while cotton, wheat, cattle, and every agricultural product of other sections is allowed to go free. We alone ought not to be annoyed by the internal-revenue officers; we alone ought not to pay taxes on our agricultural products, or gentlemen had better look out for the grangers.

As I have already said, I do not make these remarks for "buncombe," and not particularly to have them printed. I have desired to address the House in advance of the action of the Committee on Ways and Means. I hope for an opportunity hereafter to put before that committee more fully the facts and the figures, with statements from men who understand this subject, showing that we have been improperly treated in this matter.

[Here the hammer fell.]

MONEY OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. MELLISH. Mr. Speaker, I congratulate myself that I speak before an audience not overpowering in numbers, for I have neither the gift nor the habit of oratory. Indeed, those who know my antecedents anterior to the time I was assistant appraiser at New York, will remember that my place has been with the short-hand reporters—that I have been in the habit, to be sure, of taking but not of making speeches—and therefore it would not be at all strange if, in such a transition, such a complete somersault, as it were, I should fail to make a taking speech. But I will not stop for further apology, except to say that I regret want of time has prevented the arrangement in my mind as I desired of the ideas I shall attempt to present.

The vast number of documents received from all parts of the country on finance indicate a wide-spread and deep interest in the subject at the present time. I purpose to offer some views in reference to the bill (H. R. 1014) "to provide the money of the United States and to regulate the value thereof," which I had the honor to present on Wednesday last. As it will take some time to read it, I would respectfully request that it be here inserted in the printed report. It is as follows:

A bill to provide the money of the United States, and to regulate the value thereof.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the 1st day of July, 1874, each and every national banking association may determine for itself the amount of lawful money of the United States that it will keep on hand; but every association shall, on demand, redeem its circulating notes at such localities as are now, or may hereafter be, designated by law, either in coin or in United States legal-tender notes, or in United States interest-bearing bonds at par, as such association shall elect.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to prepare for circulation, as standard value United States money, certificates of the denomination of one, two, five, ten, twenty, fifty, one hundred, two hundred, five hundred, one thousand, two thousand, five thousand, and ten thousand dollars, to express on their face, in words and conspicuous figures, the several above-named denominations, with vignettes, letters, numbers, signatures, and such engraved decorations as shall tend to prevent forgeries and imitations, and also express on their face that they are respectively, by the Constitution and laws of the United States, the standard and measure of values to the amount expressed on their face, in all transactions within the United States involving the payment of money, and receivable in payment of all debts, public and private, and shall be a legal tender, at their face value therefor, except the funded debt of the United States, which is by its terms payable in gold, and except as hereinafter provided, and shall be received in deposit at par by all national banks. Such certificates shall be put in circulation and applied by the Secretary of the Treasury under, in pursuance of, and in the manner in this act provided.

SEC. 3. That all customs duties due and payable to the United States shall be paid and collected in gold coin and paper currency as follows: From and after the 1st day of July, 1874, to and until the 30th day of June, 1875, both inclusive, said customs duties shall be paid and collected, one-fourth in Treasury notes, or other currency of the United States, or circulating notes of national banks, and three-fourths in gold coin of the United States; from and after the 1st day of July, 1875, to and until the 30th day of June, 1876, both inclusive, said duties shall be paid and collected, one-half in Treasury notes, or other currency issued by the United States, or circulating notes of national banks, and one-half in gold coin of the United States; from and after the 1st day of July, 1876, to and until the 30th day of June, 1877, both inclusive, said customs duties shall be paid and collected, three-fourths in Treasury notes, or other currency issued by the United States, or circulating notes of national banks, and one-fourth in gold coin of the United States; from and after the 1st day of July, 1877, the whole amount of customs duties shall be paid and collected in Treasury notes, or other currency issued by the United States, or circulating notes of national banks.

SEC. 4. That on and after the 1st day of July, 1874, all customs duties, proceeds of taxes, and sales of public lands, interest, and dues from all sources received for account of the United States in Treasury notes and circulating bank-notes, by each and every officer of the United States, shall be transmitted in the identical currency received to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury shall issue and promulgate, to all Federal officers authorized to receive such moneys for account of the United States, rules, regulations, and instructions prescribing, directing, and regulating the time, manner, and means of transmitting such sums of money from the places where they are received to the Secretary of the Treasury at Washington, and such rules, regulations, and instructions shall have like obligation and effect as if the same were embodied in this act.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury on receiving, for account of the United States, Treasury notes and circulating bank-notes, as provided in the last section, shall cause a memorandum of all such notes to be made and kept in books appropriate for the purpose, and as often as the sum of notes so received shall amount to $1,000,000, he shall cause the same to be destroyed by burning them to ashes, as directed by section 24 of the act to provide a national currency, approved the 3d day of June, 1864. He shall cause a certificate and record of such destruction and burning to be made and entered in the books above mentioned, and a duplicate of so much of said certificate as relates to such portion of the destroyed paper currency as consisted of circulating notes of national banks (or associations) shall be transmitted to the several banks (or associations) the circulating notes of which shall have been destroyed, and then the amount of circulating notes permitted by law to be issued by such banks, respectively, shall be reduced to the extent of the circulating notes so destroyed; and when and as often as the circulating notes of any such bank or association shall have been destroyed under the provisions of this act to the amount of $50,000, the Secretary of the Treasury shall adjust the interest account with such bank or association, and release and deliver up an amount of the United States bonds pledged for the redemption of a like amount of the circulating notes of said bank or association.

SEC. 6. That immediately upon the destruction of any sum of Treasury notes and circulating bank-notes, in pursuance of the provisions of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay into the Treasury of the United States, of and from the United States certificates of standard value authorized and provided under the provisions of this act, an amount equal to the total sum of Treasury notes and circulating national-bank notes so destroyed as aforesaid, and such certificates so paid into the Treasury shall thereupon and thereafter become and be the lawful money of the United States, and as such shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States for the purposes and in the manner provided by law.

SEC. 7. That it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to issue of the said certificates provided in pursuance of this act an amount at any time exceeding $300,000,000.

SEC. 8. That when, in pursuance of the provisions of this act, 80 per cent., or a larger per cent., of the circulating notes of each of the national banks and banking associations shall have been received by the Secretary of the Treasury, and destroyed, and an equivalent amount of the bonds of the United States shall have been returned to said banks and banking associations, notice shall be given thereof by the Secretary of the Treasury to each of such national banks and banking associations. And thereafter circulating notes of national banks and banking associations shall not be received by the United States in payment of any public dues whatever, and thereafter the interest accruing on the bonds remaining in the possession of the Government as security for the redemption of circulating bank-notes shall not be paid to the banks until the whole amount of the circulating notes of such banks shall have been received and destroyed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 9. That when under the provisions of the last section circulating notes of national banks and banking associations shall be no longer receivable by the United States in payment of public dues, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem such circulating bank-notes at par, at points and places designated by him, by issuing and delivering in exchange therefor equal amounts of the United States certificates of standard value provided in pursuance of this act to the parties presenting such circulating notes for redemption, and shall destroy the circulating notes thus redeemed in the manner hereinabove provided.

SEC. 10. That this act shall take effect immediately.

As introductory to my remarks, I desire to quote a few sentences from that great thinker, Calhoun—for, though he advocated one or two pestilential political opinions, his was, as a rule, one of the most logical minds America has yet produced.

In his speech on his amendment to separate the Government from the banks, October 3, 1837, Calhoun said:

It is, then, my impression that, in the present condition of the world, a paper currency, in some form, if not necessary, is almost indispensable in financial and commercial operations of civilized and extensive communities. In many respects it has a vast superiority over a metallic currency, especially in great and extended transactions, by its great cheapness, lightness, and the facility of determining the amount. * * * It appears to me, after bestowing the best reflection I can give the subject, that no convertible paper, that is, no paper whose credit rests on a promise to pay, is suitable for currency. It is the form of credit proper in private transactions between man and man, but not for a standard of value to perform exchanges generally, which constitutes the appropriate functions of money or currency.

No one can doubt but that the Government credit is better than that of any bank—more stable, more safe. Why, then, should it mix it up with the less perfect credit of those institutions? Why not use its own credit to the amount of its own transactions? Why should it not be safe in its own hands, while it shall be considered safe in the hands of eight hundred private institutions, scattered all over the country, and which have no other object but their own private profit, to increase which they almost constantly extend their business to the most dangerous extremes? And why should the community be compelled to give 6 per cent. discount for the Government credit blended with that of the banks, when the superior credit of the Government could be furnished separately, without discount, to the mutual advantage of the Government and the community? Why, let me ask, should the Government be exposed to such difficulties as the present by mingling its credit with the banks, when it could be exempt from all such by using, by itself, its own safer credit? It is time the community, which has so deep an interest in a sound and cheap currency, and the equality of the laws between one portion of the country and another, should reflect seriously on these things, not for the purpose of oppressing any interest, but to correct gradually disorders of a dangerous character, which have insensibly, in the long course of years, without being perceived by any one, crept into the State. The question is not between credit and no credit, as some would have us believe, but in what form credit can best perform the functions of a sound and safe currency.

Believing that there might be a sound and safe paper currency founded on the credit of the Government exclusively, I was desirous that those who are responsible and have the power should have availed themselves of the opportunity, &c.

Again in the same speech, he said?

It has another and striking advantage over bank circulation, in its superior cheapness, as well as greater stability and safety. Bank paper is cheap to those who make it; but dear, very dear, to those who use it, fully as much so as gold and silver. It is the little cost of its manufacture, and the dear rates at which it is furnished to the community, which give the great profit to those who have a monopoly of the article. Some idea may be formed of the extent of the profit by the splendid palaces which we see under the name of banking-houses, and the vast fortunes which have been accumulated in this branch of business; all of which must ultimately be derived from the productive powers of the community, and, of course, adds so much to the cost of production. On the other hand, the credit of Government, while it would greatly facilitate its financial operations, would cost nothing, or next to nothing, both to it and the people, and of course would add nothing to the cost of production, which would give every branch of our industry, agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, as far as its circulation might extend, great advantages, both at home and abroad.

Later still, (22d of March, 1838,) in his speech on the sub-treasury bill, Calhoun said:

I now undertake to affirm positively, and without the least fear that I can be answered, what heretofore I have but suggested, that a paper issued by Government, with the simple promise to receive it in all its dues, leaving its creditors to take it or gold and silver, at their option, would, to the extent that it would circulate, form a perfect paper circulation, which could not be abused by the Government; that it would be as steady and uniform in value as the metals themselves; and that if, by possibility, it should depreciate, the loss would fall, not on the people, but on the Government itself; for the only effect of depreciation would be virtually to reduce the taxes, to prevent which the interest of the Government would be a sufficient guarantee. I shall not go into the discussion now, but on a suitable occasion I shall be able to make good every word I have uttered. I would be able to do more—to prove that it is within the constitutional power of Congress to use such a paper, in the management of its finances, according to the most rigid rule of construing the Constitution.

Since introducing the bill my attention has been called to an article in the October number of the Westminster Review, and a paragraph therein so well expresses the purposes of this measure, that, with some slight modifications, I shall employ it for that purpose:

This is an attempt to establish a system of currency under which the sovereignty of the nation shall be the sole fountain of issue; under which no money shall circulate except on the credit of the state; under which all profits upon the issue of money shall form part of the revenue of the country. The power of issue is and ought to be a sovereign right. The profits of the manufacture of paper money should no longer be allowed to remain in private hands. It is high time that all rights of issue were gathered into the hands of the state, and that the profits upon paper currency were secured to the state, and appropriated to the reduction of taxation. Why should not there be returned to the Treasury the profit upon paper currency, instead of returning a loss and allowing the profit to slip through its fingers and find its way into private purses? In other words, why should not the creation of currency be made to pay the Government its profit instead of enriching private individuals? Private individuals make a very handsome profit upon the currency at the expense of the people and through the permission of Congress. It is you and I and all of us that are responsible for this state of affairs, and I ask the various reform and other organizations throughout the country to study this matter, as the most important that can engage their attention. It indeed affects every human interest.

No change should be made in the financial system of a country, unless such change can be shown to be an improvement. I agree with Webster, that "a strong impression that something must be done is the origin of many bad measures. It is better to do nothing than to do mischief." And I am free to say that a year ago I should not have favored the proposition now presented. But, having gone over this whole subject, I am of the opinion that the plan is suitable and desirable as an American system of currency, and if once in full operation would produce results of great value to the country. Two things, however, are to be considered: First, it is to some extent a departure from the formere urrency schemes of the world; secondly, it is likely to be opposed by numbers of men who have position as financiers, bankers, &c. For these reasons, perhaps, it is not likely to meet with favor in Congress.

Indeed, when I had explained this plan to an eminent financier in New York he admitted that its practical operation would be in the interest of the people; "but," he added, "it will be useless to attempt to get it passed by Congress, for so many members are interested in banks it will be impossible to obtain the necessary votes for any measure that will trench on monopoly and privileges enjoyed by these institutions."

I think, with many others, that our present currency is much the best we ever had, and I am not at all sure that it is not better than the currency of any other country.

In the address which I made on receiving the nomination for the place which I now occupy, I said that—

The public benefits resulting from a settled and continuous commercial and business system should not be lost sight of. The banker and the merchant, the manufacturer and the agriculturist, are required to transact business having regard to a future period of a year or more. To them it is of the utmost consequence that the laws and measures of administration that affect values should, as far as possible, be unchanged; and to as great a degree as possible, changes, when made, should be gradual and prudent. The welfare of these great interests is of the highest consequence to every individual of the nation. Let us have peace, and let well enough alone, unless a change can be proposed which shall be generally conceded to be an improvement.

It is in strict accordance with the views then expressed that I advocate this bill.

Some of the suggestions of required legislation presented on this floor make one's hair stand on end. It astonishes one to hear proposed a paper currency issued by authority of the United States which shall have no limit in quantity except "the wants and wishes of the people," with the possibility that we shall have transmuted into circulating bank-notes the total amount of the funded debt of the United States.

My notion is, that our recent crisis was produced by a too large creation of credits, mainly in railroad-building. To use the expressive phrase of Vanderbilt, "Railroads were built from nowhere to nowhere." It was, however, but a moderate deluge of bankruptcy, drowning only the great dealers on credit, a deluge that only overflowed, in a figurative sense, the docks and piers of New York, &c., filling the cellars and drowning the rats. But give us the currency system known as the convertibility-bond scheme, and we should have a period of unequaled (apparent) prosperity to be ended and succeeded by a deluge of bankruptcy which, figuratively, would submerge the steeple of Trinity and financially drown all (American) mankind. I suspect that you will find that most inflationists, unless quite ignorant on financial matters, are so because in some way connected with parties who are up to their ears in building the same kind of railroads which broke Jay Cooke & Co., and which ought to break the railroad men I have referred to, and I guess will, unless they are saved by an inflation which will be most damaging to the American people.

We read that some thousands of years ago a set of men put up a golden calf to worship; to hear men talk about a specie basis, it would seem as though a numerous progeny of those foolish persons of old were still at large and worship the gold bull. It is said that some of them have found their way into Congress. I do not propose to add to their number.

But to recur more directly to the subject of the bill. It is not sound logic to assume that because in all past experience the human family has found gold to be the necessary standard of commercial values, there cannot be a better standard; because the same argument applied to other affairs—such as locomotion by steam, &c.—would prevent all change, and consequently all improvement.

We have had the theory of specie payments, convertibility of paper money at pleasure into gold, but we have not had the fact. There never has been a time when the currency of the country was convertible into gold at the pleasure of the holder; that is, there has always been more paper currency than gold in the country. And in all probability the deficiencies and evils of that system, pointed out now by the anti-specie party, are the result of the fact that we had the theory only, and not real convertibility. The system failed and was disastrous because we did not have what our theory required. But the experience of the past ought to be satisfactory that we cannot in the future have the theory realized in actual practice. It may be safely said that there is not gold enough in the world to be a sensible security for the paper currency actually in use in commerce; meaning by that to include not circulating notes only, but drafts and other evidences of debt.

Cannot it be safely assumed that a bill having pledged to its redemption all the property, private and public, in the United States, including gold itself, is not as well secured as the same note itself would be by a simple security of the gold only? If that be so, then the bill founded on the credit of the Government is better secured than the bill founded upon the gold that is within the reach of the parties that issued the bill. And the difficulty of rendering operative the great fact that all property of the country is pledged for its redemption is one of detail of administration and execution. With the powers of the Federal Government and its machinery, may it not be held that it is possible to provide that the fund pledged to the redemption of this class of bills shall be so well in hand and under control as to be able to redeem them on demand? Assuming that the methods may be provided by law to attain this end, we can then assert and maintain that the defeat of the system could only result by an overthrow of the powers of the Government. Allowing that the circulating notes of the country should become valueless because the government that controlled its securities was overthrown and destroyed, the same consequences would overthrow and destroy the gold basis if that system had been in operation. Witness the fate of the assignats when anarchy ruled in France. We may, therefore, infer that it is within the capacity of the Government of the United States to supply to its people a circulating medium that shall be of equal value in every part of our wide-spread domain, worth its legal value to every citizen in it in the purchase of commodities and in the payment of debts, and which will have certain characteristics or qualities not possessed by any gold coin, and yet of the greatest value to the people. That is to say, it will be a circulation that under no circumstances can be drawn away from us by the influence of foreign bankers, or foreign governments, or foreign conditions, until foreign governments and foreign bankers shall have adopted as their standard the same measure of value. The notes will be a legal tender. Whoever holds them can always pay his debts, and, except for foreign payments, he could want no more. With a sufficient supply of the legal tender of the country a man can always pay his creditors.

Such a circulation would have the fault, if it is a fault, that it could not be made, or would not be made, the medium of transactions in foreign commerce. The balance of trade between us and other countries with such a system would necessarily be paid in gold or silver—not gold or silver coin, but bullion. It is not easy to perceive why those balances cannot be just as well discharged in bullion as in coin.

In point of fact the precious metals usually take the form of bullion in foreign commerce; paper currencies are of no use there, and coins pass only as they contain more or less bullion. This would put us in the position of a trading people that had cut loose from gold and silver as a trading basis or measure of value, and allowed them to go into the category of merchantable commodities. But it is available to pay the balance to foreign countries, because in foreign countries gold and silver have a fixed and legal value.

It ought, perhaps, to be considered what would be the situation if this new revelation of government credit as a standard of value should be adopted by all commercial nations, and gold and silver, in the eye of all the world, should become a mere chattel; how then would the balance between us and foreign countries be liquidated and paid? This question would not be important if the change were to be confined to this country; but if it is fundamental and sound in this country, how can it be assumed that it will not be adopted by others?

We may here fairly assume that our proposed currency is entirely secure, and has all the attributes that we ask for it. But how about stability, and how shall we reconcile the claimed necessity for flexibility and the conceded necessity of stability? The new fiscal revelation does not claim, I believe, that the volume of currency has no effect upon the prices of commodities. Under the new as under the old system it is true that enlarging the volume of our measures of value directly tends to increase the prices of all commodities that are the subject of purchase and sale. Nothing is truer than that the value of a national currency changes as the government chooses to enlarge or contract the issue. Therefore, be careful that while you are exerting your ingenuity to produce flexibility in your currency so that under some automatic principle not fully described, (and called the convertibility theory,) there shall be in existence just the proper volume of currency to answer the exigencies of the day. Guard on the one hand against a redundancy, and on the other against a deficiency. Indeed, may we not fear that "elasticity" or "flexibility" of the currency will show when its visor is lifted that it is simply instability—the most objectionable feature that a currency can have? And it certainly illustrates the fitness of things that the great rubber man of New York should be the self-elected champion of an "elastic" currency.

Can this be left to the unregulated acts of individuals? Will it do to permit bankers and others to call on the Government for, and issue in circulation, greenbacks to as large an amount as they may choose to secure by the pledge of Federal bonds? Who can tell that under that system would not grow up inflation such as was never before known in the currency of any country? And who will venture to say that in case of such inflation of currency there would not be an enormous inflation of prices? And if the inflation of prices were great who can doubt that that would put an end to all exportation, and destroy our markets throughout the world?

A great merchant—I may say the leading merchant of the United States and the world—has had occasion to examine and the capacity to comprehend and apply the rules that govern trade, commerce, and currency with perhaps more wisdom and success than any man living. In a conversation which I had the honor to have with Mr. A. T. Stewart in New York City on the 30th of December last, he said:

> I had been anticipating financial difficulties in the country, and was preparing for it. I was in Europe when the crisis came; and it came suddenly and unexpectedly. We are in a measure governed in our business by the promise of the crops of the country. If a short crop is expected we curtail enterprises. If a large crop is expected we are likely to extend our business. The present year was expected to be a prosperous year for business; but the crisis came, and all who were in debt suffered. Those who were out of debt and had money were less seriously affected.
>
> I have always said that issuing bank currency based on bonds deposited with the Federal Government ought to have been avoided. I am still of that opinion. I insist that the volume of the currency ought not to be increased. This country will have reached its most secure financial position when gold and greenbacks are of equivalent value. Toward that point we have been for some time traveling. If we increase the currency we shall to that extent defer the time of reaching that desired point.

In respect to the collection of customs duties, Mr. Stewart said:

> I urged Mr. Chase in the beginning of our war troubles not to have the customs collected in a currency different from that used in the other transactions of the Government. I sought to convince him that it would have the effect to depreciate the value of the national currency, that is to say, the issues of Government credits. Mr. Chase said, "I agree with you; but how shall I get gold to pay the interest on my bonds?" I said, "Do as I do—go in the market and buy it." The present system compels the importing merchant to go to Wall street to buy gold, where he is subject to the disturbing influence of the gold speculators, who, in large measure, control that market. On this subject of collecting the customs duties, I am of opinion that the mistake of collecting them exclusively in gold ought to be corrected, and that payment of a portion thereof should be made in currency, increasing the amount thus payable from time to time until the whole shall be payable in currency. I am clearly of opinion that the amount of duties received will be sensibly increased by such a measure. And I am of opinion that the street market price of gold would be sensibly reduced by the same measure, and we should approach nearer to par as between greenbacks and gold.
>
> Referring to the schemes of optional conversion of bonds into greenbacks, and greenbacks into bonds, I regard it as simply a tampering with the currency. We want, we need, a stable currency of reasonable but not excessive volume, received everywhere throughout the country at par. And being stable, the prices of commodities of which it is the measure will themselves be stable, and the producer and the trader will be relieved from a large share of the hazards growing out of fluctuations in the standards of values. As an illustration of the evils of a fluctuating currency, suppose I sell goods on thirty days' time when gold is 10 per cent. premium, and at the end of thirty days gold is 15 per cent. premium, I lose several per cent. by the transaction, owing to the fluctuating currency. This illustrates in degree every transaction that is had under a fluctuating currency. It is the great risk of the trader, and greater still for the producer of commodities, because he has to do his business on several months' time. I have said that I should prefer to lose one-third of what I am considered to be worth to get to a specie basis rather than not have it, because then, in ten years, if not in five, I would be better off than now.

And thus emphatically ended Mr. Stewart's statement.

The cost of commodities depends upon the price of labor, which is the principal factor in it. A great inflation in prices of labor would put the cost of our commodities at figures so high that no other people could possibly take them. And as an attendant of that all other producing communities would offer the same commodities we have been accustomed to produce at prices much lower than we can at home, and bring about such a perfect disgust with tariff laws that would be required as the result of our inflated prices as would force the at least partial repeal of the tariff. In this way we would be led to a state of things where all our industrial enterprises would be broken down by foreign competition; selling at lower rates, all our leading commodities would necessarily be purchased abroad and have to be paid for in money because of the destruction of our export trade; and the only money we should have to pay it with would be our greenback circulation, which, under such a state of things, would probably be of so low value as compared with gold that we could not buy it except at a ruinous sacrifice.

This feebly painted picture of possible results might properly lead to the suggestion that if we accept the credit of the nation as our standard of values exercised through the medium of a paper currency there should be a reasonable maximum limit to its issue established by law. For, as Webster says forcibly and happily, "a sound currency is an essential and indispensable security for the fruits of industry and honest enterprise. Every man of property or industry, every man who desires to preserve what he honestly possesses, or to obtain what he can honestly earn has a direct interest in maintaining a safe circulating medium—such a medium as shall be a real and substantial representative of property; not liable to vibrate with opinions, not subject to be blown up or blown down by the breath of speculation, but made stable and secure by its immediate relation to that which the whole world regards as of a permanent value." We have already considered that a bill having pledged for its redemption all the property, public and private, in the United States, including gold itself, is at least as well secured as the same note would be by the simple security of the gold only.

"A disordered currency," he adds, "is one of the greatest of political evils. It undermines the virtues necessary for the support of the social system, and encourages propensities destructive of its happiness. It wars against industry, frugality, and economy, and it fosters the evil spirits of extravagance and speculation."

The change proposed would be a simple substitute of greenbacks for national-bank notes and canceling an equal amount of Federal bonded debt. The effect would be to make the whole circulation as good or better than greenbacks are now and save to the Treasury the interest on $350,000,000, or upward of $20,000,000 of gold annually, beside the use of the currency by the banks, which may be estimated at twenty or thirty millions more, making in all a subsidy of upward of $50,000,000 a year, or about $1,000,000 per week, making a total subsidy paid by the people to the banks for work which the Government could have done better at no expense whatever—I say making a total subsidy, which has been wrung from the people since the banks were established, of over $500,000,000, which, with the accruing interest thereon, would have been sufficient to have liquidated from one-third to one-half of the national debt.

By this arrangement the United States have paid to the banks the interest pledged on the securities. The banks have had the benefit of that. The Government pays in the first instance the interest on the securities which it would not have to pay if it issued the currency itself. To the extent that the Government issues greenbacks the United States gets a loan without interest. The Government has in effect given a subsidy equal to the amount of interest on the use of the currency issued by the national banks. Precisely how much this amounts to seems to belong in the category of those things which Lord Dundreary says "no fellah can find out." I will leave that to the experts. I will not claim that the estimate just given is at all accurate. Indeed, I am willing to put on record a statement in reference to this matter furnished to me by the president of one of the banks in the city of New York I propose to recur to this subject at some future time.

INCOME.

Six per cent gold on $100,000; say 10 per cent. premium	$6,600
Six per cent. currency on three-fourths of $90,000, or $67,500, (one-fourth must be held as reserve according to law)	4,725
		$11,325

COST OF—

$100,000 of sixes of 1867, say at 117, $117,000; one year's interest on $117,000	$8,190
One per cent. Government tax on circulation, $90,000	900
		9,090
		2,235

Showing a net profit of $2,235, over and above 7 per cent. per annum on the original investment of $117,000, the cost of $100,000 Government sixes, 1867, to secure circulation, $90,000.

But this does not fairly represent the loss sustained by the Government. For if the bonds were canceled and their amount out in greenbacks, the $3,600 of interest would be saved. And should not the interest on $90,000—equal to $5,300—be included, making in all $12,900? I think the real profit to the banks exceeds this sum.

Perhaps the grangers may deem the question of some moment, whether the millions upon millions the people are continually rolling into the bank-doors, and which go to support its officers and others interested in more than oriental luxury and splendor, and for which no consideration whatever is received on the part of the people, could not with profit to the country be diverted to construct lines of transportation in order that the poor farmer of the West may connect with market without being almost limitlessly mulcted by the railroad kings.

Let the grangers in these quiet winter evenings study up this matter, and ask themselves whether this thing should any longer be permitted. Let them in one column compute the sums poured down in everlasting showers upon the banks, and, in another, the cost of a four-line railroad from the extreme East to the extreme West, and then strike the balance.

For a moment consider the constitutional bearings of the question.

Article I, section 8, of the Federal Constitution provides that—

Congress shall have power to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures.

Section 10 provides that—

No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; grant letters of marque and reprisal, coin money, emit bills of credit, make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts.

In the first place, the bestowal of power carries with it an obligation for the exercise of that power whenever its exercise is needed for the general welfare of the people of the United States. And it is a sound proposition of law that when the United States shall have assumed its sovereign authority on the subject of coining money and regulating the value thereof, no other power within the jurisdiction of the United States has a right to do the same thing, or attempt to do the same thing. So that now the States are in the legal status where it would be unlawful to do any act of coining money, or in any way to assume to regulate the value thereof. That whole sovereign power granted to the Federal Government by the Constitution has been put in force by the Federal Government, to the exclusion of all minor jurisdictions, to wit, States, corporations, municipalities, and so forth, and in the proceedings of the Government in the matter of coining money and regulating the value thereof, it has the right under the Constitution to do any acts necessary and appropriate to that end.

We have seen that in section 10 of the first articlee of the Constitution we have the positive, expressive, and comprehensive proposition that no State shall emit bills of credit—that is, billsor notes for raising money on the mere credit of a State.

It is an attribute of sovereignty to issue anything that is to be used to circulate as money; and it is manifestly one of the acts that most materially affect the regulation of the value of money, because the value of money depends on its volume. Indeed the most direct way of affecting the value of money is to act upon its volume. A secondary way is to act upon the rate of interest it shall draw.

It seems strange that up to the time of the war the Federal Government never undertook to regulate the value of money in the United States. It was not until the nation was thought to be at death's door, and as a last resort, that the Government undertook to exercise that beneficent power which the wisdom of our fathers had conferred in the Constitution. And now, as we have seen already, the general Government having assumed that jurisdiction, no State is permitted to do any act to regulate the value of money circulating in the United States. The Federal Government, as soon as it took hold of the subject, gave the United States a currency that was of equal value in every hamlet in all its broad domain.

In confirmation of this view Mr. Webster, in his argument in the case of Ogden vs. Saunders, in the Supreme Court of the United States, January term, 1827, says:

That among the objects sought to be secured by the Constitution were commerce, credit, and mutual confidence in matters of property; and these required, among other things, a uniform standard of values or medium of payments. One of the first powers given to Congress, therefore, is that of coining money and fixing the value of foreign coins; and one of the first restraints imposed on the States is the total prohibition to coin money.

These two provisions are industriously followed up and completed by denying to the States all powers of emitting bills of credit, or of making anything but gold and silver a tender in the payment of debts. The whole control, therefore, over the standard of value and medium of payments is vested in the General Government. And again collating the grant to Congress and the prohibition on the States, a just reading of the provisions is this: "Congress shall have power to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin; but no State shall coin money, emit bills of credit, or make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts."

These provisions respect the medium of payment, and, thus collated, their joint result is clear and decisive.

The Constitution, by its grants to Congress and its prohibitions on the States, has sought to establish one uniform standard of value or medium of payment.

But when a constitutional provision has had executive, legislative, judicial, and popular exposition, construction, and sanction for a series of years, is it not too late to appeal from the decision? Ought not the question to be considered res adjudicata?

A currency good in the payment of all debts would fix the price of commodities, and the value of debts would be adjusted to it. The price would be high or low, depending upon the volume of the currency. Perhaps there might be tables of the increase of population, and authority given the Government in the course of paying its expenses to issue a fixed increase of currency annually, to keep pace with the growth and the increase of population of the country, and to provide for the loss or destruction of the circulating medium; or that feature might be left to congressional action in the future when the necessity of the case should require it.

The Government could probably easily put out twice as many greenbacks as it now has in circulation, and retire the national-bank note currency without shaking public confidence.

The Government is the largest, most important, and most conspicuous entity with which the mass of the people are acquainted.

What the Government puts out it puts out as the standard of value in commercial transactions. The par will be expressed on the face of the certificate. The circumstances never can arise that will impeach it as a standard. And so useful and safe will it be that there would be no one seeking to subject it to the measure of any other standard.

There will never be any occasion for redemption, because there will not be any desire on the part of the holder that it should be redeemed—no more than the holder of a ten-dollar gold piece would ask to have it redeemed in another ten-dollar piece. The only difference between the paper and the gold is, you can melt down and sell as bullion the gold, but the paper you cannot. Gold is a commodity as well as a coin, while our certificate will be a coin alone, and will get its value entirely from its legal character. That gold coin is a metal, and can be melted down and sold as bullion, is a feature which is totally unimportant when you are talking about a measure of value. A yard-stick made of pine is just as good as one made of silver for the purposes of a yard-stick.

With some slight exceptions these bills shall be received for all public and private dues. This being the case, it cannot be said with truth that the bill is not worth its face absolutely. Apparently it is used under circumstances where its value will never be impeached.

With the system just hinted at may we not anticipate that our standard, being relieved from the influences that attend the former standard of value, will be so permanent, and will produce such a degree of prosperity, as to compel the prices of foreign commodities—gold included—to adjust themselves to it; producing a state of things when our currency and gold, the standard of other nations, by the operation of the laws of trade, shall have been brought to a state of equal value. With the currency we advocate Government could at any time buy gold to pay its obligations requiring gold, as well as its citizens. Indeed, with the provision in regard to payment of customs duties, may we not reasonably expect that the national certificates will, before long, be worth their face in gold?

Government is the bull in the gold market, and he compels into confederation with him every importing merchant; and he makes a party in Wall street to bull gold in law. If he will put himself on a par with other traders and retire from Wall street, gold will cease to be sought for, except for the single purpose to be exported abroad to pay the balance of trade.

The first section of the bill provides for a repeal of the reserve. As a consequence there will be $150,000,000, more or less, of circulation set free. This will be to the advantage of the banks, for of course the less money lying idle the greater the dividend. These are certificates of value. They are different from Treasury notes in what they pretend to be. They (the certificates) pretend here to be the national standard of value, expressing the value on their face, and are issued as such, and not in the form of a promise to pay. They are a certificate of the standard of value of the United States money. In the case of greenbacks it was put on the simple ground that the Government would pay so much, and when the time came, and to the very last, they had not the means of paying for them. But in the case of the certificates it is the legal declaration that it shall be used as a measure of value in all transactions to that amount which gives them their value—the legal declaration of the sovereignty that they are a measure of value to that extent, and there is no other. The legal machinery run by the whole power of the sovereignty is supplied to enforce them as a measure of values in all transactions involving the payment of money. How to treat them after you get the authority and duty to create and issue this currency as provided in this bill: Suppose the Secretary of the Treasury has the bills printed and prepared. Then there come into the Treasury as customs duties, say $600,000, of which $300,000 are greenbacks, bank-bills, and currency. It belongs to the United States. It comes into the Treasury by operation of law.

The bill provides that such portion of this amount collected from customs or otherwise as is in bank-bills or currency, shall be canceled and retired, and an equal amount of these certificates shall be placed in the Treasury in place of the bank-notes. Then we have got it into a position where it will circulate from the Treasury, and an equal amount of the bonds pledged as security for the bank-notes, shall be released and be returned to the bank. I would retire the bank-notes and greenbacks both, and put certificates in their place and make it a uniform currency, and avail ourselves of the benefit that grows out of this substitution, including losses and counterfeit issues. Start anew; so that when this is worked out the currency of the country will be homogeneous—all alike—a sound, stable currency, of equal value throughout the United States, and receivable for any manner of obligation except funded United States obligations payable in gold.

It was a mistake to make a gold bull of the United States.

Stewart goes into the market and buys gold, and other importing houses also go into Wall street and bid against each other. The law drives them there, and the competition runs up the price and burdens the merchants and the country with a stimulated, excessive price. No industry or honest enterprise is benefited by this bulling of gold.

The Government desires gold at low rates. It takes the most active means to keep it at a high rate. Having done that, it occasionally goes into the market as a gold bear, and sells gold at a premium to the very importing merchants who are compelled by its own law to purchase gold to pay duties.

The issue of national currency through the banks constitutes a subsidy at the expense of the Federal Treasury and for the benefit of the banks in its practical operation. The banks make a great deal of money out of circulation. There is no practical redemption, and it is all out earning something all the time. In the first place, suppose a bank has placed bonds to the amount of $100,000 with the Comptroller of the Currency as security for the 90 per cent. thereof the bank issues as currency on that $100,000; the bank draws from the Government $6,000, more, or less, interest, which is equivalent to at least $7,000 in currency. Should the bank keep their currency out at 7 per cent. the two interests combined would equal about 14 per cent. But the probability is that the bank will receive a considerably higher interest than that. The people and the Treasury cannot afford to continue that, except so long as it shall be deemed indispensable to the safety of the bank system. And this is deemed a proper time to gradually withdraw that subsidy to the banks, wholly or partially. As an offset to this it is proposed immediately to relieve them of the excessive burden unused in their vaults—the reserve provided by law. This is deemed equivalent to enlarging their capacity to earn money by discounts to the extent of that reserve, which is named at $150,000,000.

There ought to be, in this view of the subject, an end to the claim that the banks have supported the Government. In fact the Government has supported the banks, and supplied them with a sum equal to their total capital, and on which they may now do business, and upon which it is hoped they may do business successfully without any further subsidy. If, on the contrary, it is found to be necessary for the purpose of preserving the banks to continue the subsidy, then the sooner we admit the necessity of getting along without banks of issue the better. One thing this bill will accomplish is the setting free their reserves; the other is, and the main feature is, that it will supply a currency for the banks and for the people that the banks will never be under any necessity for redeeming or for being prepared to redeem.

The Government has assumed jurisdiction. The Government has exercised its constitutional function, and must forever after control and direct the whole subject of the whole currency of the country. No matter what the past has been, the Government is now in the condition where it must go forward to regulate and control the currency of the country for good or for ill.

It is safe to say that no sound system can be gathered from the opinions or advice of classes of citizens who are engaged in special enterprises for private gains. All such opinions, if honest, will be mistaken and distorted.

The only sound system will be one that, on the whole, was best for the whole people and all the interests of the country. Such a system is not likely to be framed or devised in Wall street, nor in the factories of New England, nor in the iron-manufacturing establishments of Pennsylvania, nor even in the conclave of delegates of the grangers of the West. The views of such parties must necessarily be special, and limited to their own particular interest, and therefore unsound as applicable to the interests of the whole. But let me say that I am glad to see grangers and other organizations—the people in their primary capacity—holding frequent meetings to inform themselves upon and to discuss public affairs. A meeting every week, with a reading-room and library for reference, held in every school district in the United States, would do more for the education of the people than the passage of a hundred such bills as have been advocated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. GEORGE F. HOAR,] which is only a gratuity to the States. Besides, such action on the part of the people would be one of the best possible checks against corruption.

The creation of currency is, in the present state of the world, the most important exercise of sovereignty. Its exercise is of more moment to the people than any other power conferred or exercised by the sovereignty. It touches every human interest. And, strange to say, the American people have not until just now, within the last twelve months, entered upon a serious consideration of the matter in its details.

In the first place the standard of values of commodities, so far as the people of the United States are concerned, must be fixed and certain. It should be fixed and unchangeable. It should be beyond the reach and influence of affairs and interests and measures outside of the United States. It should be such as is cheapest and most convenient and most easily understood.

The law fixes the measure of the foot and the yard and the mile, the standard of superficial measurement, the standard of weights; and they operate with convenience and success and perfect justice in the transactions of the people, and there is no basis for it, no gold or other basis for the standard, except what is contained in the laws of the nation. Why should it be that the measure of value of internal commerce needs to be placed upon any different basis than the constitution and laws of the sovereignty. It will be said that the standard will not serve in our transactions with foreign countries. This is admitted; and the consequence is a strong argument in favor of a standard. It will not serve as a standard in our transactions with other countries, and is therefore independent of all foreign conditions, and more reliable and equitable for that reason.

But in order to claim for our standard the effects that have been mentioned, we must make sure that it is not itself tampered with and from year to year contracted and expanded by unwise legislation. If, after experiment, it should appear that the views upon which this system is founded are sound and ought to be continued, the Constitution should be amended and a permanent standard fixed by that great charter, beyond the reach even of the law of Congress. It is claimed that such a standard would be far more stable and permanent, less liable to fluctuation by far, than gold. The gold medium is of itself so entirely flexible that three or four respectable gentlemen in the parlor of the Bank of England, by raising the rate of discount in the bank 3 per cent., can set the currents of gold running to the Bank of England from all nations with whom they have commercial transactions; the result of which is to change essentially the value of gold in London and all other points. So that in point of fact it is, perhaps, a commodity that fluctuates, not in as great degree, but more constantly than any other.

It is a popular error to suppose that gold is worth intrinsically anything like the value that is placed upon it conventionally by legal enactments and the consent of trading nations. In truth, intrinsically, gold is one of the least valuable of the metals. Conventionally, it is the most valuable. Take from it that conventional value placed upon it in use among men, and its value is very low in the scale of metals. Steel and zinc and tin and some of the other metals are intrinsically more valuable.

The Government undertakes by this bill—and it pledges its power and its faith—that the currency that it has established shall be equal to the value that has been fixed upon it in the hands of every holder. That faith and that power of our Government have been so exhibited and expressed in the history of the country that not one of the inhabitants of this wide Republic will doubt it. It offers to the citizens of the United States a standard of values in a circulating medium which shall divorce us from the exigencies and the schemes and the ambitions of all foreign populations, and leave us to pursue our career of industry and civilization and accumulation without the embarrassments that result in all countries where the people are governed too much. Under this system the lawful currency of the country will at all times represent the values of the property and products of the country; and if sensible measures are taken to protect the people against undue expansion of the volume of the currency they can rely upon steady prices and uniform rewards of industry. These features are not possible with a currency based on the gold standard which is subject to be operated upon by increase or diminution with every people with whom we have intercourse, and by all governments that recognize the gold standard and by all the speculative schemes of bankers in every other country. The time has been within the memory of the youngest as well as the oldest of us when a resolution by the governors of the Bank of England, fixing the rate of discount of their bank, would raise or depress the price of every commodity in the United States.

This is what the certificate promises: it promises it shall be of the value expressed on its face to every holder; and the faith and power of the Government are pledged that it shall be so. The sovereign authority decrees it; and the laws have provided the means to enforce that authority.

It is a thing to thank God for that, by the progress of enlightenment from our recent experience, we are able to declare ourselves now as independent in our financial relations as in '76 we were to declare ourselves to be independent of the sovereign authority of Great Britain.

We were reasonably free and theoretically independent, but not actually independent nor actually free until the war of the rebellion. We had the forms of a sovereignty and the appearance of a government, but whether we were or not had never been tested until the question came whether we could govern ourselves. No people can be considered competent until the test has been had by a real trial. Our trial came; it was formidable and fearful; but in the end, by a million of bayonets and the sacrifice of hundreds of thousands of lives, we demonstrated that the people of the United States were sovereign—were able to govern themselves and maintain their integrity as a nation. The verdict of the world was rendered in our favor without further argument. And since that date we have a right to claim that we are a sovereign people, with the power of governing ourselves and defending ourselves against all assaults. Formerly the faith and power of the Government was a theory; now it is a demonstrated fact. In the act of issuing greenbacks as currency the very highest exercise of the sovereign power was exhibited with entire and complete success, so that no man from that day to this has ever questioned its value or doubts it now. We shall cut loose from a metallic basis, and the American system is to modify all other systems of finance.

The past, at least, of the republican party is secure; but it is a party of progress; and let it beware of the blandishments of the buxom banking Vivian, golden-gifted, profuse of amours, else, ere long, in the cold splendor of marble walls of banking institutions, from which is no escape forevermore, it will lie "lost to life, and use, and name, and fame." Rather, disinthralled, let it close up its ranks with the party of the future, and still, as of old, keeping step to the music of the Union, amid the appreciative applause of the nation, move solidly together to assured victory with the cry, and under the banner bearing the inscription, ONE COUNTRY, ONE CONSTITUTION, ONE CURRENCY.

Mr. CAIN obtained the floor.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to put a question to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MELLISH.]

Mr. MELLISH. I do not know whether I have time to answer the question.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. CAIN] will yield for a moment, I wish to ask the gentleman from New York a question. Did I apprehend him correctly in understanding him to state that the gold dollar is a standard of value?

Mr. MELLISH. As provided by the bill I have been considering?

Mr. KELLEY. No, sir. I understood you in general argument to assert that gold coin is the standard of value.

Mr. MELLISH. I understand that gold is the world's standard of value.

Mr. KELLEY. Is it not rather the measure of a standard?

Mr. MELLISH. I think that in practice it is the standard.

Mr. KELLEY. Is it?

Mr. MELLISH. In practice it is, and is so considered the world over.

Mr. KELLEY. Well, sir, is it the standard for regulating the value of a barrel of flour, as well when flour is but four dollars a barrel as when it is ten?

Mr. MELLISH. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. How can it be said to regulate the value of flour when it takes sometimes but four dollars, and sometimes ten, to pay for one hundred and ninety-six pounds of the same article put up in a common barrel.

Mr. MELLISH. Sometimes flour is worth more than at other times, and therefore brings a higher price.

Mr. KELLEY. May it not then be said with equal reason that gold is sometimes worth less than at other times? Are not both gold and flour commodities?

Mr. MELLISH. No, sir. Gold is the world's standard of value. Flour is at one time worth more than at another.

Mr. KELLEY. Is it not rather a measure of values, in local markets, than a standard of values?

Mr. MELLISH. I think it is the world's standard of value. I do not see how you can look at it in any other light.

Mr. KELLEY. That is a queer standard which sometimes measures two and a half times as much as at others.

Mr. MELLISH. It is the flour, not the gold, that changes, though, in a certain sense, everything is subject to change.

Mr. HUBBELL. Does not the question of supply and demand affect the value?

Mr. KELLEY. And has not the question of supply and demand also something to do with the value of gold? Is its purchasing power never affected by this law?

Mr. HUBBELL. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. Then how is it that that which is constantly changing its own value is a standard for the measure of the value of other articles?

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what is the difference between the meaning of the word "measure" and the word "standard?" It takes sometimes more money to buy a barrel of flour than it does at others. How can that be a measure any more than it is a standard of value, as the gentleman asserts?

Mr. KELLEY. I have not asserted anything. I am an inquirer, in pursuit of information.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. So am I in pursuit of information. I wish to ask the gentleman how it is that the word "measure" differs in meaning from the word "standard?"

Mr. KELLEY. I do not like to take up more of the time of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. CAIN;] but if he will allow me, I will say that the real measure of value is the money of account of each nation. There is no "currency of the world." The phrase is a delusion. If you will go to London with your trunk full of twenty-dollar gold pieces and undertake to spend one of them in a shop, you will find that you will have to go through the broker's shaving-shop, though it be dignified by the name of bank, in order to get the currency of England, just as we used to, when we had State bank-notes, and went beyond the limits of the State in which they were issued. You will then find that your "currency of the world" is United States currency, and that England does not recognize it, and that you will have to stand a shave to get it converted into sovereigns.

Then, if you cross the channel and go to France—having converted your United States gold currency into English gold currency—you will have to get it converted into French currency, or gold coins the unit of which is the franc, say into louis; and, with each change, you will be shaved by a broker—albeit it be called the Bank of England or the Bank of France—as you used to do when we had the old-fashioned State-bank notes.

But further, when you shall be about to start from France with your currency of the world reduced by having paid for two changes, and which has borne three forms and the stamp of three nationalities, you must determine how you will change it next. If you are going south to the Peninsula, you will want to get Spanish or Portuguese coinage. If you are going into Germany you will want quite another currency, to wit, the currency of Germany, which may be gold or silver. Leaving Germany with your "currency of the world" thus frequently changed through broker-shops, if you are too far northward, you will have to get another set of coins, to wit, the gold currency of Sweden. The truth is that gold coin outside of the country whose sovereign right to institute money they represent are but merchandise. There is no other currency of the world than commodities. The making of money pertains to the sovereignty of each nation.

Sir, the measure of value is, as I have said, found in the money of account known to nations respectively. It is dollars in the United States, pounds, shillings, and pence in England, francs in France, and I am not sufficiently acquainted with the subject to tell you what it is in Spain or Sweden, in Russia, Germany, Italy, Denmark, and other countries.

But if you recross the ocean with your "currency of the world" as coined in the last country you visited and go into South or Central America you must again submit to as many shaves there in getting your gold changed as you shall pass from one nationality to another; I reiterate the figure I used, and say just as you did with the old State-bank notes.

Now, sir, the standard of value is the money of account. The currency of the world is woven and spun at Manchester and Dundee, or forged at Birmingham, so far as England requires it to settle adverse international balances. The "currency of the world" that settles American balances in foreign lands is grown on our cotton and tobacco fields, is pumped out of our petroleum-wells, is found in the wheat-fields of the Northwest and the mines of the Rocky Mountains and Pacific slope. With that currency we settle international balances according to the standard of value in each country, which is the money of account as found on the books of merchants and quoted in mercantile journals within its limits.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. Another question.

Mr. KELLEY. Before I hear the question, I desire to say that I cannot now consent to consume more of the time of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. CAIN,] but will on next Saturday meet the gentleman here, and submit to be catechised by him all day.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. Speaker, I feel called upon more particularly by the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] on civil rights to express my views. For a number of days this question has been discussed, and various have been the opinions expressed as to whether or not the pending bill should be passed in its present form or whether it should be modified to meet the objections entertained by a number of gentlemen whose duty it will be to give their votes for or against its passage. It has been assumed that to pass this bill in its present form Congress would manifest a tendency to override the Constitution of the country and violate the rights of the States.

Whether it be true or false is yet to be seen. I take it, so far as the constitutional question is concerned, if the colored people under the law, under the amendments to the Constitution, have become invested with all the rights of citizenship, then they carry with them all rights and immunities accruing to and belonging to a citizen of the United States. If four, or nearly five, million people have been lifted from the thralldom of slavery and made free; if the Government by its amendments to the Constitution has guaranteed to them all rights and immunities, as to other citizens, they must necessarily therefore carry along with them all the privileges enjoyed by all other citizens of the Republic.

Sir, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] who spoke on the question stated some objections, to which I desire to address a few words of reply. He said it would enforce social rights, and therefore would be detrimental to the interests of both the whites and the blacks of the country. My conception of the effect of this bill, if it be passed into a law, will be simply to place the colored men of this country upon the same footing with every other citizen under the law, and will not at all enforce social relationship with any other class of persons in the country whatsoever. It is merely a matter of law. What we desire is that our civil rights shall be guaranteed by law as they are guaranteed to every other class of persons; and when that is done all other things will come in as a necessary sequence, the enforcement of the rights following the enactment of the law.

Sir, social equality is a right which every man, every woman, and every class of persons have within their own control. They have a right to form their own acquaintances, to establish their own social relationships. Its establishment and regulation is not within the province of legislation. No laws enacted by legislators can compel social equality. Now, what is it we desire? What we desire is this: inasmuch as we have been raised to the dignity, to the honor, to the position of our manhood, we ask that the laws of this country should guarantee all the rights and immunities belonging to that proud position, to be enforced all over this broad land.

Sir, the gentleman states that in the State of North Carolina the colored people enjoy all their rights as far as the highways are concerned; that in the hotels, and in the railroad cars, and in the various public places of resort, they have all the rights and all the immunities accorded to any other class of citizens of the United States. Now, it may not have come under his observation, but it has under mine, that such really is not the case; and the reason why I know and feel it more than he does is because my face is painted black and his is painted white. We who have the color—I may say the objectionable color—know and feel all this. A few days ago, in passing from South Carolina to this city, I entered a place of public resort where hungry men are fed, but I did not dare—I could not without trouble—sit down to the table. I could not sit down at Wilmington or at Weldon without entering into a contest, which I did not desire to do. My colleague, the gentleman who so eloquently spoke on this subject the other day, [Mr. ELLIOTT,] a few months ago entered a restaurant at Wilmington and sat down to be served, and while there a gentleman stepped up to him and said, "You cannot eat here." All the other gentlemen upon the railroad as passengers were eating there; he had only twenty minutes, and was compelled to leave the restaurant or have a fight for it. He showed fight, however, and got his dinner; but he has never been back there since. Coming here last week I felt we did not desire to draw revolvers and present the bold front of warriors, and therefore we ordered our dinners to be brought into the cars, but even there we found the existence of this feeling; for, although we had paid a dollar apiece for our meals, to be brought by the servants into the cars, still there was objection on the part of the railroad people to our eating our meals in the cars, because they said we were putting on airs. They refused us in the restaurant, and then did not desire that we should eat our meals in the cars, although we paid for them. Yet this was in the noble State of North Carolina.

Mr. Speaker, the colored men of the South do not want the adoption of any force measure. No; they do not want anything by force. All they ask is that you will give them, by statutory enactment under the fundamental law, the right to enjoy precisely the same privileges accorded to every other class of citizens.

The gentleman, moreover, has told us that if we pass this civil-rights bill we will thereby rob the colored men of the South of the friendship of the whites. Now, I am at a loss to see how the friendship of our white friends can be lost to us by simply saying we should be permitted to enjoy the rights enjoyed by other citizens. I have a higher opinion of the friendship of the southern men than to suppose any such thing. I know them too well. I know their friendship will not be lost by the passage of this bill. For eight years I have been in South Carolina, and I have found this to be the fact, that the higher class, comprising gentlemen of learning and refinement, are less opposed to this measure than are those who do not occupy so high a position in the social scale.

Sir, I think that there will be no difficulty. But I do think this, that there will be more trouble if we do not have those rights. I regard it important, therefore, that we should make the law so strong that no man can infringe those rights.

But, says the gentleman from North Carolina, some ambitious colored man will, when this law is passed, enter a hotel or railroad car, and thus create disturbance. If it be his right, then there is no vaulting ambition in his enjoying that right. And if he can pay for his seat in a first-class car or his room in a hotel, I see no objection to his enjoying it. But the gentleman says more. He cited, on the school question, the evidence of South Carolina, and says the South Carolina University has been destroyed by virtue of bringing into contact the white students with the colored. I think not. It is true that a small number of students left the institution, but the institution still remains. The buildings are there as erect as ever; the faculty are there as attentive to their duties as ever they were; the students are coming in as they did before. It is true, sir, that there is a mixture of students now; that there are colored and white students of law and medicine sitting side by side; it is true, sir, that the prejudice of some of the professors was so strong that it drove them out of the institution; but the philanthropy and good sense of others were such that they remained; and thus we have still the institution going on, and because some students have left, it cannot be reasonably argued that the usefulness of the institution has been destroyed. The University of South Carolina has not been destroyed.

But the gentleman says more. The colored man cannot stand, he says, where this antagonism exists, and he deprecates the idea of antagonizing the races. The gentleman says there is no antagonism on his part. I think there is no antagonism so far as the country is concerned. So far as my observation extends, it goes to prove this: that there is a general acceptance upon the part of the larger and better class of the whites of the South of the situation, and that they regard the education and the development of the colored people as essential to their welfare, and the peace, happiness, and prosperity of the whole country. Many of them, including the best minds of the South, are earnestly engaged in seeking to make this great system of education permanent in all the States. I do not believe, therefore, that it is possible there can be such an antagonism. Why, sir, in Massachusetts there is no such antagonism. There the colored and the white children go to school side by side. In Rhode Island there is not that antagonism. There they are educated side by side in the high schools. In New York, in the highest schools, are to be found, of late, colored men and colored women. Even old democratic New York does not refuse to give the colored people their rights, and there is no antagonism. A few days ago, when in New York, I made it my business to find out what was the position of matters there in this respect. I ascertained that there are, I think, seven colored ladies in the highest school in New York, and I believe they stand No. 1 in their class, side by side with members of the best and most refined families of the citizens of New York, and without any objection to their presence.

I cannot understand how it is that our southern friends, or a certain class of them, always bring back this old ghost of prejudice and of antagonism. There was a time, not very far distant in the past, when this antagonism was not recognized, when a feeling of fraternization between the white and the colored races existed, that made them kindred to each other. But since our emancipation, since liberty has come, and only since—only since we have stood up clothed in our manhood, only since we have proceeded to take hold and help advance the civilization of this nation—it is only since then that this bugbear is brought up against us again. Sir, the progress of the age demands that the colored man of this country shall be lifted by law into the enjoyment of every right, and that every appliance which is accorded to the German, to the Irishman, to the Englishman, and every foreigner, shall be given to him; and I shall give some reasons why I demand this in the name of justice.

For two hundred years the colored men of this nation have assisted in building up its commercial interests. There are in this country nearly five millions of us, and for a space of two hundred and forty-seven years we have been hewers of wood and drawers of water; but we have been with you in promoting all the interests of the country. My distinguished colleague, who defended the civil rights of our race the other day on this floor, set this forth so clearly that I need not dwell upon it at this time.

I propose to state just this: that we have been identified with the interests of this country from its very foundation. The cotton crop of this country has been raised and its rice-fields have been tilled by the hands of our race. All along as the march of progress, as the march of commerce, as the development of your resources has been widening and expanding and spreading, as your vessels have gone on every sea, with the stars and stripes waving over them, and carried your commerce everywhere, there the black man's labor has gone to enrich your country and to augment the grandeur of your nationality. This was done in the time of slavery. And if, for the space of time I have noted, we have been hewers of wood and drawers of water; if we have made your cotton-fields blossom as the rose; if we have made your rice-fields wave with luxuriant harvests; if we have made your corn-fields rejoice; if we have sweated and toiled to build up the prosperity of the whole country by the productions of our labor, I submit, now that the war has made a change, now that we are free—I submit to the nation whether it is not fair and right that we should come in and enjoy to the fullest extent our freedom and liberty.

A word now as to the question of education. Sir, I know that, indeed, some of our republican friends are even a little weak on the school clause of this bill; but, sir, the education of the race, the education of the nation, is paramount to all other considerations. I regard it important, therefore, that the colored people should take place in the educational march of this nation, and I would suggest that there should be no discrimination. It is against discrimination in this particular that we complain.

Sir, if you look over the reports of superintendents of schools in the several States, you will find, I think, evidences sufficient to warrant Congress in passing the civil-rights bill as it now stands. The report of the commissioner of education of California shows that, under the operation of law and of prejudice, the colored children of that State are practically excluded from schooling. Here is a case where a large class of children are growing up in our midst in a state of ignorance and semi-barbarism. Take the report of the superintendent of education of Indiana, and you will find that while efforts have been made in some places to educate the colored children, yet the prejudice is so great that it debars the colored children from enjoying all the rights which they ought to enjoy under the law. In Illinois, too, the superintendent of education makes this statement: that, while the law guarantees education to every child, yet such are the operations among the school trustees that they almost ignore, in some places, the education of colored children.

All we ask is that you, the legislators of the nation, shall pass a law so strong and so powerful that no one shall be able to elude it and destroy our rights under the Constitution and laws of our country. That is all we ask.

But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] asks that the colored man shall place himself in an attitude to receive his rights. I ask, what attitude can we assume? We have tilled your soil, and during the rude shock of war, until our hour came, we were docile during that long, dark night, waiting patiently the coming day. In the Southern States during that war our men and women stood behind their masters; they tilled the soil, and there were no insurrections in all the broad lands of the South; the wives and daughters of the slaveholders were as sacred then as they were before; and the history of the war does not record a single event, a single instance, in which the colored people were unfaithful, even in slavery; nor does the history of the war record the fact that on the other side, on the side of the Union, there were any colored men who were not willing at all times to give their lives for their country. Sir, upon both sides we waited patiently. I was a student at Wilberforce University, in Ohio, when the tocsin of war was sounded, when Fort Sumter was fired upon, and I never shall forget the thrill that ran through my soul when I thought of the coming consequences of that shot. There were one hundred and fifteen of us, students at that university, who, anxious to vindicate the stars and stripes, made up a company, and offered our services to the governor of Ohio; and, sir, we were told that this was a white man's war and that the negro had nothing to do with it. Sir, we returned—docile, patient, waiting, casting our eyes to the heavens whence help always comes. We knew that there would come a period in the history of this nation when our strong black arms would be needed. We waited patiently; we waited until Massachusetts, through her noble governor, sounded the alarm, and we hastened then to hear the summons and obey it.

Sir, as I before remarked, we were peaceful on both sides. When the call was made on the side of the Union we were ready; when the call was made for us to obey orders on the other side, in the confederacy, we humbly performed our tasks, and waited patiently. But, sir, the time came when we were called for; and, I ask, who can say that when that call was made, the colored men did not respond as readily and as rapidly as did any other class of your citizens? Sir, I need not speak of the history of this bloody war. It will carry down to coming generations the valor of our soldiers on the battle-field. Fort Wagner will stand forever as a monument of that valor, and until Vicksburgh shall be wiped from the galaxy of battles in the great contest for human liberty that valor will be recognized.

And for what, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, was the great war made? The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] announced before he sat down, in answer to an interrogatory by a gentleman on this side of the House, that they went into the war conscientiously before God. So be it. Then we simply come and plead conscientiously before God that these are our rights, and we want them. We plead conscientiously before God, believing that these are our rights by inheritance, and by the inexorable decree of Almighty God.

We believe in the Declaration of Independence, that all men are born free and equal, and are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. And we further believe that to secure those rights governments are instituted. And we further believe that when governments cease to subserve those ends the people should change them.

I have been astonished at the course which gentlemen on the other side have taken in discussing this bill. They plant themselves right behind the Constitution, and declare that the rights of the State ought not to be invaded. Now, if you will take the history of the war of the rebellion, as published by the Clerk of this House, you will see that in 1860 the whole country, each side, was earnest in seeking to make such amendments to the Constitution as would forever secure slavery and keep the Union together under the circumstances. The resolutions passed, and the sentiments expressed in speeches at that time, if examined by gentlemen, will be found to bear out all that I have indicated. It was felt in 1860 that anything that would keep the "wayward sisters" from going astray was desirable. They were then ready and willing to make any amendments.

And now, when the civil rights of our race are hanging upon the issue, they on the other side are not willing to concede to us such amendments as will guarantee them; indeed, they seek to impair the force of existing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, which would carry out the purpose.

I think it is proper and just that the civil-rights bill should be passed. Some think it would be better to modify it, to strike out the school clause, or to so modify it that some of the State constitutions should not be infringed. I regard it essential to us and the people of this country that we should be secured in this if in nothing else. I cannot regard that our rights will be secured until the jury-box and the school-room, those great palladiums of our liberty, shall have been opened to us. Then we will be willing to take our chances with other men.

We do not want any discriminations to be made. If discriminations are made in regard to schools, then there will be accomplished just what we are fighting against. If you say that the schools in the State of Georgia, for instance, shall be allowed to discriminate against colored people, then you will have discriminations made against us. We do not want any discriminations. I do not ask any legislation for the colored people of this country that is not applied to the white people. All that we ask is equal laws, equal legislation, and equal rights throughout the length and breadth of this land.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] also says that the colored men should not come here begging at the doors of Congress for their rights. I agree with him. I want to say that we do not come here begging for our rights. We come here clothed in the garb of American citizenship. We come demanding our rights in the name of justice. We come, with no arrogance on our part, asking that this great nation, which laid the foundations of civilization and progress more deeply and more securely than any other nation on the face of the earth, guarantee us protection from outrage. We come here, five millions of people—more than composed this whole nation when it had its great tea-party in Boston Harbor, and demanded its rights at the point of the bayonet—asking that unjust discriminations against us be forbidden. We come here in the name of justice, equity, and law, in the name of our children, in the name of our country, petitioning for our rights.

Our rights will yet be accorded to us, I believe, from the feeling that has been exhibited on this floor of the growing sentiment of the country. Rapid as the weaver's shuttle, swift as the lightning's flash, such progress is being made that our rights will be accorded to us ere long. I believe the nation is perfectly willing to accord this measure of justice, if only those who represent the people here would say the word. Let it be proclaimed that henceforth all the children of this land shall be free; that the stars and stripes, waving over all, shall secure to every one equal rights, and the nation will say "amen."

Let the civil-rights bill be passed this day, and five million black men, women, and children, all over the land, will begin a new song of rejoicing, and the thirty-five millions of noble-hearted Anglo-Saxons will join in the shout of joy. Thus will the great mission be fulfilled of giving to all the people equal rights.

Inasmuch as we have toiled with you in building up this nation; inasmuch as we have suffered side by side with you in the war; inasmuch as we have together passed through affliction and pestilence, let there be now a fulfillment of the sublime thought of our fathers—let all men enjoy equal liberty and equal rights.

In this hour, when you are about to put the cap-stone on the mighty structure of government, I ask you to grant us this measure, because it is right. Grant this, and we shall go home with our hearts filled with gladness. I want to "shake hands over the bloody chasm." The gentleman from North Carolina has said he desires to have forever buried the memory of the recent war. I agree with him. Representing a South Carolina constituency, I desire to bury forever the tomahawk. I have voted in this House with a free heart to declare universal amnesty. Inasmuch as general amnesty has been proclaimed, I would hardly have expected there would be any objection on this floor to the civil-rights bill, giving to all men the equal rights of citizens. There should be no more contest. Amnesty and civil rights should go together. Gentlemen on the other side will admit that we have been faithful; and now, when we propose to bury the hatchet, let us shake hands upon this measure of justice; and if heretofore we have been enemies, let us be friends now and forever.

Our wives and our children have high hopes and aspirations; their longings for manhood and womanhood are equal to those of any other race. The same sentiment of patriotism and of gratitude, the same spirit of national pride that animates the hearts of other citizens, animates theirs. In the name of the dead soldiers of our race, whose bodies lie at Petersburgh and on other battle-fields of the South; in the name of the widows and orphans they have left behind; in the name of the widows of the confederate soldiers who fell upon the same fields, I conjure you let this righteous act be done. I appeal to you in the name of God and humanity to give us our rights, for we ask nothing more. [Lond applause.]

[Mr. CROSSLAND addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. MELLISH. Mr. Speaker, grave apprehensions seem to be entertained by gentlemen on the other side of the House from the passage of a bill guaranteeing equal civil rights to all American citizens. They appear to think that it will undermine the foundations necessary for the support of the social system. I do not share in these apprehensions. I know that where prejudice, passion, and fear are excited that arguments and appeals to reason have little effect. Besides, the subject has been already ably and eloquently presented. I will therefore merely refer to a fact that came within my own observation where the granting of equal rights in public conveyances that are often overcrowded was quietly brought about—indeed, so far as I am aware, without any protest—and this in a great city where prejudice against color was perhaps as intense as in any part of the world, and was kept constantly excited by appeals of democratic stump-speakers and by the democratic press, and which feeling, thus encouraged and stimulated, finally culminated in the most disgraceful riot known to history.

It is well known that for many years, while some of the lines of street-cars in the city of New York did not allow any colored passengers to ride in their cars, other lines placed upon their routes cars conspicuously labeled with these words: "Colored people allowed in this car." A person of color was not allowed to ride upon any other car; and thereby much inconvenience was occasioned to our colored fellow-citizens, to say nothing of the degradation implied by the practice. On one occasion the wife of an officer—and her husband was at the time fighting in the Union Army—got into an empty car near the Astor House to proceed up town. The conductor of the car, by perhaps a somewhat close scrutiny—for I observed at the trial that the lady had nearly straight hair and might easily have passed for simply a native of the tropics—discovered that she was partly of the African race. Thereupon, in accordance with the rules of the company, he ordered her out of the car. The lady declined to go. Then the conductor called a policeman, who, on hearing a statement of the case, ejected her from the car. The lady made a complaint against the patrolman which was heard before the commissioners of the metropolitan police department. It was not claimed that any unnecessary violence was used on the part of the policeman, or that he was guilty, in the technical sense of the phrase, of conduct unbecoming an officer, the whole matter turning on the question whether the officer had any right to eject the lady at all. After hearing the evidence the Hon. Thomas C. Acton, then president of the board of police—and who, of all men I ever knew, detests a mean act and will go as far as the farthest to secure equal and exact justice to the oppressed—told the officer in substance, that, if he ever saw a conductor attempting to put out a passenger from a street-car on account of color, or was called upon by a conductor to eject a passenger on that account, to immediately arrest such conductor and take him to the station-house, and see to it that the rights of the citizen were protected. The policeman was fined ten days' pay for the offense.

What was the consequence?

Why, as soon as the change could possibly be made, the managers of the street railroads of the city of New York caused to be erased from over their car-windows the inscription, "Colored people allowed in this car." And from that day to this colored citizens have rode indiscriminately and without molestation in all the street-cars of that city.

I venture to predict that the operation of this statute will be only beneficial—that it will produce none of the terrible results that have been conjured up by the affrighted imaginations of the opposition.

Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House is treated as a party question by the opposition. I, for one, am quite willing that the issue shall be thus made. What is this bill? It simply proposes to get the civil rights of black and white citizens settled on a basis of equality. I need not attempt to describe what the nation has done and suffered for the abolition of slavery and the establishing of equal rights of all American citizens, without regard to race or color. The struggle from beginning to end was the struggle between two parties, the republican and the democratic. The same spirit is here and now manifested. The civil-rights bill was filibustered against by the opposition with a pertinacity worthy of a better cause in the last Congress. As an indication of the spirit that still animates that party, I read from the RECORD the report of a scene enacted on this floor day before yesterday:

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I know the objection that will occur to the mind of every gentleman on the other side of the House, and of every one here who differs from me on this question. They will say that it is prejudice—unjust prejudice. Admit that it is prejudice; yet the fact exists, and you, as members of Congress and legislators are bound to respect that prejudice. It was born in the children of the South—born in our ancestors, and born in your ancestors in Massachusetts—that the colored man was inferior to the white.

Mr. RANSIER. I deny that.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I do not allow you to interrupt me. Sit down; I am talking to white men; I am talking to gentlemen.

I shall watch the yeas and nays on this question, not with solicitude—for that it will pass by a large majority would seem scarcely to admit of doubt—but to see whether the division on the vote may not represent the division of parties. This is a proper sequel to the struggle of the democratic party in behalf of slavery.

And now, in the few brief moments I have at command, I shall confine myself to that feature of the question which has been made so prominent by the opposition. I refer to its aspect as a party question. We know that men are apt to be guided in their action by their gratitude or their apprehension, and their apprehension is sometimes the safer guide of the two. By the course of the debate here the question is pressed upon the colored man, to what party shall he lend the aid of his vote and influence? Let him ask himself the questions, What party maintained African slavery in the United States for one hundred years? What party in the United States sought to extend slavery into the entire Union? What party succeeded in their efforts in that direction to exact from the highest tribunal in the land a formal judicial decision that the colored man had no rights that a white man was bound to respect? What party, failing in the arts of politics to succeed in their efforts for the extension of slavery, resorted to the issues of war—that marshaled armies, and fought battles, and sacrificed human life, and destroyed property, created widows and orphans and brought upon the nation such woes as no enlightened people ever before suffered—for the single but infamous object of extending and perpetuating the slavery of the colored race? What party established the black laws of the slave States, by which marriage was made a nullity, the domestic relations a farce, by which the mother was deprived of her rights of maternity and robbed of an opportunity of exercising natural affection toward her offspring; that separated husband and wife and sold both and all like cattle in the market; that contemned the laws of modesty and virtue between the sexes, and made a traffic of female charms for the rewards of money? What party, in violation of the articles of war, assassinated and burnt and murdered the surrendered prisoners of Fort Pillow? Coming nearer my own home, in the city of New York, what party hung the colored man to the lamp-post, burned him over with kerosene, nailed to his breast-bone derisive placards, drove him from the streets into the protection of the police, and denied him in all forms the right to live which was at the same time accorded to the brute creation? If they know such a party, they will recognize in it the great enemy of their race; and they will not need to be advised not to give it their countenance and support.

On the other hand, if they know a party whose doctrines and whose measures have been uniformly for five and twenty years hostile to slavery and friendly to emancipation, if they know a party which during the fearful war of the rebellion, supported the Government, gave of their means, risked and sacrificed their lives in the field of battle by thousands and hundreds of thousands, and finally triumphed in the war which achieved the emancipation of their race, following political action by constitutional enactments intended and calculated to secure that freedom and equality forever; if they know such a party, whose great leader now was their great leader then, whose sword cut the rivet of their shackles, whose cannon blew away those shackles utterly and forever, they will not need to be advised to what party to accord their influence and their votes.

CHEAP TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE obtained leave to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD remarks on cheap transportation.

And then, on motion of Mr. PARKER, of Missouri, (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. MYERS: The petition of Margaret Young, widow of John Young, late of the United States Marine Corps, for commutation money which was due her said husband under the artificial-limb act.

By Mr. WALDRON: The petition of G. F. Spence and others, of Oakville, Michigan, asking that all mail matter be prepaid at office of mailing.

Also, the petition of L. B. Christie, and others, of Monroe County, Michigan, soldiers of the late war, for equalization of bounties.

By Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont: The petition of William H. H. Buck, of Middlesex, Vermont, praying for a pension.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 12, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Attorney-General, communicating, in obedience to a resolution of the Senate, the number of officers and employés in or connected with the Department of Justice who have been furnished with official postage-stamps; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FENTON presented the petition of the Saint Paul's Methodist Episcopal church, of New York City, signed by the pastor, Rev. Cyrus D. Foss, and other officers of the church; and the petition of the Social Union of the Society of Friends, of Ghent, New York, signed by its officers, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the petition of the First Baptist church of Melrose, Massachusetts, signed by the pastor, Rev. Almond Barrelle, and officers of the church; the petition of L. C. Howard and other citizens of Sutton, Massachusetts; the petition of John Tobias and other citizens of Boston, Massachusetts; and the petition of the Universalist church of Waltham, Massachusetts, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a petition of citizens of Michigan, praying for the extension of the postal money-order system to every post-office in the United States, and a reduction of the rates; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented the petition of M. B. Nash and 51 others of Kent County, Michigan; the petition of Frank M. Smith and 100 others, of Barry County, Michigan; and the petition of Bradford Smith and 76 others, of Detroit, Michigan, praying Congress to enact a general law prohibiting to the extent of its constitutional powers the traffic in intoxicating liquors to be used as a beverage; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Trempealeau County, Wisconsin, praying Congress to enact a general law prohibiting to the extent of its constitutional powers the traffic in intoxicating liquors to be used as a beverage; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of P. T. Stiles, William Cross, and 82 others, of Genesee County, Michigan; the petition of M. D. L. Rowley, C. S. Shaw, and 22 others, of Chester, Eaton County, Michigan; the petition of Jacob Dingman, George Kemp, and 76 others, of Sault Ste. Marie, Michigan; the petition of H. N. Norton, Samuel Rood, and 46 others, of Pontiac, Oakland County, Michigan; the petition of Bradley Crippen and 72 others, of Geneva, Van Buren County, Michigan; and the petition of M. V. Brown and 82 others, of Saint John's, Michigan, praying Congress to enact a general law prohibiting to the extent of its constitutional powers the traffic in intoxicating liquors to be used as a beverage; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of G. W. Warner and other citizens of Indiana, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LOGAN presented a petition of John Allen and other citizens of Chicago, Illinois, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of citizens of Chicago, Illinois, praying the repeal of the act fixing a tax of 10 per cent. on the circulation of State banks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, presented the petition of Charles Nohler and other, citizens of Michigan, praying that the "Chinese indemnity fund," so called, be appropriated for the education of the Chinese on the Pacific Coast; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. RAMSEY presented the petition of Bishop H. B. Whipple and other citizens of Minnesota, praying for the establishment of a system of education on board the naval men-of-war, including the rudimental branches of an English education, nautical science, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the federal council of the International Workingmen's Association of North America, asking for the establishment of savings-banks in connection with the Post-Office Department; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONOVER presented the petition of Duval Division No. 1, Sons of Temperance, of Jacksonville, Florida, and the petition of the Lake City, Florida, Division, No. 4, Sons of Temperance, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented a memorial of citizens of Tioga County, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt act, and praying a modification of the same; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of a committee from the American Institute of Homeopathy, a medical society of more than 1,200 members, resident in various parts of the United States, asking an extension of the signal service so as to obtain information for the benefit of the public health; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Rev. C. S. Woodruff and other officers of the Temple of Honor and Temperance of the State of New Jersey, and the petition of the Grand Division and of subordinate associations of the Sons of Temperance of the State of New Jersey, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of the Farmers' Club of the American Institute of New York, suggesting amendments to the so-called forest laws; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

He also presented the petition of E. Mellach, praying for relief for himself and sureties from all responsibility on account of alleged embezzlements, and the petition of citizens of New Jersey for the reappointment of E. Mellach to his former position of passed assistant paymaster in the Navy; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented the petition of M. Malone and many other citizens of Winooski, Vermont, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM presented the petition of the Good Templars of New Haven, Connecticut, signed by officers and members, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I also present the memorial of Cyrus Winthrop and other citizens of Connecticut, asking that the fund in the Treasury of the United States, known as the Chinese indemnity fund, be appropriated for the education of Chinese youth in the Pacific States. I take this occasion to say that if that fund is not returned to the Chinese government, I know of no better use that can be made of it than that indicated by these memorialists. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to suggest that that subject has always gone to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the question, I should say, is primarily one for that committee; and I will call attention to the fact that not very long ago that committee, after a very careful consideration of the whole question, reported a bill to the Senate returning the money to China. It was felt, after the most careful inquiry and consideration of testimony and public opinion throughout our own country, that the most equitable course was to return the money to China.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Then I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the petition of many citizens residing in Fulton, Oswego County, New York—citizens of African descent—praying the passage of a law which will put an end to that condition of things under which, because they are citizens of African descent, they cannot travel upon railroads, steamboats, or stages, without being subjected to inconvenience, proscription, and insult; nor can they apply for accommodation at a public inn without being uncivilly treated. I believe bills upon this subject are before the Committee on the Judiciary, and therefore I move the reference of this petition to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, attested by its officers, suggesting amendments, three in character, and, perhaps, three in number, to the bankrupt law. The judgment of the chamber is that the bankrupt act, in place of being repealed altogether, should be so amended as to require a larger representation of creditors in number and amount in order to enforce compulsory bankruptcy; second, that bona fide purchasers and dealers with those who become bankrupts should be protected, as they are not now protected, in their rights; and third, that the expenses now incident to bankruptcy proceedings should be cut down and guarded. I move that the memorial lie on the table, as the bill on that subject has been reported.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also the proceedings of a public meeting held in the city of Utica, New York, and participated in very generally by all classes of the community, praying for the absolute repeal of the bankrupt act. I move that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of J. H. Kellogg and other citizens of Troy, New York, and the petition of the Delaware Division of the Sons of Temperance of Franklin, New York, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Phœbe Riker, praying to be allowed arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BAYARD presented the memorial of Charlotte S. Dupont and others, heirs of General A. Henderson, late of the United States Marine Corps, asking to be allowed the difference between the pay of a colonel and that of a brigadier-general, on account of services rendered by General Henderson from January 1, 1846, to January 6, 1851; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SARGENT presented the petition of the Grand Division of the Sons of Temperance of California, signed by its officers, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SARGENT. I also present the petition of Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Miss Susan B. Anthony, asking that the same protection be extended to women in their right to vote that is now enjoyed by colored men. They recite that as the United States Constitution as it is, with all its recent amendments and the laws to enforce them, does not, in the opinion of the Supreme Court judges, guarantee such protection in the several States, they demand of Congress further legislation that shall secure to women their civil and political rights. I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I trust that it will receive early attention, and that appropriate legislation will be the result.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. I present the memorial of the National Board of Trade, calling attention to six several points in which the existing bankrupt law should be speedily modified, and also praying for a general revision of the bankrupt act of 1867 by a commission to consist of the Attorney-General of the United States and seven merchants, bankers, and manufacturers. The latter clause of this petition, I suppose, might be appropriately referred to the Judiciary Committee, as it relates to future amendments to the law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SCOTT presented the petition of the State Temperance Union of Pennsylvania, signed by James Black, president, and Rev. D. A. Babcock, secretary, and the petition of James M. Fox and other citizens of Bucks County, Pennsylvania, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOWE presented the petition of R. S. Kneeland and other citizens of Hartford, Wisconsin, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of Joseph H. Miller and a large number of other citizens of Springborough, Ohio, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CLAYTON presented a memorial of the Legislature of Arkansas, in favor of an increase of mail service on route 7509, in the State of Arkansas; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Arkansas, in favor of further donations of lands by Congress in aid of agricultural colleges, as provided by the act of July 2, 1862; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Arkansas, in favor of the enactment of a civil-rights law; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Arkansas, in favor of the removal of the Red River raft; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Arkansas, in favor of an appropriation by Congress for the improvement of Petit Jean River in that State, so as to make it navigable; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Arkansas, in favor of the adjustment, settlement, and payment of the alleged claim of the Southern Methodist publishing house, of Nashville, Tennessee, for the use of their building and property by the United States in 1864 and 1865; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I present the memorial of a large number of merchants and others doing business in Boston, protesting against the repeal of the national bankrupt law, and representing it as a national necessity to secure the interests of both debtor and creditor, protesting especially against leaving settlements subject to the complicated machinery of conflicting State laws.

The same gentlemen who have signed this memorial and protest are also, most of them, members of the Boston Board of Trade, and they have at the same time united in a resolution that—

> Inasmuch as we consider a uniform bankrupt law essential to the safety and prosperity of the trade of the United States, we earnestly protest against the repeal of the act of 1867, but recommend that it be amended in such a manner as to reduce the expenses of bankruptcy, and secure more prompt settlement of bankrupt estates.

I move that this memorial, with the paper which I have read, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on the Judiciary having reported on this subject, such memorials have been laid on the table.

Mr. SUMNER. Then let this lie on the table.

It was so ordered.

Mr. SUMNER. I also present the petition of the Methodist Episcopal church of West Quincy, Massachusetts, signed by its pastor, asking for the appointment of a commission concerning the liquor traffic; also another petition of the same character from the Congregational church of Quincy, Massachusetts; also another petition of the same character from the First Universalist church of Quincy, Massachusetts; also another petition of the same character from Saint Paul's Methodist Episcopal church of Lynn, Massachusetts; also another petition of the same character from Saint John's Roman Catholic church of Quincy, Massachusetts; and also another petition of the same character from the Methodist church of Quincy Point, Massachusetts; and another petition of the same character from the First Presbyterian church of Boston, Massachusetts. I move the reference of these petitions to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FLANAGAN presented the petition of Simon Celaya, praying compensation for rent of building at Brownsville, Texas, during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KELLY presented the petition of R. Bird, Jacob Ormsby, and a large number of other citizens of the State of Oregon, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BOGY presented the petition of Matthew Woodruff, late of Company G, Twenty-first Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, praying for an honorable discharge from the Army, and to be allowed back pay and bounty; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Bordeau and Lamoureaux, praying indemnity for depredations committed by Sioux Indians in 1865; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented the petition of W. H. Moore & Co., praying compensation for depredations committed by the Cheyenne Indians in 1869 upon their property; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DENNIS presented the petition of H. Price, and other citizens of Baltimore, Maryland, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. NORWOOD presented the petition of the Grand Lodge of Good Templars of the State of Georgia, signed by its officers, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MERRIMON presented the petition of C. G. Barbee, praying compensation for mail service rendered in North Carolina in the year 1861; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, presented the petition of Julius Converse and other citizens of Woodstock, Vermont, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WEST presented the petition of Mrs. Angela Dauzat, wife of Eugene Brocbaud, praying compensation for thirty-three bales of cotton taken by the Federal fleet under command of Admiral Porter at Port De Russey, on the Red River, on the 16th of March, 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WEST. I also beg leave to present joint resolutions of the Legislature of Louisiana in reference to Hon. P. B. S. Pinchback, United States Senator-elect from the State of Louisiana, and ask to have them read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolutions relative to Hon. P. B. S. Pinchback, United States Senator-elect from the State of Louisiana.

Whereas this General Assembly, at its session of 1873, did proceed, as provided in the constitution and laws, to elect Hon. P. B. S. Pinchback United States Senator from the State of Louisiana for the term beginning March 4, 1873; and whereas certain parties politically and personally hostile to him have made his claim to a seat in the United States Senate, by virtue of said election, the occasion of virulent and malicious personal assaults, using the journals of the country to disseminate the same to his detriment; and whereas the repetition of these slanders is a reflection upon us no less than upon Senator Pinchback: As a matter of justice to him and to the General Assembly, therefore,

Be it resolved by the senate of the State of Louisiana, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That we have full and unabated confidence in the integrity of Hon. P. B. S. Pinchback, Senator-elect from the State of Louisiana; and that not only as the legally elected Senator of said State, but as a citizen whose manliness and great public services entitle him to our respect, we urge his immediate admission to his seat in the Senate of the United States.

Be it further resolved, That a copy of this resolution be furnished by the governor to Senator Pinchback and also to Senator J. R. WEST, to be presented to the Senate of the United States as expressive of the sense and will of the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana.

C. C. ANTOINE,
Lieutenant-Governor and President of the Senate.
CHARLES W. LOWELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Approved January 7, 1874.

WILLIAM P. KELLOGG,
Governor of Louisiana.

The resolutions were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. OGLESBY presented the petition of the officers and members of the Saint Clair Pharmaceutical Association of Southern Illinois, for the repeal of the thirteenth section of the act of July 13, 1866, imposing a stamp tax on medicines sold at retail; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, presented the petition of Benjamin F. Weishampel and others, citizens of Baltimore, Maryland, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, presented the petition of John May and other citizens of Winthrop, Maine, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of Joshua Herrick, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CAMERON presented the petition of the religious society of Progressive Friends, of Longwood, Chester County, Pennsylvania, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAMERON. I also present a memorial from certain Mennonites, the representatives of many Russians, who desire an appropriation of public lands for their own use. By its reading it will be better understood than I can explain it. I ask that it be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned, belonging to the Christian denomination called Mennonites, of South Russia and Prussia, in our own behalf and that of our brethren, respectfully address the following to you:

For three generations our denomination has lived in Russia under their own control, free to enjoy, as a separate colony, our own religion, language, lands, and customs, the Russian government only interfering to punish crimes and collect its revenues. Now, by a recent edict of the Russian government, passed 4th (16th) June, 1871, we are deprived of all of those rights, liberties, and privileges which had been granted to us forever, and the choice is presented to us of leaving Russia within ten years from the above-mentioned date, or after that time become Russianized in language and religion. In Prussia, where we lived for more than two hundred years in the liberty of conscience, the government acted the same.

We have determined to emigrate to some country where we can enjoy civil, social, and religious liberty.

By examining your Constitution and country we find the full assurance that, under your Constitution and laws, we shall find the liberty we so earnestly desire, and the sentiment expressed by President Grant, in his message of March 3, 1873, gives us great encouragement.

Desirous of settling in your country in colonies, there is, however, one obstacle in the way: the unimproved lands which we would be likely to select for our future homes being owned in alternate sections by railroads and the Government, if we should purchase from the railroad companies, some of the sections belonging to the Government would be taken up by persons who do not belong to our colony and who are not in sympathy with us. Besides this, our mode of farming is for fifteen or twenty families to join together on a large tract of land, and to have portions of it set aside for common pasture, where all the horses and cattle may graze together, kept by one herder. This saves much expense in fencing.

It will require time—no doubt the eight years yet open for migration—before all property in Russia can be disposed of, business finally settled, and the last of our brethren brought to their new home.

In behalf, therefore, of our brethren, numbering between forty and fifty thousand, we would respectfully ask:

1. That, if we select portions of railroad lands in different places suitable to our different wants as cattle-raisers, agriculturists, &c., we be allowed to take up and secure the sections of Government lands lying adjacent thereto, either by purchase or under the homestead laws, and to reserve the same until the year 1881.

2. If we find unoccupied bodies of land belonging to the Government, suited to our purposes, that we be allowed the same privilege of taking up and securing a sufficient quantity of land protected from the interference of outside parties.

The Canadian government has offered to present us as much land as we would occupy, within the before-mentioned time, but a party of us would prefer to settle in the United States, if the opportunity is given us to locate in colonies.

Our only object being to care for those in distress, should there be anything in our petition looking like speculation, we beg you will prevent it.

"Justice exalts a nation," says the word of God; and if you will use your great influence to promote this mission and assist the emigration of those who are persecuted for conscience' sake, you will have the deepest thanks of the sorrow-stricken Mennonites of Russia and Prussia, and what is much more, the blessings of Him who says that even a drink of cold water shall not be without reward.

We are, with high estimation,

SOME OF THE EMIGRANTS FROM RUSSIA AND PRUSSIA, CALLED MENNONITES.

P. S.—Our residence being transitory, if any reference should be required we beg to address to our brethren, Rev. Amos Herr, Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, and John F. Funk, Elkhart, Indiana, who are in sympathy with us and conversant with our movements.

Before the reading of the paper had been concluded,

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Mr. President, it appears on the face of that memorial that it is from citizens or subjects of a foreign government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut objects to receiving the petition.

Mr. CAMERON. I wish the Senator would let it be read through.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I have no objection to its being read. I shall object, however, to its being received.

Mr. CAMERON. Let it be read, and I will ask afterward that it be received.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will proceed.

Mr. SUMNER. I suppose it can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I have no objection to its reading, but I shall object to its reception.

Mr. SUMNER. Perhaps it is important to put the objection on record so that other petitions of the same character may not be received as of course.

The Chief Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the memorial.

Mr. CAMERON. My intention is to have the memorial referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and I trust there will be no objection to that.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I object to the reception of the petition.

Mr. CAMERON. I think the Senator will not object when I shall have said a word about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the petition cannot be received. It will be returned to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CAMERON. I trust I shall be allowed to say a few words. These people can hardly be called subjects of the empire of Russia. They have been told that they may have eight years to leave that country and settle themselves wherever they please; but if they remain longer than that they must undergo all the penalties which are prescribed by the decree of which they speak. They are a peace people and never go to war. About one hundred and fifty years ago a large colony of them came into Pennsylvania. Mr. Penn gave them as much land as they thought proper to take at a shilling an acre. They have made the best farmers we have in Pennsylvania. They have sent their descendants into Ohio, Michigan, and various other States of the Northwest. Everywhere they are a peaceful, quiet people. Between forty and fifty thousand of these people desire to come here and become citizens as their brethren did one hundred and fifty years ago. I cannot see why there should be any objection on the part of my friend the Senator from Connecticut to allowing the petition to be received.

Mr. MORTON. May I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania how many of these people propose to immigrate to this country?

Mr. CAMERON. Between forty and fifty thousand. One of the elders of the church called on me and had a long conversation with me, and I became very much interested in their case. They desire to come here. As they say in their petition, they were offered from the government of Canada any amount of land they pleased to choose, without cost; but they prefer our laws and our Constitution, and desire to become citizens of the United States. Taking the example of the success of their brethren in Pennsylvania, they want to settle upon the public lands of the great Northwest.

Mr. SUMNER. May I ask the Senator, what does he suggest now that we should do?

Mr. CAMERON. I suggest that this matter shall go to the Committee on Public Lands, and that we shall sell to these people, at a fair price, the number of acres of land that they desire to have. Let them pay what other people pay. They are willing to do so. That is all they ask.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask the Senator whether on the whole it would not be expedient for him to introduce a resolution instructing the Committee on Public Lands to make an inquiry touching this case, setting forth in the resolution all the substantial facts. I believe such a resolution would be in entire conformity with the rules of the Senate and its usage, whereas the reference of such a petition, I am sorry to say, is contrary to the usage of the Senate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suppose the Senator from Pennsylvania could petition, himself, on the subject; he is a native-born citizen.

Mr. MORTON. I was about to make the same suggestion that has been made by the Senator from Massachusetts, I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will do that.

Mr. CAMERON. I shall do so, then.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think this is a little different from a petition from foreigners. It is a petition of persons who desire to become citizens of the United States and who ask for certain privileges under our laws and institutions. I do not wish to see the practice of the Senate upon the subject broken down; and if the object can be reached in the way suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, perhaps it would be as well; but I see a marked distinction between this petition and those which we have refused to receive because they came from foreigners.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is such a distinction, undoubtedly; but this is a petition from the subjects of foreign nations, which, under the rules of the Senate, cannot be received, as the Chair understands the rules, if objection be made.

Mr. CAMERON. If the technicality be insisted upon, which I think had better not be observed in this case, I will meet it in the other way and present a petition on the subject myself.

Mr. MORTON. I present a petition signed by a number of citizens of Jeffersonville, Indiana, asking the appointment of a commission of inquiry of five or more persons, whose duty it shall be to inquire and take testimony as to the results of the traffic in alcoholic liquors in connection with crime, pauperism, and public health, and the moral, social, and intellectual well-being of the people. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of James P. Gillespie, praying that he be paid the sum of $26,545.33, claimed by him as informer in revenue cases, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. SAULSBURY, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Revolutionary Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the claim of the heirs of Hugh Montgomery, and that the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petition and papers.

On motion of Mr. BOGY, it was Ordered, That Anthony S. Robinson have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. RAMSEY. I have been directed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 798) to establish certain post-routes, to report it with amendments, and to ask the immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent. The bill will be read for information.

Mr. RAMSEY. It is nothing but the post-route bill; and I presume it need not be read unless some one specially desires it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DAVIS. Let it be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I withdraw the call for the reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be reported.

Mr. RAMSEY. The demand for the reading of the bill is withdrawn. There is no legislation in it. It is simply the post-route bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill as in Committee of the Whole will be dispensed with if there be no objection. Is there objection?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not know what the bill is.

Mr. RAMSEY. It is the post-route bill, and there is no legislation at all in it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is it not establishing post-routes by legislation?

Mr. RAMSEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Then there is legislation in the bill. We had better be accurate, and not critical.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to dispensing with the reading of the bill in full?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is the bill reported this morning?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Then I object to its present consideration. Let it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar and printed.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (S. No. 272) for the relief of Bishop & Co., bankers, of Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 5) to supply certain vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be indefinitely postponed; which was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. The same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 35) filling existing vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and with the recommendation that it pass. I ask for the present consideration of the House resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask that that resolution lie over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York objects to proceeding to the consideration of the joint resolution. It will lie over.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1038) for the relief of the estates of Abel Gilbert and William Gerrish, late copartners in business under the style of Gilbert & Gerrish, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 434) making an appropriation for the legislative expenses of Colorado Territory; and it was thereupon signed by the President of the Senate pro tempore.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 273) for the relief of Butler, Miller & Co., and Hawkes, Miller & Co., of Ohio; which was read twice by its title, and, together with the papers in the case on file at the last session, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 274) amendatory of the pre-emption and homestead law; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 275) for the relief of Grace B. Peck; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 276) relating to the several courts in the Territory of Dakota; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 277) making an appropriation of $792.46 due the late James L. Day, of Connecticut, for transporting the mails over post-route 8152; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 278) to provide for the manner of paying annuities to Indian tribes under treaty stipulations or legal enactments; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 279) for the relief of Stephen H. Myers, of Bound Brook, New Jersey; which was read twice by its title, and referred, with accompanying papers, to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PRATT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 280) granting a pension to Thomas Reilly, late a private in Company H, Second Regiment United States Cavalry; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PRATT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 281) ceding to the several States within whose limits they respectively lie the beds of unsurveyed lakes and other bodies of water; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CONOVER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 282) to provide for building a United States custom-house and other public buildings at Tallahassee, Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 283) to provide for building a United States custom-house and other public buildings at Jacksonville, Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 284) to provide for repairing the custom-house at Key West, Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. FENTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 285) to provide for the permanent location of the records and offices of the United States attorneys and marshals, and of the records and clerks' offices of the circuit and district courts of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 286) fixing the pay of civil engineers in the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRIMON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 287) for the relief of C. S. Barbee; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 288) in reference to the carrying of freight and passengers on the Union Pacific Railroad and its branches; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. INGALLS. As this bill refers to the construction of acts already in existence, and provides remedies for wrongs alleged to exist under them, I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, and also that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 289) to locate and establish an assay office at Portland, Oregon; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire in this connection to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Finance to a communication addressed by myself to the Secretary of the Treasury and the answer received from the Director of the Mint, Dr. Linderman. The bill is to provide for a United States assay office at Portland, Oregon. I desire to read the communication addressed by me to the Secretary, and the answer, for the information of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest that the Senator send the communication to the Clerk's desk to be read.

Mr. MITCHELL. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers will be read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER,
Washington, December 15, 1873.

DEAR SIR: The almost universal demand made upon me by the people of the North Pacific coast, by which I mean Oregon, Northern Idaho, Washington Territory, and Alaska, for some Government regulation by which the large amount of gold dust produced annually in this section of country might be reduced to bars without shipment, and by which a fixed value might be placed upon these bars, has induced me to make an attempt in Congress to secure the passage of a law establishing an assay office at Portland, Oregon; and I have entertained the hope that I might secure your recommendation of such a measure and your cheerful co-operation.

It is estimated by those who are in a position to be well informed on the subject that not less than from four to five millions of gold dust come to and pass through Portland, Oregon, annually, and although every facility for assaying by a private assay office is given, a little less than $400,000 are annually assayed there—and why? For the simple reason that gold bars have no fixed value. Bankers and brokers in Portland seldom pay for gold bars within 2 per cent. of their value in San Francisco, although the cost of shipment between the two places is only about one-fourth or three-eighths of one 1 per cent. by Wells, Fargo & Co's. express.

The establishment of an assay office in Portland would obviate all this, by the agent of the Government in charge of the office issuing to the owner of the gold assayed a certificate upon any sub-treasury of the United States for the full Government value of the gold bar, less the charges for transportation to the United States Mint, which would leave a balance in favor of the producer—the man who digs in the mines and who owns the bar—of nearly 2 per cent. But another and a greater evil, and one that affects the prosperity of our whole country, in draining it of its gold, would be remedied by the establishment of this office, and that is this: It is estimated that over $1,000,000 worth of gold dust passes through Portland annually in the hands of Chinamen, and is taken directly out of the country to China. The Chinese can realize more money from their dust in China than they can here.

Valuable gold mines, it is currently reported, have been recently discovered in Alaska. All of Northern Idaho, part of Montana, Washington Territory, and most of Eastern Oregon, draw their supplies from Portland. The mines of Elk City, Florence, Warren's, Salmon River, Snake River, Slate Creek, Miller's Camp, Oro Fino, Pierce City, Newsom Creek, Clear Water, Santioni, Umatilla, and many other camps, as also the mines in Southern and Western Oregon, are now being worked to good advantage, and unquestionably will be by thousands of men for many years to come with fair profit. In these various camps there are engaged not less than fifteen thousand Chinese, who work their own placer claims, either taking up abandoned ground or purchasing claims too low in yield to be worked profitably by white labor. Ground thus taken turns out to be very valuable. It is this class of mines that export from the United States over $1,000,000 annually from this section; a great portion of which could be kept in the country if they could obtain something near its value, and many would prefer to purchase drafts from our bankers on Hong-Kong and Canton, which exchange is needed to pay for the many cargoes of lumber and flour which we export by ships sailing directly from the ports of Portland and Puget Sound.

Should an assay office be established in Portland, it would not be necessary, at least not at present, to erect a Government building, as there is ample room for all offices in the new custom-house just completed.

I shall be pleased to have your views in relation to the matter, and inclosed I submit for your consideration a bill which I hope will receive your sanction. An appropriation of $50,000 would be ample to purchase the present private assay office in Portland, the material of which, with a small addition of stock, would make a first-class United States assay office.

Very respectfully,

J. H. MITCHELL.

Hon. W. A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR OF THE MINT,
January 5, 1874.

SIR: Your letter of the 15th ultimo to the Secretary of the Treasury, in reference to the establishment of an assay office at Portland, Oregon, for assaying gold and silver, having been referred to this office, I have the honor to state that the present production of bullion from the mines of the North Pacific coast appears to be sufficient to justify the Government in providing assay facilities at the most convenient point for the accommodation of the same. The city of Portland being the commercial center of that section of the country, and the custom-house affording the necessary room for assay operations, is the place where the proposed office should be located.

Very respectfully,

H. R. LINDERMAN,
Director.

Hon. J. H. MITCHELL, United States Senator,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance, with the letters which have been read, and that the bill and letters be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PROPOSED MENNONITE SETTLEMENT.

Mr. CAMERON. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire whether the circumstances attending the proposed immigration to this country of a colony of Mennonites of South Russia and Prussia would not justify, in their case, the sale of a tract of land larger than is allowed by the homestead law to be sold in one body; and that the committee be further instructed to report such amendments to the land laws as will facilitate the objects had in view by the colonists aforesaid, who propose to settle in this country.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I think the latter part of the resolution had better be changed so as not directly to instruct the committee to bring in such a bill as is mentioned there, but to inquire whether it would not be expedient to do so.

Mr. SUMNER. "To consider the expediency" would be the proper form.

Mr. CAMERON. I have no objection to that change.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified, and the question is on the resolution as modified.

The resolution was adopted.

MINISTER TO SWEDEN AND NORWAY.

Mr. RAMSEY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be directed to inquire into the expediency of advancing the rank of the minister resident to the court of Sweden and Norway to a mission of the first class.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of War, communicating, in obedience to law, a statement of expenditures at the Springfield armory for the year ending June 30, 1873; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1038) for the relief of the estates of Abel Gilbert and William Gerrish, late copartners in business, under the style of Gilbert & Gerrish, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

OFFICIAL SALARIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill (H. R. No. 793) to establish the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates; the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.]

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment offered by myself, and to substitute therefor the amendment which I now hold in my hand. I will state, for the information of Senators, that the amendment which was offered by me did not embrace the ideas which I really had upon the subject. It was not in conformity with the ideas I had set forth in my first remarks. The amendment was gotten up hurriedly, upon the moment, after various changes had been made in the bill, and when I had not time to perfect it. I now hold in my hand the amendment as perfected, embracing the ideas which I really had on this subject, and ask consent of the Senate to withdraw the amendment as it stands, that this may be acted upon in its stead.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment offered by him on a former occasion, and substitute another. Is there objection?

Mr. CONKLING. Let us hear the amendment proposed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read for information.

Mr. GORDON. I will explain to the Senator from New York that this is intended to come in at the end of the first section of the House bill as now perfected.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That from and after this date the salaries of all commissioned officers of the Army and of the Navy whose salaries have been increased since the war, and whose pay and allowances aggregate $3,500 or more, and between that sum and $5,000, shall be, and the same are hereby, reduced 10 per cent.: Provided further, That the pay, including all allowances except mileage as now fixed by law, of brigadier-general, of Paymaster-General, of Surgeon-General, of Inspector-General, of Quartermaster-General, of Commissary-General, of Adjutant-General, and of a commodore of the Navy, shall not exceed during peace the sum of $5,000 per annum: Provided further, That the pay, including all allowances except mileage as now fixed by law, of major-general and of rear-admiral of the Navy during peace shall not exceed $6,000 per annum: Provided further, That the pay, including all allowances except mileage as now fixed by law, of the Lieutenant-General of the Army or of the Vice-Admiral of the Navy shall not exceed during peace the sum of $7,000 per annum: Provided further, That the pay, including all allowances, of the General of the Army and of the Admiral of the Navy shall not during peace exceed $10,000 per annum: Provided further, That the salary of the President of the United States shall be $25,000 per annum after the 3d day of March, 1877, and that the appropriations made for the expenses of the Presidential Mansion shall be, for each of the years 1873, 1874, 1875, and 1876, less than the average amount so appropriated for each of the four years preceding the 4th day of March, 1873, by the sum of $25,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the withdrawal of the original amendment of the Senator from Georgia that the one just read may be substituted for it? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GORDON. I shall detain the Senate but a very few moments.

Mr. BOREMAN. Before the Senator proceeds: The Chair inquired if there was objection. Will an objection throw this amendment over?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An objection will prevent the Senator from Georgia from withdrawing the amendment which he offered, and which was agreed to on a former day.

Mr. GORDON. It will do no good if the Senator pleases to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from West Virginia object?

Mr. BOREMAN. No, sir, I do not object to that.

Mr. GORDON. I shall detain the Senate but a few moments. I propose this amendment to test the sense of the Senate as to the propriety of reducing the salaries, which are exorbitant as compared with those fixed for the legislative department. The amendment gives to each Senator the opportunity of voting upon the salary of each officer. It is not my object to strike down the salaries of junior officers, but only of those officers whose pay has been greatly increased since the war, and are relatively too high. I want, as often stated by me in this debate, real retrenchment. My own opinion is that the salary of no Army officer, whatever be his grade, ought to exceed the salary of a Senator of the United States; certainly it ought not to exceed the salary of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States; and I will give my reasons therefor presently.

Senators in reply to the suggestion that $5,000 for a Senator, as compared with the salaries now fixed for Army officers, was too low, have stated frequently upon this floor that gentlemen of ability could be found who were willing to serve in this body at $5,000.

Mr. President, I apprehend that if the salaries which are proposed in this amendment were to-day fixed by law, no brigadier-general nor major-general nor lieutenant-general, nor any other officer of the Army would resign because of that reduction. I apprehend that any number of able officers can be found, who are the equals possibly of some who now hold these positions, who will be willing to serve at even a less sum than is fixed in this amendment. I believe that statesmen of great ability might be found who would be willing to serve even as the President of the United States at a salary of $10,000.

I make these suggestions to show the irrelevancy of such arguments. The question before us is not how low we can induce gentlemen to serve. We do not propose the sale of public offices of trust and responsibility to the lowest bidder, like a street contract, but the question is, what is a just and legitimate compensation for a Senator and a general? The question is, how are we to secure real retrenchment?

I find, sir, a most anomalous state of things as to salaries under the laws of this country. I find that a rear-admiral or the Vice-Admiral, even upon leave, doing no duty whatever, draws from the Treasury more pay than is allowed by this bill to a Senator or to an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. I find that the salary of the Lieutenant-General is more than double the salary fixed by this bill for a Senator of the United States; and that the salary of the commander of the Army is now double what is allowed to the Chief Justice of the United States.

Now, sir, I wish to repeat what I have already said, that, in my judgment, the salary of no Army officer of any grade ought to exceed the salary of a Senator, and certainly ought not to exceed the pay of a Chief Justice. Why should it? I have yet to hear one good reason given for this discrimination. The one simply obeys and executes the orders of superiors; the other has the gravest responsibilities. The General of the Army but executes the orders of the President, who by the Constitution is the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy.

The legislature is the creator, the military but the creature. The law-maker is superior to the instrument which enforces the law. The superior dignity therefore of this body, as well as its superior responsibility, would seem to demand at least equal emoluments. What reason can be given to satisfy a reasonable mind or to satisfy the country for paying the General of the Army $17,000 and a Senator of the United States $5,000? What citizen will agree that we mean economy while we leave these salaries untouched? Senators ask that this question be postponed to a more opportune time. What more opportune time, sir, will ever present itself than now, while we are upon the subject of salaries, and while the financial distress of the country makes it incumbent upon us to retrench in all directions? Will the opportune time ever come? Already seven or eight years have elapsed since the war, and these salaries are not yet reduced. On the contrary, they have increased by the operation of law and by the action of Congress. If we mean to economize, let us vote for this amendment.

I beg now that the Senate will indulge me in a word of personal explanation. I have been greatly surprised and not a little pained to learn that there had been, or by possibility could be, any misconception of the spirit with which I offered this amendment. I had hoped, sir, that my disclaimer of any intention to disparage the high calling of the soldier in my opening remarks had been sufficiently frank and emphatic to make it impossible that I should be misconstrued. I had hoped that the passions of the past and the prejudices engendered by the war had been so completely banished this Chamber, that a representative of any State in this Union might stand upon this floor and discuss measures looking to the general good with freedom, and without the danger of being misapprehended. But so careful was I, because of the relations which I had hitherto borne, that no word should escape me which by possibility should be construed into an effort to depreciate the calling of the soldier, that I stated then, what I beg to repeat now, that no act of mine, no vote of mine, in time of war or in peace, shall ever be so ambiguous upon this question as to be misconstrued; and hence I ask the privilege of this personal explanation.

I may as well express an opinion here which I have often expressed in private, and which I now repeat in this most public manner, here at the capital of the nation—here in the high court of the representatives of sovereign States or sovereign States, so called—namely, that had the questions which have so disturbed the country been left to the soldiers of the two armies after the surrender we should have had less of ill-will between the sections.

It was my fortune, as the commander of one wing of the southern army at Appomattox, to be selected to confer with the general officers of the Federal Army as to the terms of surrender and parole. Let me state a fact which ought to be recorded as most honorable to the commanders of the successful army. In the long conference between us no word of exultation escaped the lips of these commanders; but, on the contrary, they avoided any semblance of exultation which might increase the grief of the defeated—a grief, compared to the poignancy of which, permit me to say, my heart had never known grief before. So careful were these officers, that they declined to speak of battles in which they had been successful, and with a consideration and deference which deeply impressed me, turned the conversation to engagements in which they themselves had been defeated. I refer to this now, that I may by no possibility be misunderstood now or hereafter. It is related of some defeated commander—who, I do not remember; indeed, I am not sure that he ever said it, but it will serve just as well to illustrate what I have to say as though he had said it. It is related of him that he said of the commander who had defeated him, "Great let me call him, for he conquered me."

Whatever else may be said of me in the future, I trust no man will ever charge me with a lack of generous appreciation for the true soldier of any army. I would scorn to be actuated by the motives which I hear have been attributed to me for the offer of this amendment. The soldiers of both armies can but respect each other. Alike, they were honest, earnest, and true to their convictions. Alike, they endured the fatigue of the march, the privations of the camp, and the lonely bivouac of the picket. Alike, they felt the chagrin of defeat and the glory of victory; and together these soldiers would have united in writing the epitaph of the dead of both armies, "They fell in the discharge of duty." I trust that I have now said enough to forever silence the tongue of calumny, that would attribute motives to me unworthy of any man who ever bore the name of soldier.

In all I have said, in all I have done, my purpose has been to test a great question; not only a question of economy, but a question of the relative dignity of the different departments of this Government. I desired to test the question as to whether we are to stamp the law-making power, the creative power, as inferior to the military power, the created. This is a grave question, and no more opportune time than this will ever come to settle it; and I therefore ask the candid and immediate vote of the Senate upon this amendment. If it is defeated, I shall feel constrained to vote against the bill; for I cannot consent by my vote that the party which has the power to secure real retrenchment shall have the credit of reform without giving the people the reality; nor can I be a party to any programme which permits the unjustifiable discriminations which this amendment seeks to destroy.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, I only desire to say to the Senate that I trust the friends of this bill will assume that all amendments which are foreign to the purpose of the bill are unfriendly to it, and whatever may be their opinion on the abstract question or the propriety of adding a particular thing suggested at a proper time, we shall not have this bill burdened by these foreign amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BOREMAN in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that the amendment may be divided so as to separate the military from the civil provisions that are made, as they are distinct propositions, and let the vote be taken separately on the two branches.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the amendment will be divided. Will the Senator point out the division?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think, on reflection, my asking for a division is in order. I therefore move to amend the amendment by striking out clear down to where it speaks of the President of the United States, being that which covers all the military changes proposed in the law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all of the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, except the last clause, in the following words:

Provided further, That the salary of the President of the United States shall be $25,000 per annum after the 3d day of March, 1877, and that the appropriations made for the expenses of the Presidential Mansion shall be, for each of the years 1873, 1874, 1875, and 1876, less than the average amount so appropriated for each of the four years preceding the 4th day of March, 1873, by the sum of $25,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My motion is to strike out all that precedes the paragraph just read, which relates to regulating the compensation of officers of the Army and Navy, my only object being to get a separate vote upon the two questions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the words proposed to be stricken out be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That after this date the salaries of all commissioned officers of the Army and of the Navy whose salaries have been increased since the war, and whose pay and allowances aggregate $3,500 or more, and between that sum and $5,000, shall be, and the same are hereby, reduced 10 per cent.: Provided further, That the pay, including all allowances except mileage as now fixed by law, of brigadier-general, of Paymaster-General, of Surgeon-General, of Inspector-General, of Quartermaster-General, of Commissary-General, of Adjutant-General, and of a commodore in the Navy, shall not exceed during peace the sum of $5,000 per annum: Provided further, That the pay, including all allowances except mileage as now fixed by law, of major-general and of rear-admiral of the Navy during peace shall not exceed $6,000: Provided further, That the pay, including all allowances except mileage as now fixed by law, of the Lieutenant-General of the Army or of the Vice-Admiral of the Navy shall not exceed during peace the sum of $7,500 per annum: Provided further, That the pay, including all allowances, of the General of the Army or of the Admiral of the Navy shall not, during peace, exceed $10,000 per annum.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. NORWOOD. As I understand the amendment now, it simply applies to the salary of the President and the amount that shall be allowed for the expenses at the White House. Am I correct? This amendment to the amendment strikes out all but that, does it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The effect of the amendment, if agreed to, would be to leave only that proviso in the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 29, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boreman, Boutwell, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Crozier, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Howe, Ingalls, Lewis, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Pratt, Ramsey, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, West, Windom, and Wright—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Brownlow, Cameron, Clayton, Davis, Flanagan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Kelly, McCreery Merrimon, Norwood, Patterson, Robertson, Sargent, Stevenson, Stockton, Sumner, and Tipton—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Ames, Buckingham, Conover, Cooper, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock Johnston, Jones, Morrill of Maine, Ransom, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sprague, Stewart, Thurman, and Wadleigh—22.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia as amended.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to have that reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment now is to insert at the end of the first section of the House bill the following proviso:

Provided further, That the salary of the President of the United States shall be $25,000 per annum after the 3d day of March, 1877, and that the appropriations made for the expenses of the Presidential Mansion shall be, for each of the years 1873, 1874, 1875, and 1876, less than the average amount so appropriated for each of the four years preceding the 4th of March, 1873, by the sum of $25,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not rise to debate this proposition, but only to say that we have had this bill in committee now, under the twenty-eighth rule, ever since we began it, and everybody understands what he wishes to do, whether he understands what other people wish to do or not; and now I move that this bill be reported to the Senate. That does not cut off the amendment of my friend from Georgia, or any other amendment that any gentleman wishes to offer; but to save our doing things over and over again, first in committee and then in the Senate, when we have all understood the bill, I move that the bill be reported to the Senate with this amendment and the others.

Mr. GORDON. Does the Senator from Vermont include this amendment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly; all amendments. So that we can stand in the Senate exactly where we do now, only that we shall have made some progress toward the end of the affair.

Mr. NORWOOD. I wish to inquire whether, if the bill is reported to the Senate, any other amendments will be in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be open to amendment in the Senate after it has been reported.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am not going to oppose the motion; but I want to enter my protest, that whenever a question shall be before the Senate in which I do feel an interest I will object to such a motion.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Is it in order to say a word on this motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly; the question is debatable.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to say a word in reference to this amendment which is now offered, and I shall say very little. The effect of this amendment is to say to the President of the United States: "The Constitution prevents us from reducing your salary to $25,000, but we will pass a law now to take effect at the end of your term, showing that our will is that the salary shall be but $25,000; and we will go further than that; we will reduce the appropriations to the White House $25,000 a year, so as to intimate to you very decidedly, Mr. President, that we are unwilling that you should receive the compensation which Congress has voted you." It is in my opinion a moral repeal of the law. It is doing morally what the Constitution prohibits us from doing by legislation. My objection to reporting this bill to the Senate is, that if we vote upon this amendment now, we shall have an opportunity of reconsidering it in the Senate; but if the bill is reported to the Senate, the vote on it there is final.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Which amendment?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yours.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I must correct my friend. Every amendment that has been adopted or rejected while we have been acting as in Committee of the Whole may be reopened for consideration when the bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have no doubt about that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So that we have to vote again on everything in the Senate; and if we go on in this way in committee for three weeks we shall still be in the same category.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If the bill is reported to the Senate now, before a vote is taken upon the amendment of the Senator from Vermont——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not any amendment pending.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Then I have no objection to the bill going into the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. DAVIS. What is the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That the bill be reported to the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I think, as part of the amendment before the Senate has already been voted on, and now comes the square question as to the salary of the President, that, in justice to the mover of it, it ought to be voted upon; and I hope the Senate will vote upon it squarely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 24, noes 19.

The bill was accordingly reported to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] to the first section of the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. In what shape does that come before us—the amendment as amended?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the amendment as amended.

Mr. PATTERSON. I should like to have the amendment reported.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment; which was to insert at the end of the first section of the House bill the following:

Provided further, That the salary of the President of the United States shall be $25,000 per annum after the 3d day of March, 1877, and that the appropriations made for the expenses of the Presidential Mansion shall be for each of the years 1873, 1874, 1875, and 1876, less than the average amount so appropriated for the four years preceding the 4th of March, 1873, by the sum of $25,000.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask for the yeas and nays on that proposition.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MERRIMON. I inquire of the Chair if the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia contains a proposition which is divisible?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. MERRIMON. If the Chair will permit me, I submit whether the first proposition contained in that amendment is not whether the salary of the President shall be reduced; and, next, whether or not the expenses of the Executive Mansion shall be reduced?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will accomplish his object by moving an amendment to the amendment; but the Chair is of opinion that the amendment of itself is not divisible.

Mr. MERRIMON. Then I move to strike out the first clause, embracing the President's salary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the proposed amendment to the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the amendment by striking out the words "That the salary of the President of the United States shall be $25,000 per annum after the 3d day of March, 1877;" so that if amended, the amendment will read:

Provided further, That the appropriations made for the expenses of the Presidential Mansion shall be for each of the years 1873, 1874, 1875, and 1876, less than the average amount so appropriated for each of the four years preceding the 4th of March, 1873, by the sum of $25,000.

Mr. MERRIMON. Then the proviso will omit so much as applies to the President's salary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will.

Mr. STEVENSON. I rise to a question of order. Is that amendment in order? Does it not interfere with existing legislation?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is in order.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. We are now called upon to determine what the appropriation for the Presidential Mansion shall be for the next three years on a salary bill. That is the logic of this amendment. On a salary bill we are to determine what appropriations will be needed for the next three years, and to make them $25,000 each year less than they are this year, though the expenses may be two or three times as much.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suppose if this provision amounts to anything, it is binding. My friend from Georgia is a lawyer, and I am not; but I suppose if this amendment amounts to anything, it prohibits Congress from making above a certain amount of appropriation; and if Congress in its wisdom should make larger appropriations this law would be in the face of it. If that is not so, it does not amount to anything at all. Now, suppose the White House should burn down, we cannot build a new one, if this provision would amount to anything. If it does not amount to anything I think it would be great nonsense for us to pass it; if it does amount to anything it is saying to the Representatives who shall be elected after our seats are vacated that they shall not pass certain laws.

Mr. BAYARD. I think the Senator from Rhode Island is distinctly right. The amendment, so far as it relates to the power of this Congress to restrict succeeding Congresses in respect to the appropriations for the support of the Executive Mansion is mere brutum fulmen. I do not say it was intended to be such; but with my high appreciation of the intelligence of the source from which it came, I can scarcely believe that it was intended to be in earnest. It is saying to future Congresses, "You shall be prohibited by our action from judicious appropriations, which shall be dictated by the circumstances under which you may find yourselves placed hereafter." So far, then, as it is an attempt on the part of the present Congress to limit other Congresses in respect of lawful appropriations, I say it is beyond our power—to use the phrase of my profession, simply ultra vires—in the present Congress to attempt it; and therefore I shall not vote for it.

And, sir, I shall not vote, at this time at least, for this prospective reduction of the presidential pay. A year ago, when the subject was proposed, I looked at it, using the best of my judgment as to what I would say, as a representative here, is a proper sum to be paid to the President of the United States as his salary. It was raised in great respect—almost veneration—for the character of the men by whom this Government was founded. I believed that but seldom in human history had men more tried by affliction and elevated by their troubles and their trials come together to frame a government than our forefathers who framed the Constitution under which we live. Certainly there was no disposition for idle extravagance, no disposition for mere show. Economy and simplicity marked the establishment of their Government in every feature. And what did they do at that time, with a community of some three million of poor people in the scantily-populated Colonies along the Atlantic sea-board? What did they, at that time, fix as the proper pay of their Chief Magistrate? Twenty-five thousand dollars in 1789 was no more immoderate and was no more moderate than $100,000 would be at the present time. Mr. President, the people of this country have, and well may have, confidence in the moderation, the self-control, the honesty, and the virtue of George Washington. If at that time, in the simplicity of the life of that day, he conceived it right and proper that he should draw from the Treasury his entire salary, and expend it, together, I apprehend, with other money of his private resources, surely it is proper that an equivalent, or something near an equivalent, should be paid to his successors in office.

I may say this more properly, if such considerations should be supposed to come in, because I act with a party differing toto cœlo in regard to all political measures with the present occupant of the Executive chair. Fifty thousand dollars is not more than equal in its purchasing power to-day to $12,500 in 1787; and I did concede, and I concede to-day, that the salary of $50,000 for the President of the United States is a moderate, just compensation. I voted for it last spring, and I would vote for it again to-day. Therefore I shall vote against this proposed amendment, which while it recognizes the fact that under the Constitution the salary of the President of the United States cannot be diminished during his term of office, and therefore it is well understood that no sudden spasm of economy, no sudden response to what is believed to be a strong public opinion on this subject, can effect anything at present, yet proposes to effect something four years hence. Sir, the men who shall be in this Chamber and in the other House of Congress four years hence will be responsible for their action at that time. If the voice of the country, after this experiment of an advance in salary for four years, shall still be in favor of a more rigid economy, of still greater simplicity in the Executive mode of life, the men of 1877 or 1878 will be quite as competent to deal with it, and to deal with it in a much better sense of their personal responsibility for their votes, than we can do to-day

I should like to ask gentlemen of this body far more experienced than I in legislation whether such a proposition as this has any precedent at all in our legislative history. I apprehend not. We are undertaking to fix a salary three or four years from the date at which we vote. It is perfectly plain that if a remedy be needed it can best be applied when the time arrives for it. You cannot reduce the present occupant's pay; the Constitution forbids that; and whether it did or not I would not vote for it, because upon my responsibility as a representative here I believe the present pay to be moderate, reasonable, and proper. I voted for the increase of pay because I object to this eking out of insufficient salaries by irregular allowances. I know such are made, and will be made, so long as salaries fall short of their due proportions; and one of my motives in voting to increase the legitimate salary of the President was that there should be an end of irregular, not to say illegitimate, allowances in connection with his support at the Executive Mansion.

For the reasons thus hastily given I shall oppose this amendment by my vote; and I wished to give some of my reasons before casting it.

Mr. GORDON. I think my friend from Delaware misapprehends the force of this amendment entirely. I understood my friend the other day to state that he voted for the reduction of the salaries of Senators because the public demanded it. If I know anything of the public sentiment on this question it demands equally the reduction of all salaries that were raised by that law. And the effect of this amendment is immediate, and not four years hence, as my friend seems to think. The provisions of this amendment are that the appropriations henceforward from now shall be less than they have been heretofore, so as to equalize the future pay with the previous pay; in other words, putting the salary of the President where the bill puts the salaries of Senators—just where the law of last March found it when it was passed.

Mr. BAYARD. The honorable Senator surely is mistaken. It cannot be contemplated by any amendment here to reduce the salary of the President of the United States in presenti. The Constitution strictly forbids that.

Mr. GORDON. It is not reducing the salary at all. It is simply making the amount of money which shall come out of the Treasury for these different departments equal to the amount of money which did come out of the Treasury before the passage of the law of the 3d of March last. It is not reducing the pay that goes into the President's pocket, but it is reducing the appropriations that go to the President's house. And I am unable to see, if the Senator will pardon me, that this amendment is obnoxious to the objection he suggests in view of the Constitution, when the bill which we are now about to act upon has precisely the same effect. I am unable to see why it is not competent for Congress to say that money shall not be appropriated to the White House just as easily as we can say that money shall not be appropriated to pay Senators and Representatives. I see no provision in the Constitution or in the law which would make any distinction between the two.

Mr. BAYARD. Why, Mr. President, is it not perfectly plain that when you fix an annual salary, and ascertain and establish it by law, you are simply doing what is customary in letting men know before they take an office what shall be their compensation during their term, and in case of the President that it shall not be lowered or diminished during his term? But when you speak of annual appropriations upon what do you base them? You base the appropriation upon the necessities of the year. They are required to be annual. They are not for four years, but for one year, and each year must prescribe the amount required for its own purposes. As suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island, suppose a conflagration takes place, and part of the equipment of the Presidential Mansion is destroyed by fire, or a part of the equipment of any other of our Executive Departments, the Treasury or the State Department, is destroyed by fire; common sense would say that in the year when such an accident took place and such destruction of property occurred, there must necessarily be an increased appropriation to meet the deficit. Every one who comes to Washington goes to the Executive Mansion as a matter of right. It is kept in order at the public cost for the benefit of the public. Every one knows that fact. It does not require to be furnished each year, and therefore there is sometimes in one year a great outlay, which, the year following, is diminished because of the appropriation that preceded it. Therefore it is the custom in the legislation of this country to make annual appropriations, which are based upon the estimates of the Departments, approved by the committees of each House, which are the organs of their respective bodies; and they, making due examination, report to the Houses, and the measures are debated and the requirements of each year are provided for by annual bills. Therefore I say, as this is the custom, there is no reason why now we should look in advance and say that for four years to come appropriations shall only reach a certain limit, when, as each House would have proper control over the subject when the question arises, the amount to be appropriated would be determined just as well for 1875, when that year arrives, as it will be for 1874, when that year arrives. I am ready and willing to vote for an economical administration and an economical appropriation for 1874. Let it be shown that a large sum is not required, and I will gladly vote for the smallest sum that shall be necessary to accomplish the object. But I do not propose to say now that in 1875 only as much shall be spent as was spent in 1874, because the Congress of 1875 will be quite as competent to judge of that, and will have much better knowledge whereupon to judge, than I can have at the present time.

Now, sir, one word as to the question why I voted or did not vote upon the subject of the salaries of Congress. I do not propose to fatigue this body by reiterating my views on that subject; I gave them at large, and they are in print. Perhaps it would be a matter of little curiosity or interest to anybody to know what I did say on that subject; but my friend from Georgia will find that he can scarcely place my reasons for voting for or against the salary bill upon the mere matter of public demand.

Mr. GORDON. I beg my friend's pardon if I misunderstood him. I understood him to say that he thought the salary fixed for Senators was not too much, but that, in consideration of the public demand, he would vote to repeal the law.

Mr. BAYARD. I gave a great many reasons which I do not propose to repeat, and which I can hand my honorable friend for his satisfaction in a much better form—in print. My reasons were given frankly and at some length. I do not care to repeat them. The question of fixing my own pay or the question of fixing the pay of Congress rests upon very broad considerations, that I do not think apply to the case of a single office like that of the Executive. However, I propose to discuss each matter by itself. I have stated my position in regard to the pay of the Executive, and I have stated my reasons of objection to the present amendment, and I shall be satisfied to follow the impression of my mind on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLAYTON in the chair.) The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.]

Mr. SAULSBURY. I concur in the view expressed by my colleague, that we cannot by our action in reference to the appropriation made for the White House bind any future Congress. I suppose if we were to pass a law to-day saying that there shall not be appropriations made in 1875 beyond $10,000 for the Executive Mansion, any other session of Congress prior to that time might repeal that provision. But, sir, the question immediately before the Senate is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina, to strike out that portion of the amendment of the Senator from Georgia reducing the compensation of the President to $25,000 after March 4, 1877. I shall vote against that amendment, because, as I said a day or two ago, I believe if there is any feature of the law passed at the last Congress to which the people of this country object, and which is objectionable in itself, it is that feature which increases the salary of the President from $25,000 to $50,000 per annum. I shall, therefore, vote against the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, and I am not deterred from it by the objection that was raised by my friend the Senator from New Jersey, that it would be a reflection upon the President of the United States. Sir, in the performance of duty I hope I am not to be deterred either by what may please or what may displease the President or any other living man. I do not intend it as a reflection upon the President; I do not intend that it shall have that effect, nor do I believe that it would have that effect. Here I am called upon to say whether the present salary of $50,000 shall be continued after the expiration of the term of the present incumbent. Upon that question, having firm and decided convictions that the salary is too large at present for the executive officer of the Government, I shall vote unhesitatingly that, after the 4th of March, 1877, the salary of the President of the United States shall be but $25,000 a year.

Now, sir, what objection could the President rationally take to such action? I think the time has not come when the Senate is to bow down to the pleasure of the Executive in reference to the performance of its duty which does not pertain to him. While I would defer to the President in everything that pertains to his own position and to the performance of his own duties, I hope never to see the time when the will or the pleasure of the Executive of this country shall shape the action of this high body.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask the Senator a question before he sits down?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to ask him, as a lawyer rather than in any other character, am I to understand from the Senator's observations that he affirms as a lawyer that passing a section now declaring that the presidential salary shall or shall not be of a certain amount after March, 1877, is of the slightest effect whatever, any more than a resolution passed by this body would be, or a speech made in the air, by those who vote for it?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do say that the Congress of the United States may declare that, from and after the 4th of March, 1877, the salary of the President of the United States shall be but $25,000, and it would be as valid as any law which the Congress of the United States can enact, so long as it remains on the statute-book.

Mr. CONKLING. Of course the Senator cannot suppose that I asked him that question. I am talking about things, not about words.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I answered the question.

Mr. CONKLING. If, when 1877 comes, a majority of Congress choose to say, either by negative or positive action, as the case may be, that $25,000 shall be the salary, it will be. We all know that. The Senator need not tell me that. But my question is whether, aside from what the two Houses may do when the time comes, either by leaving it $25,000, or making it $25,000, or saying what it shall be—whether, aside from what shall result from that action, positive or negative, when the time comes, the Senator means that the slightest value legally is to be attached to what we may say now ought to be the law then?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I certainly must have been very unfortunate if the distinguished Senator from New York could have understood me to say that an act which we passed at the last session of Congress may not be repealed at a subsequent session of Congress. Sir, I am not such a novice as to suppose that the behests of this session of Congress are as firm as the eternal decrees. Far from it. But here I am called upon, and the proposition is now presented to the Senate, to declare what shall be the salary of the President after the 4th of March, 1877; and why are we so called upon? Because at the last session of Congress we increased the salary of the President from $25,000 to $50,000, and the public sentiment of this country has compelled the action of the Congress of the United States in reference to that bill, so far as it affects themselves, and so far, I believe, as the public expression has been heard, it has been heard with as much condemnation as of anything else of the action of Congress at the last session in enhancing and increasing the salary of the President. I propose, now that this question is here, to put myself exactly square upon the record, and to say that, so far as my vote shall go, the President's salary, after the termination of the present term of the present incumbent, shall be what it was originally, $25,000.

It has been intimated that this would be a reflection upon the President of the United States. Not at all. The present President could still draw his salary at the rate of $50,000 per annum; no one could object to it; because he would have the perfect legal right to do it; and as to the consideration of the moral question, whether he could morally do it, I propose to leave that exactly where the law would leave it, with the President himself.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I have said more than once during this debate that my sincere desire was to place the law in reference to the compensation of members of Congress as nearly where it was before the act of March 3, 1873, was passed as it was possible for Congress to do, and I have assigned the reasons that move to that course, and I do not propose to repeat them now.

It is competent for Congress now to pass an act reducing the compensation of members of Congress from this time forward; and I am prepared to vote for that proposition, and to place the pay at just what it was before the act increasing the compensation was passed. But, sir, it is not competent for Congress to pass any act decreasing the pay of the President for his present term of office. It is also incompetent for us to undertake to pass an act decreasing the salaries of the judges. I think, therefore, those matters ought to pass entirely out of our consideration on this bill. It will be time enough for us to consider whether the President's salary ought to be decreased at some period in the future. I repeat, that is the purpose of my motion in this behalf at this time; that we shall, so far as members of Congress are concerned, return as nearly as we can to what the law was anterior to the 3d of March last. We cannot touch the President's salary so far as the present term of office is concerned. If, two or three years hence, Congress shall deem it wise to go back to $25,000 for him, it will be competent to do so then, but it is unnecessary to do it now.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Legislative action must be had before the next presidential term.

Mr. MERRIMON. I concede that; but we shall have time enough before then.

I wish to make a further remark. I thought that the amendment of the Senator from Georgia was divisible, that it contained two distinct propositions. One was in reference to the salary of the President; the other was in reference to cutting down the expenses of the Executive Mansion. If the expenses of the Executive Mansion are too great—and it has been suggested here and elsewhere that they are—then the amedment of my friend from Georgia is appropriate and proper, and I am prepared to vote on that just as I am prepared to vote on my proposition to strike out so much of his amendment as applies to the President's salary.

Mr. CARPENTER, (Mr. CLAYTON in the chair.) I desire to ask my friend, the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT,] a question in regard to this bill. As I stated the other day, my purpose is to follow him, as I always follow my leader in a measure of this kind, sure that he will go right, and anxious to do what is right in the premises. It seems to me that our better way is to repeal this bill of last year, flat and square, and do nothing else at the present time. These other amendments may all be very well; they may be amendments which we would all vote for; but it seems to me that if we go to changing the salaries of other officers it will seem, perhaps, to some that we do it out of spite—that, the people having demanded that we should put our own salary back where it was, we wanted to punish somebody else by putting his salary down also. It seems to me that the most gracious way to do this thing is to do it at once, and put the salary back, as to ourselves, where it was before; and when any Senator shall introduce a resolution instructing any committee to report a bill here grading these other salaries, from the President down, and making them in some sort relative and proper, I shall support it most cordially.

Now, what I want to know is, whether the Senator from Iowa having charge of this bill desires us to support these amendments or to vote against them; and I shall follow his lead in that particular so far as I have seen the amendments.

Mr. WRIGHT. I was endeavoring to get the floor for the purpose of answering the very question that the Senator from Wisconsin asks me. I think the safety of this bill demands that we shall vote down the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, and vote down the amendment of the Senator from Georgia as well. I think that both of them, taken together or taken separately, are hostile to the bill, and endanger its passage; and therefore I shall vote against all such amendments; and if the Senator will allow me to say one word more in this connection——

Mr. CARPENTER. Will my friend permit me to interrupt him at that point to inquire how it is in regard to the amendment that came from the committee and the amendment adopted on the motion of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. HAMILTON?]

Mr. WRIGHT. So far as that amendment is concerned, I can hardly claim to act as chairman, and therefore do not know that I can be regarded as the leader, as my friend from Wisconsin has kindly suggested, with reference to it. If he will allow me to make a suggestion as to what I prefer in that connection, I will do so now.

I have said from the beginning that my anxiety was to have a bill passed that shall repeal the salary law of last year. If I cannot obtain the passage of a bill that shall repeal it in toto, providing as to when it shall take effect as to the President, as is contemplated by the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, then I am ready and willing to provide by the bill that the President shall be excepted from the operation of the reqeal, as also the judges of the Supreme Court. If, therefore, I were left to myself, as the bill now stands, and if the friends around me who are in favor of repeal will stand by me in that, I think the better course is to have a square repeal of the old law with reference to members of Congress and all of the officers therein named, excepting the President and the judges of the Supreme Court from the operation of the repeal; and if no other one will offer the amendment, I will at the proper time move to so amend the proposition made by the Senator from Maryland as that, instead of providing that the repeal shall take effect absolutely on the 4th day of March, 1877, we shall except the President and the judges of the Supreme Court from the operation of the repeal, and that will leave it a square, simple repeal of the old law so far as we can now go constitutionally. I trust I am understood by the Senator from Wisconsin.

In saying this, however, it is proper to add that the amendment was offered by the Senator from Maryland, and has been put upon the bill; and to that extent I suppose that it is his amendment, and it is for him to take care of it. I voted for that amendment, it will be remembered, and gave the reasons at the time. I do not propose to go into those reasons now.

If I am not trespassing on the time of the Senator from Wisconsin I wish to say one word more. I have upon my table a dispatch signed, as is said, by a thousand citizens of Pennsylvania, saying to us:

Make your salaries $5,000, $7,000, or $10,000; pay all men well who serve well; but for the honor of the country and its safety dispose of the question, and get at legislation for which the people, from ocean to ocean, are suffering.

I submit to my friends on this floor that we act upon this and all questions that may be raised; that we vote upon them without debate; and that we dispose of this matter once and forever, as far as we can, before we adjourn to-day.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the chairman of the committee allow me to make one suggestion to him right here?

Mr. WRIGHT. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I believe this suggestion will be agreed to by the Senate: that he offer, according to his position as chairman, a substitute for the whole bill, embodying about that which he believes to be such a proposition as can be passed and become a law; that is, excluding the President and Supreme Court, and repealing all the balance of the law of last year.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. We cannot hear over here.

Mr. LOGAN. My suggestion was that the chairman of the committee move a substitute for the bill and all the amendments, providing for a total repeal of the law, saving and reserving the salaries of the President of the United States and of the judges of the Supreme Court from the repeal. I am prepared to vote for that.

Mr. WRIGHT. That proposition can just as well come up when we come to the question of the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am rather surprised at the disposition now manifested by the honorable Senator from Iowa. He calls on his friends to stand by him and vote down all amendments intended—as I think sincerely this is—to put the bill in a proper shape. Now, who are his friends? I trust that we are all his friends, and are all sincerely engaged in trying to put this bill in a proper shape; and I trust, furthermore, that no one will be driven from what he thinks is proper by a suggestion of that sort.

My amendment is to strike out an objectionable feature, it seems to me, in the amendment of the Senator from Georgia. I am prepared to vote for the amendment which I propose. If my amendment fails, then I think the amendment of the Senator from Georgia is in a more objectionable shape than if the provision I propose to strike out were stricken out. Let us make it as nearly right as we can, and when we have matured the bill in a proper way, then take the vote upon it.

I beg to make one further remark. I do not understand that the bill in its present shape is the bill that came from the Senate committee. We have now before us the House bill amended. The House bill is so amended as to strike out the sum fixed by the bill as it came from the House and insert as the compensation of members $5,000 a year, with mileage and other allowances as they existed before the act of March 3, 1873, increasing the compensation of members of Congress;

I came here prepared to vote, and vote at once, for two propositions.

First, anabsolute repeal of the salary provision, so called, of the actof March 3, 1873. I was prepared to vote for a repeal for all the reasons which led me at the time to vote against the enactment; and also because of the confirmation those reasons have received from the public judgment. I will not stop to pay tributes to public sentiment. I shall not be deemed paying compliments to the public when I say that considerate and enlightened public sentiment is high evidence to us all. I think the honorable Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] was warranted in saying that there has been much extravagance and heat touching those who felt themselves justified in voting for the increase of salaries; but still I think that Senator will agree with me that there is a general public judgment, calm and sincere, pronouncing this act ill judged and demanding its repeal. I repeat that I came here prepared the first day and the first hour of the session to vote for absolute repeal, and to rest my action upon the reasons for which I cast my vote against it, confirmed as those reasons have been since by the general judgment.

so that we are not now considering the bill that came from the Senate committee at all.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, if I except two or three questions asked for information, I shall be exact in saying that I have had no part in this debate. Voting when my name was called on the various propositions presented, I have waited and hoped for the end.

I was prepared also to vote for a provision to put an end, once for all, to doubts and quibbles touching the situation and ownership of money, "back pay," so called, which those to whom it was voted have chosen not to draw or receive, or which having drawn they have returned to the Treasury. It has been said that those who simply washed their hands of the back pay voted to them and left it to remain in the public coffers so left it subject forever to the claims of themselves, their representatives, or their descendants. One officer of the Government has advised the public that, according to the construction given by some to the acts covering unexpended appropriations into the Treasury, the only way by which back pay could be irrevocably sealed to the United States would be for the man to whom it had been voted to make his will and bequeath it to his country, and I believe he stated this should be upon consideration of his love and affection for his native land. He thought a consideration essential, and that such a consideration would uphold a bequest, and in that way the money would ultimately inure to the benefit of the Government!

I believed, and I believe now, though I join no issue upon it, that the back pay, so called, voted Senators and Representatives, which they do not take, which they leave and refuse, is covered into the Treasury absolutely by operation of general and existing laws. But a doubt has arisen; and therefore my intention was to vote, in addition to a repeal of the act, for a provision which would carry at once and forever to the Treasury all sums of back pay, so called, remaining undrawn, and all sums which had been drawn and then handed back to the Treasury or returned to the Treasury. I therefore introduced on the first day of the session a provision having this latter effect.

Mr. President, my belief is—I trust I shall give offense to no Senator by so declaring—that we might have acted, and we ought to have acted, in much less than one day upon this whole question. I cannot doubt that a large majority of the Senate is in favor of repealing this salary law, and that a majority of the Senate is in favor of declaring the law to be that those who leave the money voted them where it is leave it in the Treasury, and thereby forever commit it to the Treasury for the public benefit. These two things, I think, we might have said and done. An hour, in my belief, was time enough for the purpose. When the honorable Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] made report from the committee his report was in both respects to the general effect of which I speak, and I stood ready then, as I stand ready, now, to vote for his report. Meanwhile other Senators, taking a different view of the question, have offered amendment after amendment; and when I have been called to vote upon them I have felt bound to vote upon the merits of each amendment as it occurred. Senators around me have differed with me in this respect, holding it better to vote against all amendments, regardless of their merits, in order to preserve the integrity of the report of the committee. It seemed otherwise to me. When I am required to record my judgment in the Senate on my oath, I do not see how I can exclude the merits of the proposition because I think it inopportune. However this may be, I have voted upon these amendments, usually in their favor, for the reasons I indicate.

The result of discussion and varying plans has been that much time has been wasted. I say time has been wasted. I say it with deference to every Senator who has waged the debate. I cannot believe that any good can come of discussing a subject so trite, which has been some times in coolness and sometimes in passion held up in so many lights, true and false, as the increase of official salaries. Whether the time has been wasted or not, it is gone, and we are now in the tenth or eleventh day, I think, of the consideration of the subject; and I venture, before suggesting an amendment which I am going to offer when it is in order, to make an appeal to every Senator who has the credit of the Senate at heart—and I know I thus appeal to every Senator—to unite with me in putting an end to the whole matter, that we may proceed to the bankrupt law, to financial questions and to other serious questions which wait upon us.

It will be in order, I take it, Mr. President, as soon as a vote shall occur upon the pending amendment, to offer, now that the bill is in the Senate, a substitute for our work in Committee of the Whole. Such a substitute I have prepared and will offer. I need not read it, because in few words I can explain it. It is one single section designed to take the place of all of the pending propositions, and to do in legal effect substantially that recommended by the committee in the beginning, except that it takes care to observe one or two improvements made by the Senate in committee—especially one preventing the repetition of mileage during this Congress, or rather the receipt of mileage for the session for which actual traveling expenses have already been paid. It contains nothing except that which the chairman of the committee agrees to, as he stated this morning; nothing which the committee itself does not approve, as shown by its report; nothing but that which I think it may be inferred from successive votes is approved by a majority of the Senate. When it is in order, I will offer it in the hope that we may have a square vote upon it at once by yeas and nays; if it turns out that a majority is for it, it will take the place of the bill, and for the time being at least we shall have an end of this subject, which has already consumed so much time needed for grave and urgent affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. CONKLING. I offer the following amendment as a substitute for the bill and all pending propositions——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the substitute offered by the Senator from New York is not in order at the present time, and will not be until the pending amendment has been perfected and the bill which it proposes to strike out has been perfected. Then the pending amendment will become the original bill, and a substitute for it will then be in order.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I am in error as a matter of fact as to the situation of the bill. The Senate in Committee of the Whole agreed to an amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland on my left, [Mr. HAMILTON.] Is there any other amendment pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. The amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. CONKLING. I thought we had voted on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia. If that has not been voted on, I will offer mine when that amendment has been disposed of.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I have not the pending amendment before me; but I wish to make a motion to strike out all after "1877" in the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the amendment by striking out the following words:

And that the appropriations made for the expenses of the Presidential Mansion shall be, for each of the years 1873, 1874, 1875, and 1876, less than the average amount so appropriated for each of the four years preceding the 4th day of March, 1873, by the sum of $25,000.

So that, if amended, the amendment will read:

Provided further, That the salary of the President of the United States shall be $25,000 per annum after the 3d of March, 1877.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on this amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GORDON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 47, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Boutwell, Buckingham, Cameron, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Crozier, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Stockton, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—47.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Brownlow, Davis, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Merrimon, Norwood, Sprague, and Tipton—9.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Ames, Boreman, Cooper, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Hamilton of Texas, Johnston, Jones, Kelly, Ransom, Stewart, Sumner, and Thurman—16.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia as amended.

Mr. SARGENT. Let it be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That the salary of the President of the United States shall be $25,000 per annum after the 3d day of March, 1877.

Mr. SARGENT. On that the yeas and nays have been ordered, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 18, nays 38; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Clayton, Davis, Dennis, Fenton, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Kelly, McCreery, Norwood, Oglesby, Saulsbury, Schurz, Stevenson, Tipton, and Wadleigh—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Boreman, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Conover, Crozier, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Stockton, West, Windom, and Wright—38.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Ames, Cooper, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Hamilton of Texas, Johnston, Jones, Lewis, Ransom, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, and Thurman—16.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the committee as amended in the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. I now offer the amendment which I have sent to the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is to strike out the first, second, and third sections of the House bill as amended, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That so much of the act of March 3, 1873, entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1874," as provides for the increase of the compensation of public officers and employés, whether members of Congress, Delegates, or others, (except the President of the United States and the justices of the Supreme Court,) be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and the salaries, compensation, and allowances of all of said persons (except as aforesaid) shall be as fixed by the laws in force at the time of the passage of said act: Provided, That mileage shall not be allowed for the first session of the Forty-third Congress; that all moneys appropriated as compensation to the members of the Forty-second Congress in excess of mileage and allowances fixed by law at the commencement of said Congress, and which shall not have been drawn by the members of said Congress respectively, or which, having been drawn, have been returned in any form to the United States, are hereby covered into the Treasury of the United States, and are declared to be the moneys of the United States, absolutely, the same as if they had never been appropriated as aforesaid.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senate will see that that is one single section, and I offer it, not precisely as indicated by the Secretary, but as an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the House bill, the amendment of the committee and the amendment adopted in Committee of the Whole. I offer it as one single section, to take the place of everything before the Senate, by way of substitution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It cannot be done in that form until the committee's amendment shall have been acted upon; but the Senator accomplishes the purpose by moving this as a substitute for the House bill; and if it be so adopted, then the question will be whether this shall be stricken out and the report of the committee adopted in place of it.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not care which way. It is as well one way as the other.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me that the direct vote is on the proposition of the Senator from New York as an amendment to the amendment reported by the committee. That enables us to choose between the proposition now submitted to us and the proposition reported from the committee. Otherwise we shall have to take several votes on the question; otherwise the amendment reported from the committee is open to many amendments, and we may never get through. The Senator from New York has it in his power to offer this proposition as an amendment to the amendment adopted by the committee of the Senate as a substitute; and then if that amendment is adopted that is the end of the controversy. I hope we shall take the shortest way out of it.

Mr. CONKLING. It seems to me there can be no doubt whatever about what the Senator from Ohio says. That was my purpose; but I found that other Senators thought it ought to be offered the other way. Now I will offer it in any way that anybody would like to have it if we can only have a vote upon it. My judgment is that it is a substitute for the amendment adopted in Committee of the Whole, and a substitute for the bill; but if anybody wants it in any other way I shall be willing to have it so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York in place of the House bill?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I misunderstood the Chair in submitting the proposition to the Senate. If I understood the Chair properly, the amendment now proposed by the honorable Senator from New York is an amendment to the House bill. I thought the proposition made by the Senator from Ohio was——

Mr. SHERMAN. It is an amendment to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. But the President of the Senate does not say so.

Mr. SHERMAN. It comes to the same thing.

Mr. CONKLING. In order to elicit at least the decision of the Chair, I will move my amendment as an amendment to the amendment adopted in Committee of the Whole, and I will see if there can be any parliamentary objection to that. Now, I propose to strike out all of the amendment of the Committee of the Whole, and to substitute what I have sent to the Chair, unless some point is made on that.

Mr. ANTHONY. I want to make a point of convenience; I do not know that I can make a point of order. This is not amendable. Now, I wish to vote upon a proposition to give to members of Congress precisely the compensation we had before, and not to disturb the compensation of any other officer whatever, either the employés of the Senate and House or the executive officers; but I am unable to move such an amendment to the proposition now before us.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does not the Senator think that this debate has gone far enough to justify us in voting on propositions that are not amendable?

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator must address that remark to some Senators who have occupied more of the time than I have, for I have not taken five minutes altogether on this bill. I merely want to have the proposition presented in such form that I can vote for it, and I do not intend to inflict my reasons on the Senate at all. But if the Senator can and will present his proposition in such a form that I can move to amend it by striking out all except what relates to members of Congress, I should like to get at that.

Mr. HAMLIN. You voted against that the other day when I offered it.

Mr. ANTHONY. No.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, you did.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I did not know what I was about.

Mr. HAMLIN. Possibly that may be so.

Mr. CONKLING. I should be very glad, if I could, to oblige my honorable friend from Rhode Island. I do not know anybody whom it is a greater luxury to oblige than it is to oblige him. I am satisfied that it will never fall within the ingenuity of man to offer a proposition on this subject which will be entirely satisfactory to everybody; and therefore I am engaged now in the attempt—feeble to be sure, but an attempt—to get one vote from the Senate upon the question whether this salary business, which the people hate, shall be stricken out or not, whether it is members of Congress or anybody else who have been increased, save only the President and the justices of the Supreme Court, and there the Constitution confronts us and says we shall not repeal that, no matter what we think. As to every other officer, every man that we can reach, I want one vote on the question of putting him in statu quo, putting him back where he was and where he would be had there been no salary enactment on the 3d of March, 1873. Now, this amendment certainly will test the sense of the Senate on that question; and I hope my friend from Rhode Island will indulge himself and all the rest of us in voting on that as far as it does enable him to express his convictions; and if it is not satisfactory, then he can move such amendments hereafter as will enable him to vote satisfactorily to himself.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to know whether, after the amendment of the Senator from New York shall be adopted—if it be adopted—there will then be any way in which the proposition of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] which it is said I was so unfortunate as to vote against, can be brought before the Senate; for, although that is not precisely what I wanted, it is nearer to it than any proposition I have seen. I should be in favor of a salary of $5,000 and mileage for members of Congress, with the usual allowances for stationery, and that there should also be in the bill an allowance for postage. There is no more reason that Senators should pay their postage than that the executive officers should pay theirs, except that the postage of the executive officers is so much greater that it would be impossible for them to do it. We send a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, and pay the postage on it—a letter entirely on the public business, having no relation to ourselves—and he sends back an answer, and the postage is paid by the Government.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Allow me to ask the Senator from Rhode Island whether, upon the adoption of this proposition, it will not be open to amendment, so that the Senator can move to amend it in that way.

Mr. ANTHONY. Not after it is adopted.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Then you can move to amend now.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is not amendable now. It is an amendment to an amendment. It is in the second degree, as the Chair informs me.

Mr. SHERMAN. As this is likely to be a test vote on this question, and as both the House bill and this amendment offered by the Senator from New York contain a proposition to cover certain balances into the Treasury, I wish to call the attention of the Senate for a moment to the law as it now stands. I have not a doubt that under the law as it now stands it was the duty of the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department to cover all the undrawn money appropriated for the pay of the Forty-second Congress into the Treasury on the 1st day of July last. I have the law before me. I know that at the close of the last session of Congress Senators—among the rest my colleague and myself—examined this law when we were discussing among ourselves in consequence of the salary bill what course we would pursue in regard to what is commonly called the back pay. We examined the law, and both concurred that this money would be covered into the Treasury by operation of law, and we had the law before us. But a decision made by the Treasury Department during the summer, when this question of back pay was exciting the public mind, placed us all in a very embarrassing position. Now, sir, I wish to place upon the records of the Senate the law as it stands. I shall vote for the proposition to cover the money into the Treasury, but I call the attention of the Senate to the law as it now stands, and let us see if it will be any clearer after we have passed this amendment, although I shall vote for it. The fifth section of the act approved July 12, 1870, provides as follows:

All balances of appropriations contained in the annual appropriation bills, and made specifically for the service of any fiscal year, and remaining unexpended at the expiration of such fiscal year, shall only be applied to the payment of expenses properly incurred during that year, or to the fulfillment of contracts properly made within that year, and such balances, not needed for the said purposes, shall be carried to the surplus fund: Provided, That this section shall not apply to appropriations known as permanent or indefinite appropriations.

Now, sir, when this law was about to be put in force and the time came for covering this money into the Treasury, it was said that a decision had been made at the Treasury Department that the money appropriated for the pay of members of Congress was a permanent appropriation. I find in the regular annual estimates published in pursuance of law that the term "permanent appropriations" has a clear, legal, and defined meaning, recognized as such almost from the foundation of the Government; and that under existing law a list of the permanent and indefinite appropriations is required to be published every year in the annual Book of Estimates. The only appropriations that are called permanent are three. They are published in this list as permanent appropriations. One is for the Smithsonian Institution; another for collecting revenue from customs; another for arming and equipping the militia, &c. Those are the only defined permanent appropriations. Then there is a large class of what are called indefinite permanent appropriations, such as appropriations for the interest on the public debt, appropriations for the sinking fund, appropriations for refunding taxes illegally collected. All of those are defined by law and specified in the Book of Estimates. The idea that the pay of members of Congress is in the nature of a permanent or indefinite appropriation would practically defeat and nullify the law, because if the pay of members of Congress is a permanent appropriation, then an appropriation for the pay of officers, or soldiers, or sailors, or contractors, and everybody else, would be in the nature of a permanent appropriation.

The purpose of this law of 1870 was to cover into the Treasury all balances except those required to carry into execution contracts or for personal services, and then in those cases section 6, which follows the section I have already read, provides that "all balances of appropriations which shall have remained on the books of the Treasury, without having been drawn against in the settlement of accounts for two years from the date of the last appropriation made by law, shall be reported by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Auditor of the Treasury," and shall be covered into the Treasury.

Now, let us see upon what ground this decision is made. This section requires the covering in of all balances of appropriations which shall have remained on the books of the Treasury without having been drawn against in the settlement of accounts for two years. The appropriation for the pay of members of Congress was made in a regular annual appropriation bill and for a fiscal year, because it was for the pay of members of the Forty-second Congress, whose terms expired on the 3d of March, 1873, and that fiscal year expired on the 30th of June. Here is the language of the law, which the officers were called upon to construe:

That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Then follows an appropriation in another part of the bill for the pay of members of the Forty-second Congress, whose term expired on the 3d of March, 1873. If it is held that the appropriation for the pay of members of Congress is for payment of expenses properly incurred during the year, or for the fulfillment of contracts properly made within the year, then, as a matter of course, these appropriations must be carried into the Treasury under the sixth section of the act, which required it to be done within two years after the appropriation was made. The way in which the operation of that sixth section is avoided is by a narrow construction drawn from the word "against:" "all balances of appropriations which shall have remained on the books of the Treasury which shall not have been drawn against in the settlements of accounts." The accounting officers hold that if there is a balance of an appropriation for a given year of $100,000, and there is a draft outstanding, against that appropriation of $500, that holds up the whole appropriation until two years after that draft is paid, because it is an appropriation, or a balance of an appropriation, against which there is a draft. The plain and obvious meaning of this phraseology is, that only so much of the balance should be retained in the Treasury as is necessary to meet the outstanding draft, and the remainder should be covered into the Treasury. That, it seems to me, is the common-sense construction of the sixth section of the act.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If the Senator will allow me, the point of difficulty in administration is this: that the Treasury Department does not know—and cannot officially know, because it has not the means of knowing—what claims there may be outstanding against particular appropriations. The appropriation is not kept open because it is known to the Treasury Department that there may be a draft outstanding against it; but it is kept open for two years after the last payment for the purpose of protecting other departments of the Government in contracts which may have been made, based upon appropriations, and the evidence of which has not been presented to the Treasury Department.

Mr. SHERMAN. What I insist upon is that the Treasury Department should carry all balances of appropriations in an annual appropriation bill into the surplus fund without exception, except such drafts as have been made upon them within the time to cover actual existing liabilities made during that year; and that the provision of the law which requires them to suspend balances against which there is a single draft, only requires them to suspend enough of that balance to pay the draft.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I did not make myself understood by the Senator. The particular appropriation account is not kept open because the Treasury has knowledge that there is a claim outstanding against it, but because, upon the construction given to the statute, two years must elapse after the last payment before the balance of a particular appropriation can be carried to the surplus fund. If that construction is wrong, then perhaps the only way is to remedy it by legislation; but the Treasury Department cannot know officially what claims there may be outstanding against particular appropriations. When two years have passed after the time of the last payment from a particular appropriation, then the balance of that appropriation is carried to the surplus fund.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is that very construction of the Treasury Department that I complain of. The practical operation of it would be that a balance never would be carried into the surplus fund. Take this appropriation for salaries. It was made in 1872 for the service of the last fiscal year. According to the statement of the Treasury there were about five hundred thousand dollars of this money undrawn on the 1st of July last. Can it be said that this money shall not be carried into the Treasury as long as within two years after that time there may be a single draft of a thousand dollars against the fund? By the construction they put upon it, if there is a single outstanding draft paid within two years after the 1st of July, 1873, against this fund of $500,000, they cannot cover it in until the end of two years. The purpose was that if there is an outstanding draft against a particular fund, an amount sufficient to cover that draft should remain applicable to the payment of the draft for two years, and then it must be covered into the Treasury.

But I do not know that it is necessary to debate this question. I desired to direct the attention of the Senate to it because it will be necessary to have some provision of law made more distinctly to define the meaning of Congress in regard to balances of appropriations.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to inquire whether the pending proposition of the Senator from New York is a substitute or an amendment for the pending amendment as reported from the committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from New York varies his proposition as originally made, and now moves it as a substitute in place of the amendment reported by the committee as amended by the Senate. Then the question will be on striking out the bill and inserting the amendment as finally amended.

Mr. WRIGHT. Do I understand that that is in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, while I have the floor I wish to say one thing in reference to this amendment. It is known to Senators here that perhaps no one has been more radical on the subject of the repeal of the law of 1873 than I have been. I have been radical from the first day of the session. I was radical in my opposition to the law last spring. If it were left to myself I would make this bill an absolute repeal as far as I could constitutionally, and dating back to the 3d of March last. I have, however, been satisfied from the beginning that such a bill could not pass. Then I have asked myself the question, what can pass here, and what ought I to do if I cannot get what I want? I was in favor of making the repeal take effect at once, if I could not date it back, upon all that we could constitutionally, and to declare in express words that it should take effect in 1877, as far as the President was concerned. I believed at the time that amendment was offered that it could be carried in this body and carried through both Houses of Congress.

Now, I desire to make an appeal to the friends of the measure; and I beg my friend from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] to understand that I do not wish to be understood as speaking of "my friends," but of the friends of the measure. I beg to appeal to the friends of the measure here, to those who want some legislation on the subject, if we cannot get all we want, that we shall take the proposition as it now comes from the Senator from New York, which is substantially the proposition I said this morning I would be willing to vote for. I appeal once more to the Senate—that proposition being squarely before us; we all understand what it is; we have understood from this discussion, and we know where we stand upon it—to come directly to a vote upon it. We all understand that it is a simple proposition to repeal the law of the 3d of March as far as we can constitutionally. If we adopt the substitute of the Senator from New York, as I understand, it will have that effect.

I repeat, I have been thoroughly radical on this subject; I have been anxious to accomplish a practical result with reference to it; but I am willing to forego the views I entertain, when I cannot go as far as I would like to go. I know that the people whom I represent here would like to have more; I know they will justify me in getting all I can; and I feel and know that they will justify me in giving such a vote as will end this question and get it out of the way of the Senate. I trust, therefore, that we shall come to a direct vote on this proposition, and that we shall know how we stand on the question, and when the result shall be ascertained, if it shall be voted down, then we can take a vote upon other questions as they may arise, at once, without further debate.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest to the Senator from New York, and the Senator from Iowa who has charge of this measure, that perhaps this repeal with regard to other public officers and employés is too sweeping. This amendment repeals all increase of salary provided for by the act of the 3d of March last, not only in reference to members of Congress, which is the particular thing we are trying to get at, but also with reference to the Assistant Secretaries, all members of the Cabinet, heads of Bureaus, clerks, and others provided for. Some of the salaries that were raised by that act were confessedly too low; we all agreed to that; and a sweeping repeal of all the increase would not be doing justice. The increase of pay to some heads of Bureaus and to the Assistant Secretaries of the Departments was confessedly just, and against that increase there has been no clamor whatever. The Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] suggests to me that the salaries embraced in the third section of the act were not passed upon the last day of the session; that that was not the result of the hurry and rush; that those salaries had been increased upon discussion weeks before. It was the salaries of members of Congress that was put through under the peculiar circumstances that have so excited the country; but the increase of pay to the heads of Bureaus and other officers provided for in the third section had been made some time before, had been debated in both Houses of Congress, and in regard to them there was no surprise; there was no want of consideration. Now, this amendment repeals all, and while it will accomplish what we want in regard to members of Congress, it will repeal the increase of pay in regard to others, which we will all admit is a manifest injustice.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I ask my friend a question?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suppose if this amendment should be adopted it would be in order to add to it an amendment providing that nothing in this act shall affect the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury and any other officers you see proper.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am quite sure that the Senator from New York does not wish to take advantage of any parliamentary tactics upon a bill of this kind, if upon any, to defeat a just expression of the will of the Senate; therefore I trust he will withdraw his amendment for the present and let the amendment that was offered by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] and which came within two votes of passing, be tried first. If that shall be voted down the Senator from New York can again offer his amendment; but if his amendment is pressed now we are driven either to vote against it or we shall be cut off from all opportunity of amendment. If we can take the sense of the Senate upon the proposition of the Senator from Maine, which I know many Senators desire to vote for distinctly, and that expression shall not be in accordance with the views of the Senator from New York, then he can offer his own amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. I think I shall answer my friend sufficiently when I say that I have been here in a private and convenient place on this grand jury without meat or drink, water excepted, for a great many hours without offering any amendment at all, although I should like to have had the views of the Senate upon it some time ago, and inasmuch as I have waited almost a fortnight to offer my first amendment, I hope the Senator will not grudgingly give me his vote.

Mr. LOGAN. On the last day of our session, I believe, I gave notice that I would offer an amendment to this bill, which was intended to do exactly what the amendment of the Senator from New York proposes to do, and I am glad it has been offered. In my remarks before, I said I was voting under instructions from my Legislature—a unanimous vote of that Legislature, instructing the Senators from Illinois to vote for the repeal of the salary bill. They did not instruct us to vote for a repeal of a part of the salary bill, but the repeal of the salary bill, thereby meaning that we should vote to repeal it as far as we have the right to do under the Constitution. I said I would do that. This amendment does accomplish that purpose, and for this amendment I am now ready to vote. I know it works a hardship in striking down some of the Bureau officers and the Assistant Secretaries, but they were included in the law of March last, and if our salaries are to be stricken down, there is no reason why theirs should not be also. The people demand a repeal of that law. There is no use in our making excuses now about this thing; there is no use in our trying to work it around so as to save one Secretary or Assistant Secretary, or some Bureau officer. That is not complying with the demand of the people, if we merely vote in compliance with their demand. If that is the object of our legislation, merely to comply with the demand of the people, let us comply with it; and this amendment does it. I should like to save these gentlemen myself, but I cannot do it if I vote for a repeal of the law. The Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury now receive $6,000 under the law of the 3d of March last. Prior to that time they received $3,500. We reduce our salaries to $5,000, and we do not want to reduce the Assistant Secretaries a cent. We think they ought to receive $6,000, although we have but $5,000. My impression is that they are entitled to no more than we are. I would vote to increase their pay to $5,000. I would not vote for any more if I were voting to fix a salary for them now. I think that is enough, if we are to receive $5,000, and only that. But the people demand of us that we shall repeal the law, and this amendment does it. I am, therefore, for this amendment; and it is the only proposition I have yet seen before the Senate that does comply exactly with what I consider my duty under the instructions of my Legislature, and, therefore, I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. If I understand the condition of the question as it now stands before the Senate, the honorable Senator from New York has offered an amendment to the one submitted by me, and the difference between the two is this: his relates not at all to the salary of the President, while the one submitted by me and reported by the committee does; so that the question is fairly presented by this proposition whether we shall, while repealing the act passed in March last in respect to all other officers of this Government, also repeal the provision in respect to the President, as far as we can by substituting the old salary, to take effect when it can constitutionally take effect—we understand that to be now—the vote to be taken by the Senate. I shall vote against this amendment, because I believe the one offered by me goes further and is better than the one submitted by the honorable Senator from New York.

Mr. MORTON. I will say to the Senator that upon the particular point of difference between the two, the sense of the Senate has been taken, and I suppose the Senator does not want to try it again.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I beg the Senator's pardon; I think the sense of the Senate has not been taken. The sense of the Senate was taken upon a proposition to amend the original House bill; that is all.

Mr. MORTON. On the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] we voted specifically upon that question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to vote to place the congressional pay where it was last March. I do not desire to reduce the pay of the Vice-President of the United States from $10,000 to $8,000, or the members of the Cabinet from $10,000 to $8,000; and I regret exceedingly that the proposition, which has met with a great deal of favor and which I believe would command the support of a great majority of the Senate, cannot be placed before them for their votes; that is, whether the members of Congress shall or shall not profit by the law of last Congress any further than to-day? I will vote for what is termed a "square repeal" from this day, so that we shall have hereafter the same emoluments that we had when I came into the Senate. I regret exceedingly that that proposition should be complicated with another that I regard with disfavor, and that is, the reduction of the salaries of the officers I have mentioned.

Mr. MERRIMON. I wish to say just one word in relation to the vote I am about to give. The amendment offered by the Senator from New York accomplishes exactly what I desire to see accomplished, except so much of it as is embraced by his proviso. If it were likely to be operative at all I could not vote for that proviso, because I believe it would violate the spirit of the Constitution; but I understand that every one who has not already drawn what was in the Treasury to his credit has made some disposition of it, so that I can vote for the whole amendment. I wish to make this explanation in order to show that I am acting consistently upon the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KELLY. I wish to have the amendment reported.

Mr. SUMNER. Before the vote is taken I should like to have the amendment read.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Both amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Both will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out the following words:

That so much of the act of March 3, 1873, entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1874," as provides for the increase of the salaries of the President, Vice-President, members of Congress, and Delegates, and all other officers therein named, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and the salaries and compensation of all said officers and clerks of every name and description shall be and remain as fixed by the laws in force at the time of the passage of the act the provisions of which are hereby repealed: Provided, That this repeal, so far as it relates to the salary of the President, shall not take effect until the 4th day of March, 1877, on and after which date said repeal, as to the salary of said officer, shall have full force and effect, and as to all other officers from and after the taking effect of this act: And provided further, That this repeal shall not relate to or affect the salaries of the chief and other justices of the Supreme Court of the United States as now established by law.

And in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That so much of the act of March 3, 1873, entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1874," as provides for the increase of the compensation of public officers and employés, whether members of Congress, Delegates, or others, (except the President of the United States and the justices of the Supreme Court,) be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and the salaries, compensation, and allowances of all said persons (except as aforesaid) shall be as fixed by the laws in force at the time of the passage of said act: Provided, That mileage shall not be allowed for the first session of the Forty-third Congress; that all moneys appropriated as compensation to the members of the Forty-second Congress in excess of the mileage and allowances fixed by law at the commencement of the said Congress, and which shall not have been drawn by the members of the said Congress respectively, or which having been drawn have been returned in any form to the United States, are hereby covered into the Treasury of the United States and are declared to be the moneys of the United States absolutely, the same as if they had never been appropriated as aforesaid.

Mr. MORTON. Will it be in order if this amendment is adopted as an entirety to move to strike out any portion of it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will not. It will be in order to add to it, but not to strike out any portion of it.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY (when his name was called) said: I vote "yea," under protest.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 37, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boreman, Boutwell, Buckingham, Cameron, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Conover, Crozier, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Stockton, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Brownlow, Clayton, Fenton, Flanagan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Kelly, Lewis, Norwood, Schurz, Sprague, and Tipton—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Ames, Bayard, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Johnston, Jones, Ransom, Saulsbury, Spencer, Stevenson, Stewart, Sumner, and Thurman—20.

So the amendment of Mr. CONKLING was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on substituting the amendment of the committee, as amended, for the House bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the amendment which has just been agreed to by adding the following words, to come in at the end of line 13 of the amendment as printed:

And the reduction of salaries of Senators and Members of Congress and Delegates, herein provided for, shall take effect as of the 4th day of March, 1873; and the accounting officers of the Treasury shall compute the sum accordingly, and shall make ratable monthly deductions from said salaries at the rate necessary to effectuate this provision within nine months next hereafter.

This is the amendment that I offered the other day, and which the Senate, not being then, I believe, very full, did not concur in. I feel it a duty to offer it again to really perfect the repeal of this measure of the 3d of March.

Mr. BOREMAN. This is substantially the amendment that was voted down the other day, and a subsequent one to effect the same purpose was also voted down, and I had hoped that the same proposition would not be renewed again during the pendency of this bill. As I understood the expression of opinion the other day by the Senate, it was that this amendment was in violation of the spirit of the Constitution; that this was the most objectionable form in which it had been offered. I rise not to discuss its merits, but simply to call the attention of Senators to the fact that this amendment in my judgment is in violation of the Constitution; for it proposes to take from those members who have received their salary from the 4th of March last the excess beyond the rate of salary at $5,000 a year, and I trust they will treat it as they did before and vote it down.

Mr. WRIGHT. I regret that my friend from Vermont has deemed it necessary to offer this amendment. In my judgment the bill is in as good a shape now as we shall be likely to get it, and I trust we shall stand by the amendment which has just been adopted. While there are many of us who have amendments that we would like to offer and get upon this bill as it stands, yet I hope that we shall vote down all amendments, and stand by the bill as it is, and take a vote upon it.

Mr. MORTON. Let us have a vote; we all understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

The amendment was rejected, there being on a division—ayes 8, noes 36.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I offer an amendment now, upon which I ask for the yeas and nays. It is to come in at the end of the first section of the bill:

Provided, That from and after the 4th day of March, 1877, the compensation of the President of the United States shall be the same as that provided by law before the passage of the act aforesaid of March 3, 1873, entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of Government for the year ending June 30, 1874."

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, I did not intend to say anything upon this bill; but inasmuch as this amendment, which was voted down specifically a short time ago, is again offered, and inasmuch as a considerable portion of the party with which I act and to which I am proud to belong vote upon it in a different way from myself, perhaps I ought, in a very few words, to give the reasons for my vote.

It appears that only a short time ago (about a year since, I think) the Congress of the United States voted, among other questions that they voted upon in that same bill, that the President of the United States should have his salary increased. His salary was raised from $25,000 to $50,000. On that question the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] has said this morning that he thought it ought to have been increased; that he thought, considering what the President's salary was at the time of the formation of the Government, and considering the great change in the value of money, and considering the great difference in the requisitions that our country makes upon its public officers, the increase made last year was proper, and he voted for it. Upon this point I am inclined to believe that he is right. I am inclined to think that the ordinary and necessary requisitions made upon the President make this as small a sum as it is possible for him to get along with with proper and decent economy.

But if I simply agreed with him and thought he was right in that respect, I should not have risen to express myself. I have another reason. I cannot understand why, three years ahead, we should be called upon to assert that in 1877 we shall begin to reduce this salary. I cannot see what the motive is for doing it. I am aware, as gentlemen have repeated it, of the clause in the Constitution which prevents us decreasing this salary during the present executive term; but why we should make such hot haste, so many years ahead, to say to the people that then, by our vote, it shall be decreased, when we are not the parties who will then be called upon to act, is more than I can see.

I can see, too, the distinction between the position stated by the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] when he made his inquiry of the Senator from Delaware on my left, [Mr. SAULSBURY,] and that assumed by the latter Senator. I can see a distinction between an annual appropriation for a salary which is fixed by law and the passing of a law fixing that salary. I can see a very vast difference between our saying to anybody, three or four years ahead, "When that time comes the salary shall be fixed at such and such a sum," and our making an appropriation annually; and I can see how Congress at that time may make its annual appropriation giving the President $50,000 after we have gone to our homes and this Congress is over. But I do not see any good to be attained, nor do I see any result to follow practically, except for us to say to the people that we believe that when that time comes the Congress which will then be in existence should make the reduction. Then, what does it amount to practically? It amounts to this, that at the last session of Congress we passed a bill in which we said that Ulysses S. Grant while he is President of the United States shall receive the sum of $50,000 annual salary; and now Congress is called upon to vote, and democrats are called upon to vote, that as soon as the term of Ulysses S. Grant expires, the next President, who may be one of my distinguished friends around me, shall not receive that same sum.

Sir, it seems to me that for us to make hot haste to fasten our party down to the fact that three or four years hence we will still insist, no matter what is the change in the value of money, and no matter who is President, of one party or another, that he shall not receive the same sum allowed to President Grant, would not be wise. There ought to be some good and sufficient reason given for it. I believe that the salary as now fixed in all human probability will turn out not to be too high, and that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] was not only right but that he was patriotic and just, as he always is on such subjects; that he did not attempt to make any political capital in this country by striving to show that the republican party desired to raise the salary because their President was in power.

I think there is no necessity for this amendment. If that salary is not precisely the sum; if it should turn out that it would be better to have a more economical administration; if it should turn out that when a reform party shall come into power it does not need so much salary, can get along without it, it will be time enough for that reform party to do it when they get into power; and if they wish to have the benefit of it they can go before the people and say they have done it. But it does seem to me that when we engage in fixing the salary, it would be unwise for us to put ourselves in the position of volunteering to fix it three or four years in advance, when the appropriations of Congress at that time may make entirely null and void all such regulations as we may now make.

My impression is that there is no reason whatever why the salary of the President should be attempted to be altered in anticipation, when the plain fact is before us that we are not called to act on the subject now. When the vote was given that the salary of the President of the United States during this term should be double the sum it had been, every Senator knew that a constitutional barrier stood in the face of his altering it for four years, and every Senator who voted against it knew the same thing. Now, because the barrier still exists, which we knew of at the time, I can see no reason whatever why we should come in and say to the people, and say here on the records of Congress, "We wish we could do it, but we know we cannot, and therefore we will say that if we should be here at that time we think we would at that time alter it;" condemning themselves for what they did a year ago, which I think is very little, if any, to be condemned, particularly in reference to the President of the United States—condemning themselves, unnecessarily rushing to court the condemnation of their constituents.

Sir, there was a good deal of sense in something that has been said in this debate; there was one observation in this debate that had some sense in it. I do not say there was but one: I leave that to the wiser men around me who are so wise on this subject I hesitate to correct them; but I do say that there was one sensible thing said in this debate, and I regret to say it was not by any Senator on this floor, nor was it, so far as my reading goes, in another body in this building. I refer now to a little telegram received by the Senator from Iowa, and which he read to the Senate; a telegram in which the suggestion is made by one thousand people, if I heard it read aright, from Pennsylvania that the people had had quite enough discussion on this subject and wished we would dispose of the bill and attend to the things for which we were sent here. I allude to it now to extract that grain of common sense, for I may even be able to do that if I can do no more, to apply that to this presidential salary.

Being called upon a second time in immediate connection to vote upon this, I felt that I must make this explanation in order to say that if this proposition applies to any one part of the salary bill more than another it is to the salary of the President of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. HAMILTON,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 43; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Clayton, Cooper, Davis, Fenton, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Kelly, McCreery, Norwood, Oglesby, Saulsbury, Schurz, Stevenson, Tipton, and Wadleigh—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Boreman, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Conover, Crozier, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Lewis, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Stockton, West, Windom, and Wright—43.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Ames, Cameron, Cragin, Dennis, Ferry of Connecticut, Hamilton of Texas, Johnston, Jones, Ransom, Stewart, Sumner, and Thurman—13.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment, but first I will re-establish myself in the good opinion of my friend from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.] I did not vote against his amendment. I have just examined the record. I was quite sure I could not have done so. My amendment is to insert the following:

Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not be construed to reduce the salaries now provided by law for the Vice-President of the United States, for the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, of the Interior, and of the Attorney-General, and Postmaster-General, or of any of the employés of the Senate or of the House of Representatives; or of any of the officers named in the third section of the act approved March 3, 1873, entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes."

The effect of this amendment is nearly the same, almost literally the same, as that intended by the amendment of the Senator from Maine, which came within two votes of passing the Senate; and although I know it comes in very awkwardly and makes the section read inconsistently, still I believe that it can be legally construed to effect the purpose which is intended. The object of it is to confine the reduction to Senators and Members of Congress alone.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand the effect of this amendment is to leave the bill so that it will be substantially a repeal of the law as far as Senators and Members are concerned, and nothing beyond that.

Mr. ANTHONY. Nothing beyond.

Mr. WRIGHT. As I stated the other day, I do not propose to eat humble pie and say that we voted wrong in increasing our own salaries, and that we were right in increasing the salary of every person else. I trust, as I have said so often to-day, that we will vote down this amendment, and all other amendments, and take the bill as it stands. It seems to me the shortest and best way out of this question. If it be true that these salaries ought to be increased, we can do it hereafter. But what I think we ought to do now is to just squarely repeal that law, as is proposed by the bill as it now stands; and then, if my friend from Rhode Island or others will suggest hereafter—after we have made this repeal simple and square—that there ought to be changes in the salaries of the Cabinet officers or others, I am not prepared to say that I might not go with him. I reserve any opinion on that until the question shall arise; but I think the safest and best way is to stand by the bill as it is now.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not see any humble pie in this bill. We are repealing the law so far as it relates to our own salaries, avowedly in conformity to the wishes of the people. There has been no expression of the popular wish adverse to the increase of salaries for the executive officers, (and we all know that those salaries are very small indeed for the services which they have to perform and the men who are required to perform them.) And now if we pass this bill precisely as it stands we reduce the salaries of the Assistant Secretaries of State below some of their own subordinates.

Mr. DAVIS. I have not the amendment of the Senator from New York or that of the Senator from Rhode Island before me, but it appears to me from the reading that they are inconsistent. If that is the case, I ask the Chair whether this proposition is in order.

Mr. SARGENT. The amendment of the Senator from New York was to the committee's report, and perfected that report as far as it went. There was at the time the House bill, which also had been amended, and, I might say, perfected. After the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from New York in the nature of a substitute for the committee's bill, does not the question now come up on the substitution of the committee's report, as amended by the amendment of the Senator from New York, for the House bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) But pending that the Senator from Rhode Island proposes an amendment. Meanwhile the Senator from West Virginia raised a point of order that the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island is not in order. The Chair will rule that the point of order is well taken, as the Chair is advised that the Senate have heretofore adopted a provision bearing upon this very question, and the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island is to except, so far as certain officers are concerned, from the vote which the Senate has taken under the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York. In other words, the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island proposes to amend what has already been adopted by the Senate, the rule being that a paragraph received or adopted cannot be amended afterward in the same stage, because the House has, on a vote, agreed to it in that form. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is that out of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate having by vote adopted the amendment of the Senator from New York, and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island being an amendment of, and in conflict with, that, the Chair rules that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will not dispute with the Chair, but it seems to me that it is perfectly competent, although that is not the purpose of this amendment, to make an amendment to a bill for the very purpose of making it inconsistent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair observed that the Senate have agreed to a proposition in the affirmative form. The proposition of the Senator is to amend by a negative of a portion of the same, and which is in conflict with, and directly opposite to, the amendment already adopted, and therefore inconsistent with prior action of the Senate. A proposition agreed to cannot be amended unless it is done by striking out and adding of what has already been agreed to by the Senate. This does not propose to strike out, but does seek to amend, what has been affirmed by a vote of the Senate. The Chair rules that it is out of order.

Mr. ANTHONY. This proposition does not strike out anything that has been adopted, but it is only to add something to what has been already adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is to except a part of what has been adopted already by the Senate, and would be putting the Senate in an inconsistent attitude. If the Senate should adopt the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island it would negative the vote already taken. Therefore the Chair cannot see how he can entertain the motion, as the Senate already have adopted, in a positive form, the amendment of the Senator from New York. The Chair's attention has been called to a case where a similar question arose on an amendment to a tax bill, and the matter was submitted by the Chair to the decision of the Senate, and the view taken by the Chair affirmed.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask that the Clerk read, from page 255 of McDonald's Manual, the first three paragraphs, being an extract from Jefferson's Manual.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire, does my friend from Rhode Island appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not appeal from the decision of the Chair, but I should like the Chair to reverse his decision himself.

Mr. CONKLING. I think that is asking too much.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to have those three paragraphs read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

If an amendment be proposed inconsistent with one already agreed to, it is a fit ground for its rejection by the House, but not within the competence of the Speaker to suppress as if it were against order. For were he permitted to draw questions of consistence within the vortex of order, he might usurp a negative on important modifications, and suppress, instead of subserving, the legislative will.

Amendments may be made so as totally to alter the nature of the proposition, and it is a way of getting rid of a proposition, by making it bear a sense different from what it was intended by the movers, so that they vote against it themselves.

Mr. CONKLING. Now, I beg to ask for the regular order of the Senate. There is no question before the Senate on this matter.

Mr. DAVIS. It appears to me the rule that was read sustains the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CONKLING. That is disposed of, if my friend will allow me; nobody has appealed from the decision of the Chair. I demand the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the adoption of the amendment as amended, which is the amendment of the committee as amended by the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to recall to the attention of the Chair whether it is not possible that the ruling of the Senate to which he referred has not been correctly read. I think it appears that it was decided that the amendment was in order in that case; but I am not sure.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I demand the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York demands the regular order. The Chair will state that his attention was called to the decision of the Senate in the case of an amendment to a tax bill which he before mentioned. On examining the record, however, the Chair finds that on that occasion the question was submitted to the Senate, and the Senate differed from the Chair by a vote of 27 to 21. The Chair is of the opinion that, as the Senate has already adopted the proposition of the Senator from New York, it is not in order now to amend it; but deferring to and following the precedent established by the Senate, to which reference has been made, the Chair will withdraw his decision, and submit the question to the Senate. The Senator from West Virginia has raised a point of order upon the admissibility of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island, and the Chair will submit to the Senate the question whether that amendment shall be received.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let the decision referred to be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest that we take the vote on the amendment and be done with it. That will take less time.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to that; but certainly what was read from Jefferson's Manual sustains me.

Mr. MORTON. Let us waive the point of order, and take the vote on the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the shortest way.

Mr. MORTON. Let us have the question on the amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the easiest way. I hope, therefore, that the President will change his decision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Chair hears no objection he will accept the suggestion, to expedite the solution of the question, by waiving a decision and allowing the precedent already established by the Senate to be now followed. If there be no objection the question will now recur on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. DAVIS. It occurs to me if this is to be a precedent that it had better be settled now.

Mr. STEVENSON. It has been settled.

Mr. DAVIS. No; it has not.

Mr. HAMLIN. It has been settled fifty times.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, on the promise of numerous of my friends that they will vote against the proposition, I will withdraw the point of order and make no further objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is now on the amendment of the committee as amended by the Senate. It will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment of the committee is to strike out the first, second, and third sections of the House bill, which, as amended, reads as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates shall be at the rate of $5,000 per annum, payable monthly, and in addition thereto the mileage and other allowances allowed by law prior to the passage of the act of March 3, 1873, in going to and returning from the seat of Government once in each session, to be certified in writing by each: Provided, That mileage shall not be allowed or paid to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates for the first session of the Forty-third Congress.

SEC. 2. That the compensation of the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall be at the rate of $2,000, in addition to his pay as Representative, amounting in all to $8,000; and that of the Vice-President shall be the same amount, with the same allowance for traveling expenses as hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 3. That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

And in lieu thereof to insert the following words:

That so much of the act of March 3, 1873, entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1874," as provides for the increase of the compensation of public officers and employés, whether members of Congress, Delegates, or others, (except the President of the United States and the justices of the Supreme Court,) be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and the salaries, compensation, and allowances of all of said persons, (except as aforesaid,) shall be as fixed by the laws in force at the time of the passage of said act: Provided, That mileage shall not be allowed for the first session of the Forty-third Congress; that all moneys appropriated as compensation to the members of the Forty-second Congress in excess of the mileage and allowances fixed by law at the commencement of said Congress, and which shall not have been drawn by the members of said Congress respectively, or which, having been drawn, have been returned in any form to the United States, are hereby covered into the Treasury of the United States, and are declared to be the moneys of the United States absolutely, the same as if they had never been appropriated as aforesaid.

Mr. NORWOOD. If in order now I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the words proposed to be inserted:

SEC. —. That the act approved January 31, 1873, repealing the franking privilege, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected; there being on a division—ayes 19, noes 35.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the committee as amended, which is to substitute what has been read for three sections of the House bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no further amendment be proposed the question is on the third reading of the bill. The bill as it now stands will be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask a question? Is there anything in the bill now except that proposed by the Senator from New York as a substitute for the committee's amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be reported. The object of the Chair in directing the bill as it stands to be reported was to call attention to that.

The Chief Clerk read the fourth section of the House bill, as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury is required to cover into the Treasury all sums that may remain undrawn or which have been received as increased compensation under the provisions of said act approved March 3, 1873, and which shall have or may come into his possession by the return thereof.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not understand the effect of previous votes if that still stands in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion to strike it out now will be in order.

Mr. CONKLING. I move, then, to strike it out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is, Shall the amendment made by the Senate be engrossed and the bill read the third time?

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read the third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. I shall vote very cheerfully for the reduction of our own salaries. I vote with great reluctance, and only because I cannot effect the other purpose without it, for the part of the bill which reduces the just compensation—certainly not more than the just compensation—given to a great many other officers by the law of last year.

Mr. COOPER. On this vote I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. CRAGIN. If he were here he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 50, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Boutwell, Buckingham, Cameron, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Crozier, Davis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Stockton, Sumner, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—50.

NAYS—Messrs. Brownlow, Conover, Flanagan, Gordon, Lewis, Norwood, Sprague, and Tipton—8.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Ames, Cooper, Cragin, Dennis, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Hamilton of Texas, Johnston, Jones, Kelly, Ransom, Stewart, and Thurman—14.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. Conkling, the title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill repealing the increase of salaries of members of Congress and other officers."

THE CURRENCY—SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move now, in order to leave it as the unfinished business, that we take up the special order, unless the Senator from Vermont desires to take up the bankrupt bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; we are not ready. I rose to move an executive session.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to take up the resolution reported by the Committee on Finance in relation to the currency and specie payments.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moves that the Senate do now adjourn. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 12, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the first business in order during the morning hour is the calling of the States and Territories for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to their appropriate committees, not to be brought back into the House by motions to reconsider. Under this call memorials and resolutions of State and Territorial Legislatures may be presented for printing and reference. The morning hour now begins at three minutes past twelve o'clock.

CONDITION OF THE UNITED STATES NAVY.

Mr. HALE, of Maine, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 36) providing for an inquiry into the condition of the United States Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS IN NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Mr. SMALL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1042) authorizing the Secretary of War to have a survey and estimates made of the cost of removing obstructions to navigation from Lamprey and Exeter Rivers, in the State of New Hampshire; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1043) to provide for continuing and completing the improvement of the Cocheco River in the State of New Hampshire; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

SEIZURES, ETC., IN CUSTOMS-REVENUE CASES.

Mr. DAWES introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1044) to regulate the seizure and examination of invoices, books, and papers in customs-revenue cases; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

B. W. HARRIS.

Mr. DAWES also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1045) for the relief of B. W. Harris, late collector of internal revenue for the second district of Massachusetts; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATIONS, ETC.

Mr. DAWES also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1046) in relation to estimates of appropriations and appropriation accounts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SAFETY OF LIFE ON RAILWAYS.

Mr. G. F. HOAR introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1047) to further insure the safety of the lives of passengers on railways; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

RIGHT TO VOTE.

Mr. LAWSON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1048) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act approved May 31, 1870, entitled 'An act to enforce the rights of citizens of the United States to vote in the several States of the Union, and for other purposes,'" approved February 28, 1871, and the act amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, and the act to which said acts are amendatory; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN C. LEMON.

Mr. BASS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1049) for the relief of John C. Lemon; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

JOSEPH BARTON AND WILLIAM THORN.

Mr. DUELL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1050) for the relief of Joseph Barton and William Thorn; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

RESTORATION OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. LANSING introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1051) for the restoration to their several positions in the Army of Captain J. Horace McGuire, First Lieutenant Henry D. Gardiner, Second Lieutenant William D. McGuire, and Second Lieutenant W. C. Reddy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CURRENCY.

Mr. MELLISH introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1052) to provide the money of the United States and to regulate the value thereof; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

NEW YORK INDIANS.

Mr. SESSIONS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1053) authorizing the Cattaraugus and Alleghany Indians in the State of New York to lease lands and quit titles to lands; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JEFFERSON W. DAVIS.

Mr. SESSIONS also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1054) granting a pension to Jefferson W. Davis, first lieutenant Company F, Sixty-fourth New York Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

NAVIGATION NEAR STATEN ISLAND.

Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1055) to appropriate money for the improvement of the navigation between Staten Island and New Jersey; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF PASSAIC RIVER.

Mr. WARD, of New Jersey, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1056) making an appropriation for continuing the improvement of the Passaic River; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENT OF THE TARIFF.

Mr. KILLINGER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1057) to repeal the second section of an act entitled "An act to reduce duties on imports, to reduce the internal taxes, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1872; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

RELIEF OF OFFICERS.

Mr. KILLINGER also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1058) for the relief of certain officers of the late war; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC-LAND LAWS.

Mr. TOWNSEND introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1059) to provide for a more efficient administration of the laws relating to public lands; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

GENERAL LAND-OFFICE.

Mr. TOWNSEND also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1060) to reorganize the clerical force of the General Land Office; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE W. BRADLEY.

Mr. TOWNSEND also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1061) for the relief of George W. Bradley; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN SNOWDEN & SON.

Mr. TAYLOR introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1062) referring the claim of John Snowden & Son to the Court of Claims; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

CAPTAIN JOHN C. BEAUMONT, UNITED STATES NAVY.

Mr. SHOEMAKER, of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1063) to restore Captain John C. Beaumont, of the United States Navy, to his original position on the Naval Register; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

OLD LAZARETTO TRACT.

Mr. SHOEMAKER, of Pennsylvania, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1064) to authorize the Secretary of War to lease not exceeding five acres of the tract of land known as the Old Lazaretto tract, for the purpose of erecting thereon a magazine or store-house for the storage of gunpowder; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CESSNA introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1065) to repeal so much of section 6 of the act of June 30, 1870, as prevents promotions in the Ordnance Department; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

EQUALIZATION OF PENSIONS.

Mr. SCOFIELD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1066) to equalize pensions in certain cases; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ADAM WARTHMAN.

Mr. HARMER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1067) for the relief of Adam Warthman; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD.

Mr. NEGLEY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1068) to extend the jurisdiction of the Light-House Board; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

INTERNAL-REVENUE SERVICE.

Mr. RANDALL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1069) to reorganize the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and to reduce the expenses of the internal-revenue service; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

HAND-MADE REAL LACES.

Mr. STORM introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1070) to amend the duty on hand-made real laces; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

BARBARA RENNER.

Mr. LOWNDES introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1071) for the relief of Barbara Renner, widow of Valentine Renner, deceased; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

AGRICULTURAL AND POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTES.

Mr. LOWNDES also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1072) to aid in establishing agricultural and polytechnical institutes in the several counties of the States and Territories and the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF NEW RIVER.

Mr. BOWEN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1073) to appropriate the sum of $50,000 to improve New River; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PAYMENT OF RENT.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, introducing a bill (H. R. No. 1074) to pay for rent of real property used by the Army of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

RELIEF OF MAIL CONTRACTORS.

Mr. VANCE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1075) for the relief of mail contractors for services rendered in the State of North Carolina prior to 31st May, 1861; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

REFUND OF COTTON TAX.

Mr. COOK introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1076) to refund certain taxes collected by the United States on raw cotton during the years 1863, 1864, 1865, 1866, 1867, and 1868; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

MARGARET S. FAIN.

Mr. BELL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1077) granting a pension to Margaret S. Fain; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

NATIONAL SCHOOL OF MINES.

Mr. BELL also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1078) to establish a national school of mines in the North Georgia Agricultural College, at Dahlonega, Georgia, to provide for the selection of a faculty for the same, and to appropriate a sum of money for the support and maintenance thereof; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining, and ordered to be printed.

ALLOWANCES TO CHEROKEE INDIANS.

Mr. BELL also introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 37) providing for the payment of a certain per capita allowance to the Indians of the Cherokee nation residing in the State of Georgia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JACOB R. DAVIS.

Mr. FREEMAN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1079) for the relief of Jacob R. Davis, of Richmond County, Georgia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs.

SELMA, ROME AND DALTON RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. WHITE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1080) to authorize the payment of moneys due the Selma, Rome and Dalton Railroad Company for mail services in 1861; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

MONROE DONOHUE.

Mr. WHITE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1081) for the relief of Monroe Donohue; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

PENSIONS AND BOUNTY LANDS.

Mr. WHITE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1082) to repeal certain acts and parts of acts excluding certain persons from pensions and bounty-land warrants for military and naval services rendered previous to 1861; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

VIOLATION OF REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. CALDWELL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1083) for the relief of persons who have unintentionally and unavoidably failed to comply with certain sections of the revenue laws of 1862; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. HOWE introduced bill (H. R. No. 1084) to change the place of holding the district court of the United States for the northern district of Mississippi; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM S. MASSEY.

Mr. BUNDY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1085) for the relief of William S. Massey; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

WILLIAM O. CORY.

Mr. BUNDY also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1086) for the relief of William O. Cory; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. LAMISON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1087) to prohibit national banks from receiving or paying interest on current deposits of other national banks; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

BUTLER, MILLER & CO. ET AL.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1088) for the relief of Butler, Miller & Co. and Hawkes, Miller & Co., of Ohio; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

GREEN, MARKS & CO.

Mr. NEAL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1089) for the relief of Green, Marks & Co.; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

CURRENCY AND THE PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. BERRY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1090) to establish a uniform and elastic currency, and to reduce the interest on the public debt; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM P. RICHARDSON.

Mr. SPRAGUE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1091) for the relief of William P. Richardson, late collector of internal revenue, fifteenth district of the State of Ohio; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

ARTHUR W. M'CARTY.

Mr. SPRAGUE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1092) for the relief of Arthur W. McCarty, late first lieutenant Seventy-eighth Regiment Ohio Infantry Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

EMPLOYÉS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. SPRAGUE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1093) for the relief of the employés of the Senate and House of Representatives of the Forty-second Congress who did not receive the 15 per cent. increase of compensation; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

TRANSPORTATION AND RAILROADS.

Mr. WOODWORTH introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1094) to establish a bureau of transportation, and to regulate the management of railroads and transportation companies employed in interstate commerce; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. BECK introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1095) to regulate the seizure and examination of invoices, books, and papers in custom-revenue cases; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES ROACH.

Mr. DURHAM introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1096) granting a pension to James Roach, of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MRS. HUMPHREY MARSHALL.

Mr. STANDEFORD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1097) for the relief of the widow of Humphrey Marshall; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

SOLDIERS CHARGED WITH DESERTION.

Mr. ADAMS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1098) relieving certain soldiers and sailors from the charge of desertion; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

RELIEF OF OFFICERS OF THE ARMY.

Mr. ADAMS also introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 38) amendatory of "A joint resolution for the relief of certain officers of the Army," approved July 26, 1866; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

KENTUCKY VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. ADAMS also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1099) for the benefit of sundry citizens of Eastern Kentucky who volunteered to aid in the protection of supplies for the Army; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

JOHN T. FRIEND.

Mr. ADAMS also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1100) for the benefit of John T. Friend, of Kentucky, a soldier of the war of 1812; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

JONATHAN MARTIN.

Mr. READ introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1101) granting a pension to Jonathan Martin, of Hardin County, Kentucky, for services in the war of 1812 with Great Britain; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

PASCHAL M'CULLAR.

Mr. NUNN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1102) for the relief of Paschal McCullar, of Bethel Springs, McNairy County, in the State of Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

MR. BENJAMIN F. SCATES.

Mr. NUNN also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1103) for the relief of Benjamin F. Scates, postmaster of Union City, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN ALDREDGE.

Mr. MAYNARD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1104) for the relief of John Aldredge, of McNairy County, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

NATIONAL ORPHANS' HOME, GETTYSBURGH.

Mr. MAYNARD also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1105) for the relief of the National Orphans' Home at Seminary Hill, Gettysburgh, Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

MARY PATTON.

Mr. THORNBURGH introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1106) granting back pension to Mary Patton; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

HARRISON MITCHELL.

Mr. PACKARD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1107) granting a pension to Harrison Mitchell; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ALFRED FRY.

Mr. PACKARD also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1108) for the relief of Alfred Fry; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

J. C. HANNUM.

Mr. CASON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1109) for the relief of J. C. Hannum, late postmaster of Delphi, Indiana; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

BREVET APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. COBURN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1110) relating to certain brevet appointments; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PATRICK O. HAWES.

Mr. COBURN also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1111) for the relief of Patrick O. Hawes, late second lieutenant Forty-fifth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SOLDIERS' ORPHANS' HOME.

Mr. McNULTA introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1112) to donate certain military equipments to the trustees of the Soldiers' Orphans' Home of Illinois; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

STORAGE OF MANUFACTURED TOBACCO.

Mr. KNAPP introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1113) to amend the revenue laws so as to permit the storage of manufactured tobacco in warehouses; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL GAMAGE.

Mr. BARRERE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1114) for the relief of Samuel Gamage; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

ANNA BRASEL.

Mr. BARRERE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1115) to restore pension to Anna Brasel; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MARY R. THOMPSON.

Mr. CORWIN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1116) for the relief of Mary R. Thompson; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

DELANA HOWARD.

Mr. CORWIN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1117) for the relief of Delana Howard; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

JAMES M. TRUE.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1118) for the relief of James M. True, late colonel of the Sixty-second Illinois Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SESSIONS OF THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. WELLS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1119) changing the time of holding the Supreme Court and providing for a session of the same at Saint Louis; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

W. H. MOORE & CO.

Mr. WELLS also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1120) for the relief of W. H. Moore & Co., for depredations committed by Cheyenne Indians; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and, with accompanying papers, ordered to be printed.

WAR ACCOUNT WITH MISSOURI.

Mr. WELLS also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1121) for the relief of the State of Missouri on account of ordnance and ordnance stores issued to said State by the United States during the late war of the rebellion; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. MARTHA E. NORTHUP.

Mr. HAVENS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1122) granting a pension to Mrs. Martha E. Northup, widow of First Lieutenant Edward B. Northup, late of the Seventeenth United States Infantry; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

INTERNAL TAXES ON TOBACCO.

Mr. HYDE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1123) to repeal the internal taxes upon tobacco; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SOLDIERS AND SAILORS OF THE WAR OF 1812.

Mr. HYDE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1124) to extend the provisions of an act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 and the widows of deceased soldiers and sailors;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. GLOVER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1125) giving the consent of the United States to the erection of a bridge across the Mississippi River at the town of Canton, Lewis County, State of Missouri; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. FIELD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1126) to repeal so much of section 6 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1869, as prohibits promotions and new appointments in the Ordnance Department of the Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PAYMENT OF DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1127) making United States Treasury notes a legal tender for duties on imports; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

PREVENTION OF FINANCIAL PANICS.

Mr. FIELD also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1128) to prevent financial panics; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

The reading of the bill being called for, it was read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue, from time to time, on demand, in exchange at par for legal-tender notes, the bonds of the United States in denominations of fifty dollars, or any multiple thereof; said bonds to be called three sixty-five convertible bonds, to bear interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum, and principal and interest payable on demand in legal-tender notes of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to redeem said bonds on demand at the United States Treasury, at the offices of the assistant treasurers of the United States, and at such other convenient places within the United States as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate for the purpose, and under such regulations as he may prescribe; and whenever said bonds shall be presented for payment and paid, as aforesaid, the same shall be immediately canceled and stamped with the date of payment and the word "paid" on the face thereof, and the same shall be forwarded to the Treasurer of the United States. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall monthly cause the bonds so paid to be destroyed in the presence of the Treasurer of the United States and the Register of the Treasury, of which destruction a memorandum or record shall be made, showing the date, denomination, number, and date of payment of each bond, in a book to be provided for that purpose, and signed by the officers aforesaid.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue $44,000,000 of United States legal-tender notes, known as "greenbacks," and commonly denominated the "reserve," and such further sum of legal-tender notes as may be required to carry into effect the provisions of this act, of such amounts as he may deem expedient, not less than one dollar each, which, together with all legal-tender notes heretofore issued, shall be receivable in payment of all taxes, duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind due to the United States, and for all claims and demands against the United States of every kind whatever, except where the law creating such claim or demand requires that the same shall be paid in coin, and shall be lawful money and legal tender in payment of all public and private debts, except as aforesaid, within the United States, and shall be receivable in payment of all loans made to the United States. Said notes shall be in the similitude of the legal-tender greenback currency-notes heretofore issued, except that they shall bear on their face the denomination or value for which they are money, and the words "convertible at the option of the holder to United States bonds bearing interest at the rate of three and sixty-five hundredths per centum per annum," together with appropriate vignettes to prevent counterfeiting, and such signatures, checks, and numbers, or other references, as may be best to prevent over-issue or forgeries, and on the back thereof shall be printed the provisions of law under which they are issued.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to apply the amount of the legal-tender notes received in exchange for the bonds authorized by the first section of this act, to the extent that may be required for the purpose, in the redemption of such of the said three sixty-five convertible bonds as may be presented for payment, and the residue of said legal-tender notes, received in exchange for bonds as aforesaid, in the purchase weekly of the 6 per cent. bonds of the United States known as five-twenty bonds, each and every week after the passage of this act, until the entire issue of said 6 per cent. bonds shall have been redeemed and paid; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to purchase said 6 per cent. bonds, at the lowest prices he can obtain, by inviting proposals for the same, giving at least five days' public notice, and requesting holders thereof to state the lowest price they will take for such bonds, payable in the legal-tender notes of the United States.

SEC. 5. That after the 30th day of June, 1874, the national banking associations shall cease to be banks of issue, and that all taxes on their circulation shall thereafter cease; and the Comptroller of the Currency shall, from the date aforesaid, charge to each national bank interest semi-annually at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, in coin, on the amount of their bills outstanding and unredeemed, and he shall deduct the amount thereof from the amount of the interest payable by the United States to such bank on the United States registered bonds lodged to secure the redemption of its circulating notes, and the Comptroller shall continue half-yearly to charge and collect interest as aforesaid until such national bank shall deposit with the Treasurer of the United States lawful money of the United States sufficient to redeem all its outstanding circulation, and thereafter the notes of such national bank shall be redeemed at the Treasury of the United States as by law provided.

MICHIGAN SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan, presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, asking Congress for an appropriation for the survey of the Michigan ship-canal; which was referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

NIAGARA SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan, also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, asking Congress to provide for the early construction of the Niagara ship-canal; which was referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

TAXING LANDS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. WALDRON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1129) giving the assent of Congress to the State of Michigan to tax all lands sold by the United States therein from and after the date of sale; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM H. DANIELS.

Mr. WALLS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1130) for the relief of William H. Daniels, late collector of Apalachicola, Florida; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

IMPROVEMENT OF KEY WEST HARBOR.

Mr. WALLS also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1131) making an appropriation for the improvement and deepening of the northwest channel of the harbor at Key West, Florida; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

SAMUEL KILGORE.

Mr. HERNDON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1132) for the relief of Samuel Kilgore, a citizen of Texas; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

IMPROVEMENT OF SABINE AND TRINITY RIVERS.

Mr. HERNDON also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1133) appropriating money for the improvement of the navigation of the Sabine and Trinity Rivers, the Cypress Bayou, and the construction of a canal connecting Sabine Lake and Galveston Bay, in the State of Texas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ANDREW NEWMAN.

Mr. HANCOCK introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1134) for the relief of Andrew Newman; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. GIDDINGS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1135) for the relief of certain citizens of Benham, Texas, and to pay for property appropriated and destroyed by United States soldiers in September, 1866; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

MIRANDA MATTHEWS.

Mr. HERNDON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1136) to reinstate upon the pension-roll the widow of Henry Matthews, who was a private in Company A, Texas Mounted Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

FEES OF UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. WILLIE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1137) to further regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and district attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

REVISION OF PENSION LAWS.

Mr. DONNAN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1138) to amend section 4 of an act to revise, consolidate, and amend the laws relating to pensions; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

OCCUPYING CLAIMANTS.

Mr. ORR introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1139) for the benefit of occupying claimants; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

FEES OF REGISTERS, ETC.

Mr. ORR also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1140) fixing the fees of registers and receivers of land-offices in cases of contested entries; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

JOHN CLEGHORN.

Mr. ORR also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1141) for the relief of John Cleghorn, late register of the land office at Sioux City, Iowa; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

DES MOINES RIVER GRANT.

Mr. ORR also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1142) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to indemnify the holders of pre-emption and homestead certificates and certificates of entry and patents upon lands in Iowa within the so-called Des Moines River grant, on account of failure of title and a relinquishment of the paramount title of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' HOMESTEADS.

Mr. McDILL, of Wisconsin, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1143) relating to soldiers' and sailors' homesteads; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

RACHEL PHILLIPS.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1144) to grant a pension to Rachel Phillips, widow of Gilbert Phillips; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MARTIN LAFLIN.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1145) granting a pension to Martin Laflin; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

JOHN E. COX.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1146) granting a pension to John E. Cox; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

APPRAISER-GENERAL FOR PACIFIC COAST.

Mr. CLAYTON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1147) to provide for the appointment of an appraiser-general for the Pacific Coast; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

CHINESE IN THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. HOUGHTON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1148) providing for a commission to collect information relative to the condition of the Chinese in the United States; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Would not the bill more properly go to the Committee on the Centennial Celebration, which has in hand all matters connected with the census?

The SPEAKER. This bill provides for a commission to collect information relative to the condition of the Chinese in the United States. The Chair thinks the Committee on Education and Labor is the proper committee to which it should be referred.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed.

HOMESTEAD AND PRE-EMPTION LAWS.

Mr. DUNNELL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1149) in relation to the occupation of the public lands under the homestead or pre-emption laws; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. MARY A. M'COMB.

Mr. DUNNELL also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1150) for the relief of Mrs. Mary A. McComb; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

CHARLES W. DENTON.

Mr. NESMITH introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1151) for the relief of Charles W. Denton, of Oregon; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

RAILROAD LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. PHILLIPS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1152) to define and limit the claims of certain railroad companies to certain lands; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

OSAGE CEDED LANDS.

Mr. PHILLIPS also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1153) to reimburse certain settlers on the Osage lands who made improvements on the same while they were ceded as public lands, for such improvements; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1154) authorizing proceedings to be instituted in the United States circuit court for the district of Kansas to determine title to the Osage ceded lands; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

SUPPLIES FOR INDIAN SERVICE.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1155) to provide for the mode and place of purchasing supplies for the Indian service; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM C. O'BRIEN.

Mr. LOWE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1156) for the relief of William C. O'Brien; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

MEXICAN WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. ELKINS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1157) to provide for the payment of certain volunteer companies in the service of the United States in the war with Mexico, and in the suppression of Indian disturbances in New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT COURTS IN WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. McFADDEN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1158) to provide for the manner of fixing the terms of the district courts in the Territory of Washington, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

SEATTLE AND WALLA WALLA RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. McFADDEN also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1159) granting the right of way to the Seattle and Walla Walla Railroad and Transportation Company, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Territories, and ordered to be printed.

He also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1160) to grant and confirm to the Seattle and Walla Walla Railroad and Transportation Company the tide lands in, under, and about Elliott's Bay, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

FORT REYNOLDS MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. CHAFFEE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1161) to authorize the sale of the military reservation of Fort Reynolds in Colorado Territory and the Government buildings thereon; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DENVER AND PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. CHAFFEE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1162) granting the right of way through the public lands to the Denver and South Park and Pacific Railroad Company; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

SAINT PAUL AND SIOUX CITY RAILROAD.

Mr. ARMSTRONG introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1163) to authorize the Saint Paul and Sioux City Railroad Company to construct a branch from Sibley, in the State of Iowa, to Yankton, in the Territory of Dakota; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

DAKOTA CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. ARMSTRONG also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1164) granting the right of way to the Dakota Central Railroad Company; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

MILTON B. DUFFIELD.

Mr. McCORMICK introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1165) for the relief of Milton B. Duffield, late United States marshal for the Territory of Arizona; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

BOISE BASIN FLUMING COMPANY.

Mr. HAILEY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1166) granting the right of way to the Boise Basin Bed Rock Fluming Company, of Idaho Territory, over public lands of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

LAND DISTRICT IN IDAHO.

Mr. HAILEY also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1167) to create an additional land district in the Territory of Idaho; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

INDIANS IN MONTANA.

Mr. MAGINNIS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1168) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the removal of the Flathead and other Indians from the Bitter Root Valley in the Territory of Montana," approved June 5, 1872; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

TILFORD KUTCH AND OTHERS.

Mr. STEELE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1169) for the relief of Tilford Kutch, W. P. Davidson, and other settlers in Wind River Valley, Wyoming Territory; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

INTERNAL TAXES.

Mr. CHIPMAN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1170) to amend an act entitled "An act to reduce internal taxes, and for other purposes," approved July 14, 1870; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE P. FISHER.

Mr. CHIPMAN also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1171) for the relief of George P. Fisher; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The call of the States and Territories having now been completed, the Chair will, by unanimous consent, receive bills for reference from such members as were not in when their States were called.

DUTIES ON IMPORTED GOODS.

Mr. DAWES introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1172) to regulate duties on certain imported goods; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

W. E. PRINCE.

Mr. KASSON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1173) granting a pension to W. E. Prince, of Iowa; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

JONATHAN BROCK.

Mr. KELLEY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1174) for the relief of Jonathan Brock; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

COLLECTION DISTRICT IN NEW JERSEY.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1175) to make a collection district in the State of New Jersey; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

HEIRS OF MATTHEW ALEXIS ROCHAMFOIS.

Mr. PARSONS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1176) for the relief of the heirs at law of Matthew Alexis Rochamfois; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

JAMES LILLIE.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1177) to exempt James Lillie, of Missouri, from the payment of fifty-five dollars for postage-stamps, stamped envelopes, and funds, destroyed by fire while postmaster; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

MRS. MARY ANN TYSON ET AL.

Mr. O'NEILL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1178) to refer to the Court of Claims the case of Mrs. Mary Ann Tyson et al. against the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

INVALID PENSIONS.

Mr. WOODFORD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1179) establishing an increased rate of invalid pensions after July 1, 1874; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

STENOGRAPHERS FOR UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. WOODFORD also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1180) to provide stenographers for the United States courts of the northern, southern, and eastern districts of the State of New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

LEGAL EXPENSES OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. WOODFORD also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1181) making an appropriation for the payment of certain legal expenses of the Government; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

GENERAL SAMUEL W. CRAWFORD.

Mr. MYERS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1182) in regard to the retirement of General Samuel W. Crawford, United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. MARY R. ROBINSON.

Mr. BUNDY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1183) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary R. Robinson; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

REVOLUTIONARY CLAIMS.

Mr. ARCHER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1184) to provide for the settlement of the claims of the officers of the Revolutionary Army, and of the widows and children of those who died in the service; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ESTATE OF J. B. ARMSTRONG.

Mr. SMITH, of New York, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 39) in the matter of the payment of certain moneys appropriated to the estate of J. B. Armstrong, deceased; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I move that this joint resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCKNER. I object to the resolution. If it was introduced by unanimous consent I want to see it. I have clients that are interested in the matter.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. It is merely explanatory of a bill that was passed by the last Congress.

The SPEAKER. It does not require unanimous consent, but it requires a majority vote.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the joint resolutions be read, so that we may know what we are voting upon.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH] state from what committee came the act of which this joint resolution is explanatory?

Mr. SMITH, of New York. It came from the Committee on Claims, and required proof of the loyalty of the claimants. This joint resolution was not drawn by me.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will accept a suggestion, the Chair thinks this joint resolution should go to the same committee that reported the matter in the last Congress.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I have no objection, and will make that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution was accordingly referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE M. BOOK.

Mr. MOORE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1185) to reinstate Lieutenant George M. Book on the active list of the Navy; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

RECRUITING SERVICE.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1186) to discontinue the recruiting service of the Army of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

TRADEWATER RIVER, KENTUCKY.

Mr. CROSSLAND introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1187) making an appropriation for the improvement of Tradewater River, Kentucky; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

JAMES M. NEELY.

Mr. ATKINS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1188) granting a pension to James M. Neely, late first lieutenant Company C, Seventh Tennessee Cavalry; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ANTHONY LAWSON AND THOMAS A. BREWIS.

Mr. HUNTON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1189) for the relief of Anthony Lawson and Thomas A. Brewis, and their heirs; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

LANDS SOLD FOR DIRECT TAXES.

Mr. HUNTON also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1190) for the relief of owners and purchasers of lands sold for direct taxes in insurrectionary States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States.

PASSENGERS ON STEAM-VESSELS.

Mr. BURLEIGH introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1191) to amend "An act to provide for the better security of life on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes," approved February 28, 1871; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MAJOR C. S. UNDERWOOD.

Mr. MACDOUGALL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1192) for the relief of the estate of the late Major C. S. Underwood, paymaster United States Army; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

FREIGHT RAILWAY.

Mr. HURLBUT introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1194) chartering a double-track freight railway from tide-water on the Atlantic to the Missouri River, and to limit the rates of freight thereon; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES L. BARNWELL.

Mr. RANSIER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1195) for the relief of James L. Barnwell, late of Beaufort, South Carolina; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

CIRCUIT COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1196) to order and appoint the times for holding the circuit courts of the United States for the fourth judicial circuit, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1197) to confer concurrent jurisdiction on the circuit courts of the United States in matters relating to the revenue; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1198) to provide for the removal of suits from the State courts to the circuit courts of the United States in certain cases; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1199) for expediting the business of the judicial courts of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

SURETIES OF JESSE J. SIMKINS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1200) for the relief of the sureties of the late Jesse J. Simkins, collector of the port of Norfolk, Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES STEAMER BIENVILLE.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1201) authorizing the payment of prize-money to the officers and crew of the United States steamer Bienville; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ADJUDICATION OF COTTON CLAIMS.

Mr. MOREY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1202) to transfer for adjudication to the Court of Claims all claims which have been presented to the Secretary of the Treasury under the provisions of the act of May 18, 1872, for the proceeds of cotton taken by the United States subsequent to June 30, 1865; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

DANIEL BROWN AND JAMES ROBINSON.

Mr. MOREY also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1203) for the relief of Daniel Brown and James Robinson; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENT OF AN APPROPRIATION ACT.

Mr. MOREY also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1204) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1872, and for former years, and for other purposes;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

DUTY ON SALT.

Mr. KNAPP introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1205) to repeal the duties on salt; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

CHARLES J. SANDS.

Mr. WOODFORD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1206) for the relief of Charles J. Sands, of Brooklyn, New York; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

JAMES W. BOWEN.

Mr. KILLINGER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1207) for the relief of James W. Bowen, late provost-marshal of the tenth congressional district of Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PROTECTION OF PERSONS OF FOREIGN BIRTH.

Mr. NEGLEY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1208) to protect persons of foreign birth against forcible constraint or involuntary servitude; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. MELLISH, by unanimous consent, presented the following petition; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

To the United States Senate and House of Representatives:

The undersigned, citizens of the United States, respectfully ask you to provide for the appointment of a commission of inquiry, of five or more competent persons, whose duty it shall be, first, to inquire and take testimony as to the results of the traffic in alcoholic liquors, in connection with crime, pauperism, the public health, the moral, social, and intellectual well-being of the people; second, concerning prohibitory legislation in Maine, Massachusetts, and other States of the Union, and its effects upon intemperance; and, third, to recommend what additional legislation, if any, would be beneficial on the part of Congress to suppress, in the sphere of national authority, the traffic in alcoholic liquors as beverages.

On behalf of the members and congregation of Saint Paul's Methodist Episcopal church of New York City.

CYRUS D. FOSS, Pastor.
ALFRED S. PURDY,
GEORGE FORRESTER,
SAMUEL R. SPELMAN,
WILLIAM L. RAYMOND,
JOSEPH GRAYDON,
A. V. STORER,
EDWIN HYDE,
WILLIAM TRUSLAND,
EDWIN MEED,
Officers.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. COX, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish for the information of this House a statement showing the amount or amounts of money paid into the Treasury of the United States under section 66 of the act of June 7,1872, authorizing the appointment of shipping commissioners, and for other purposes.

JOHN M. LAMB.

Mr. AVERILL. Mr. Speaker, the bill (H. R. No. 981) for the relief of John M. Lamb, of Saint Paul, Minnesota, has been erroneously referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I move that that committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN PEACE COMMISSION.

Mr. AVERILL also, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back a communication from Samuel M. Janney, on behalf of the executive committee of Friends, relating to Indians; and moved that the same be printed and recommitted.

The motion was agreed to.

ENGRAVING NATIONAL-BANK NOTES.

On motion of Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 698) repealing so much of the sundry civil appropriation bill, approved March 3, 1873, as appropriates money for engraving new circulating notes for national banks; and the same was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

C. N. FELTON.

On motion of Mr. GARFIELD, the Committee on Appropriations was also discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 977) for the relief of C. N. Felton, late assistant treasurer of the United States at San Francisco, California; and the same was referred to the Committee on Claims.

OREGON INDIAN WAR.

On motion of Mr. GARFIELD, the Committee on Appropriations was also discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 990) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of the expenses incurred in the suppression of Indian hostilities therein in the years 1855 and 1856," approved March 2, 1861; and the same was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REMOVAL OF OBSTRUCTIONS.

On motion of Mr. GARFIELD, the Committee on Appropriations was also discharged from the further consideration of the petition of citizens of Posey County, Indiana, praying for the removal of obstructions in the Ohio River, opposite Mount Vernon; and the same was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

NATIONAL WASHINGTONIAN HOME.

On motion of Mr. GARFIELD, the Committee on Appropriations was also discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 959) to incorporate a National Washingtonian Home; and the same was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DENVER MINT.

On motion of Mr. GARFIELD, the Committee on Appropriations was also discharged from the further consideration of petitions from the citizens of Colorado, praying that the United States branch mint at Denver may be authorized to coin gold and silver; and the same was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

SARATOGA MONUMENT ASSOCIATION.

On motion of Mr. GARFIELD, the Committee on Appropriations was also discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the Saratoga Monument Association, for the appropriation of $200,000 to aid in the erection of the monument at Schuylerville, New York, to commemorate the surrender of the British army, under General Burgoyne, on the 17th of October, 1777; and the same was laid upon the table.

WRONG REFERENCE.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to state, Mr. Speaker, in this connection, that the Committee on Appropriations will report back all claims improperly referred to that committee, and ask they shall be referred to the Committee on Claims. It will save the trouble of making double entries upon our dockets, and at the same time save delay in action upon business which gentlemen present, if they will refer in the first place all such papers to the Committee on Claims instead of to the Committee on Appropriations.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the following cases; and the same were referred to the Committee on War Claims:

Petition of Julia A. Nutt, administratrix of Haller Nutt, deceased, of Natchez, Adams County, Mississippi, for quartermaster-general's stores taken by the United States forces;

Memorial of Francis A. Gibbons, for the payment of grain furnished under a military order of the Quartermaster-General, at Baltimore, Maryland, in 1861;

Memorial of N. H. Dunphee;

Petition of Silas Wolverton, of Lexington, Kentucky, for compensation for horses captured by the Confederates on mail route;

Petition of the heirs of Seth Lamb, of the city of Washington, to be reimbursed for expenses incurred in furnishing meals to officers and soldiers of different companies of United States volunteers in 1861;

A bill (H. R. No. 704) for the relief of Robert H. Watts, a citizen of the State of Florida:

A petition for the relief of Robertson Topp and William L. Vance; and

A bill (H. R. No. 568) for the relief of John L. Holland.

NORTH BERWICK NATIONAL BANK.

On motion of Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 1099) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue new national-bank notes to the North Berwick National Bank for mutilated notes burned in mail-car; and the same was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

ROBERT BENT AND JACK SMITH.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1209) for the relief of Robert Bent and Jack Smith for six hundred and forty acres of land each, granted them by the Arapahoes and Cheyennes, as per treaty concluded February 18, 1861; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

The SPEAKER. These references are all made, and will be so entered upon the Journal, with the understanding they are not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

EDUCATIONAL FUND.

Mr. PAGE, by unanimous consent, presented the following amendment to a bill (H. R. No. 477) to establish an educational fund and apply the proceeds of the public lands to the education of the people, which he intended to offer when in order; and the same was ordered to be printed:

Strike out the words in line 3, section 1, page 1, "That the net proceeds of the public land," and insert the following: "That one-half of the net proceeds of the public lands embraced within railroad limits and contiguous to the alternate sections of lands granted to aid in the construction of any railroad or canal, the price of which is fixed by law at double the minimum rates."

INCREASE OF TAXES.

The SPEAKER. There comes over from a previous Monday's proceedings a motion by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] to suspend the rules and agree to the resolution which the Clerk will report in full.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of this House that the taxes which now burden the people should not be increased, but that the extraordinary means, if any be required, for the support of the Government during the temporary paralysis in the industries of the country now prevailing, should be met by a temporary loan or loans, bearing a low rate of interest in currency, and redeemable in United States notes.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he will not allow the resolution to go to the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. KELLEY. I would rather have a vote on it, as expressive of the sense of the House. That is all it purports to do. It does not legislate.

Mr. DAWES. It seems to me that the sense of the House could be better obtained after reference than before.

Mr. KELLEY. I believe it is not open to debate. I move the rules be suspended and the resolution passed.

Mr. COX. Would it be in order to have the question divided?

The SPEAKER. It would not—under a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would like to have the resolution again reported.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is it possible to have the question divided?

The SPEAKER. It is not. A division of the question is a right under the rules. This is a proposition to suspend the rules.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Would the gentleman from Pennsylvania consent to divide it?

Mr. KELLEY. I decline to divide it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to modify his motion so as to suspend the rules and bring the resolution for discussion before the House. I think it would be very instructive, both to the House and the country, to have the principle involved in it discussed.

Mr. KELLEY. The resolution has been before the House and the country for three or four weeks, and, as I know, has been very largely discussed. I would rather have a vote on it.

Mr. WOOD. With the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania I desire to make a remark. Since the gentleman introduced his resolution it is understood that the Treasury is in a condition that it can avoid not only taxation but also the temporary loans proposed in this resolution. Therefore, I submit to him whether he had not better divide the resolution, so as to take the sense of the House on the first part of it, to which I am sure nobody would object, and lay over the second.

Mr. KELLEY. I would prefer taking the sense of the House on the resolution as it stands. I call for the question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to make a suggestion? He must know that everybody recognizes the very great importance of the subject which is brought up by his resolution; and I am sure that no one would be readier than he to debate this question and show the reasons for his opinions on this as on all other political topics. Therefore, I hope he will allow a debate on the very important issues involved in his resolution. I appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to consent to this.

Mr. KELLEY. There is a great deal of business pressing upon the House, and there is considerable anxiety upon the part of the country to know the sentiments of the House upon this question. The Committee on Banking and Currency and the Committee on Ways and Means have bills before them which will come before the House at an early day and invite the amplest discussion. I do not wish that the resolution, which is an expression of the sense of the House in response to the demands of the Secretary of the Treasury——

Mr. COX. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. COX. Then I object to debate, unless it is to be made general.

Mr. KELLEY. So do I; and I call for the question.

Mr. POTTER. Will the gentleman allow me to state that the manner in which he insists on getting at this vote——

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] please interpose his objection to debate? If he does not, I must interpose it for him.

The SPEAKER. Debate being objected to, it can only be proceeded with by unanimous consent.

Mr. KELLEY. I demand the yeas and nays on my motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the resolution be again reported.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. HEREFORD. Would it be in order to move a substitute?

The SPEAKER. It would not.

Mr. POTTER. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order to now move to refer this political conundrum to the Committee on Ways and Means?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not regard that as a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BECK. Would it be in order to move that the House do now adjourn?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. BECK. I make that motion. I wish to put a stop to this humbug, if possible.

The question was taken on Mr. BECK's motion, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I wish to ask my colleague [Mr. KELLEY] whether he will accept in the last clause an amendment that the deficiency be made up by retrenchment and economy?

Mr. KELLEY. I want a vote on the resolution as submitted by me; not on any other gentleman's resolution.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 155, nays 82, not voting 49; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albright, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Barry, Bass, Begole, Bell, Berry, Biery, Blount, Bowen, Brown, Buckner, Bundy, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Comingo, Conger, Cook, Corwin, Crittenden, Crossland, Crutchfield, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Davis, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Durham, Eden, Elliott, Farwell, Field, Fort, Freeman, Glover, Harmer, Henry R. Harris, Hatcher, Havens, John B. Hawley, Hays, Hereford, Hersey, Holman, Houghton, Howe, Hubbell, Hunter, Hunton, Hyde, Hynes, Kelley, Kendall, Killinger, Knapp, Lamison, Lansing, Lawrence, Leach, Loughridge, Lowe, Lowndes, Luttrell, Lynch, Magee, Marshall, McJunkin, McNulta, Milliken, Mills, Monroe, Moore, Morey, Myers, Neal, Negley, Nesmith, Niblack, Nunn, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Isaac C. Parker, Pratt, Randall, Rapier, Read, Richmond, Robbins, James W. Robinson, Rusk, Henry B. Sayler, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, L. D. Shoemaker, Sloss, Small, William A. Smith, Southard, Sprague, Stanard, Standeford, Strait, Strawbridge, Taylor, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tyner, Vance, Waddell, Wallace, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wells, White, Whitehead, Whitthorne, Wilber, William Williams, William B. Williams, Willie, James Wilson, Wolfe, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—155.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Barnum, Beck, Bland, Bradley, Bright, Buffinton, Burchard, Burleigh, Clayton, Clymer, Cotton, Cox, Crocker, Crounse, Dawes, DeWitt, Eames, Foster, Frye, Garfield, Giddings, Gooch, Gunckel, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, Joseph R. Hawley, Hendee, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hoskins, Kasson, Lawson, Lewis, Maynard, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, McDougall, Mellish, Merriam, Mitchell, Morrison, Niles, O'Brien, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Pierce, Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Potter, Rainey, Ray, Rice, Ellis H. Roberts, Sawyer, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, James S. Smart, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Starkweather, Stone, Storm, Stowell, Swann, Waldron, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Charles W. Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, Wood, and Woodford—82.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Banning, Barber, Barrere, Bromberg, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Creamer, Crooke, Eldredge, John T. Harris, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hooper, Hurlbut, Jewett, Kellogg, Lamar, Lamport, Lofland, Martin, McKee, McLean, Parsons, Pelham, Phillips, Pike, James H. Platt, jr., Purman, Ransier, Rawls, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Ross, Milton Sayler, Henry J. Scudder, George L. Smith, J. Ambler Smith, Snyder, Speer, Stephens, St. John, Sypher, Thomas, Tremain, Walls, Whiteley, George Willard, Ephraim K. Wilson, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—49.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. HUNTON. My colleague, Judge HARRIS, has been called home on account of illness in his family.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. My colleague, Mr. KELLOGG, is absent on account of severe sickness in his family; if present he would vote "no."

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. SPEER, is necessarily absent.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 434) making an appropriation for the legislative expenses of Colorado Territory.

REVENUE EXPENDITURES.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for action at this time upon the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk and desire to have read, and I move that the rules be suspended and the resolution passed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That in the judgment of this House there is no necessity for increased taxation or for an increase of the public debt by a further loan if there shall be severe economy in the public expenditures; and in view of the condition of the national finances this House will reduce the appropriations and public expenditures to the lowest point consistent with a proper administration of public affairs.

Mr. BECK. I call for the yeas and nays on that resolution.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suggest to the gentleman that he add, "and if there shall be general prosperity through the country."

Mr. RANDALL. Prosperity is coming rapidly.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to modify the first clause of that resolution so as not to make the absolute statement that no increase of taxation in any way is needed, but to so word it as to declare that we will do everything we can to prevent the necessity of an increase.

Mr. BECK. There is none.

Mr. GARFIELD. I want to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] if he means to say that we do know now that we can cut down the appropriations so as to meet the present emergency without any taxation. I do not know it; I wish I did.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the House can safely say to the country that no further taxation is necessary.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the gentleman will propose to reduce the expenditures to the current receipts, whatever they may be.

Mr. BECK. I object to debate.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suggest to the gentleman that he move to amend the rules, so that our appropriations shall be reduced to the lowest point consistent with a proper administration of the Government.

The question was taken on Mr. HOLMAN's motion; and there were—yeas 221, nays 3, not voting 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Albright, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Banning, Barnum, Barrere, Barry, Beck, Begole, Bell, Berry, Biery, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clements, Clymer, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Comingo, Conger, Cook, Corwin, Cotton, Cox, Crittenden, Crocker, Crutchfield, Curtis, Danford, Davis, Dawes, De Witt, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Durham, Eames, Eden, Elliott, Farwell, Field, Fort, Foster, Frye, Garfield, Giddings, Glover, Gooch, Gunckel, Eugene Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Henry R. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Havens, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hereford, Herndon, Hersey, E. Rockwood Hoar, Holman, Hooper, Hoskins, Houghton, Howe, Hubbell, Hunter, Hunton, Hurlbut, Hyde, Hynes, Kasson, Kelley, Kendall, Killinger, Knapp, Lamison, Lansing, Lawrence, Lawson, Leach, Loughridge, Lowe, Lowndes, Luttrell, Lynch, Magee, Marshall, Martin, Maynard, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, McDougall, McNulta, Merriam, Milliken, Mills, Mitchell, Monroe, Moore, Morrison, Myers, Neal, Negley, Nesmith, Niblack, Nunn, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Hosea W. Parker, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Phillips, Pierce, Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Randall, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Read, Rice, Richmond, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloss, Small, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Southard, Sprague, Standeford, Starkweather, Stone, Storm, Strait, Strawbridge, Swann, Taylor, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tyner, Vance, Waddell, Waldron, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Wells, White, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, Willie, James Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—221.

NAYS—Messrs. Barber, Hays, and William A. Smith—3.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Bass, Bromberg, Benjamin F. Butler, Clinton L. Cobb, Creamer, Crooke, Crossland, Crounse, Darrall, Eldredge, Freeman, Robert S. Hale, John T. Harris, Hathorn, John W. Hazelton, George F. Hoar, Jewett, Kellogg, Lamar, Lamport, Lewis, Lofland, McJunkin, McKee, McLean, Mellish, Morey, Niles, O'Brien, Page, Pike, James H. Platt, jr., Potter, Pratt, Purman, Rainey, Rawls, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Ross, Henry J. Scudder, Sener

Smart, George L. Smith, J. Ambler Smith, Snyder, Speer, Stanard, Stephens, St. John, Stowell, Sypher, Thomas, Tremain, Wallace, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, Whiteley, George Willard, Ephraim K. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodford—62.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the resolution agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. SPEER, is necessarily absent; if here he would vote "ay" on this question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I vote "ay" with a reservation as to the first clause; I vote "ay" on the resolution, but I have doubts about what appears to be a preamble.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I have one more resolution upon this subject, which I send to the Clerk's desk; and I move that the rules be suspended, and that it be passed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to the gentleman that he allow us to go into Committee of the Whole on the naval appropriation bill, so that we may go on with the work of economy practically, rather than theoretically.

The Clerk read Mr. HAWLEY's resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the expenditures of the nation can and should be so reduced and regulated that they can be met by the existing taxes; and in no event should there be an increase of either interest-bearing or non-interest-bearing obligations of the Government.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the resolution was adopted.

WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I ask consent to submit the following resolution for consideration and action at this time:

Resolved, That a committee of thirteen be appointed by the Speaker, whose duty it shall be to confer with the officers and members of the Washington National Monument Association upon the practicability of completing the Washington Monument by the approaching Centennial; and that said committee have leave to report at any time, by bill or otherwise.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I object to giving the committee leave to report at any time.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I will omit that portion of the resolution.

The resolution as modified was then adopted.

MARY E. SACIA.

Mr. BARRY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1210) to direct a patent to be issued to Mary E. Sacia for certain land in the State of Iowa belonging to her; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

COMMITTEE CLERK.

Mr. BARRY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department, and the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, and the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, and the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings and Grounds, have leave to jointly employ a clerk during the present session of Congress, at the usual rate of compensation.

DUTY ON SUGAR.

Mr. SYPHER. I ask consent to offer the following preamble and resolution, for consideration and action at this time:

Whereas by an act to reduce internal taxes and for other purposes, approved July 14, 1870, the duty on imported sugars was reduced at the rate of 33⅓ per cent.; and whereas said reduction of duty diminished the revenues of the Government $12,000,000 in gold annually without reducing the price of sugars to the consumers: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means is hereby directed to inquire into the expediency of restoring the duty on all imported sugars to the rates established by law previous to the passage of the aforesaid act.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that a separate vote be taken on the resolution. I do not want to vote for the preamble now.

Mr. SYPHER. I have the figures backing up that statement.

Mr. RANDALL. I dare say the gentleman has; but I have not.

Mr. SYPHER. I prefer it as it is, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

REDUCTION OF THE TARIFF.

Mr. COX. I have a resolution in the same connection as that of the gentleman from Louisiana. I ask that it be adopted.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means be requested to inquire whether the revenue cannot be increased by reducing the tariff, and if the same can be done, to report a bill in accordance with their conclusions.

Mr. COX. I ask that this resolution be now adopted.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

Objections were made.

Mr. COX. Then let it be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

No objection was made, and it was ordered accordingly.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1211) to restore the jurisdiction of Indian affairs to the Department of War; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

STATIONERY FOR COMMITTEES.

Mr. PACKARD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the Committee on Private Land Claims be allowed twenty-five dollars for stationery, and that the Committee on Public Expenditures be allowed ten dollars for stationery.

REDICK M'KEE.

Mr. CLAYTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1212) for the relief of Redick McKee; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The House seems to be so animated by a sentiment in favor of economy that I propose to give gentlemen an opportunity to illustrate it now by actual retrenchment. I therefore move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the naval appropriation bill, and pending that motion I move that all general debate be limited to one hour after the consideration of the bill is resumed in Committee of the Whole. I believe from the indications given to me that that will be ample time for general debate.

The question was taken upon the motion to limit debate; and it was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion to go into Committee of the Whole; and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. E. H. ROBERTS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being House bill No. 1013, making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all general debate upon this bill is limited to one hour. The gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. SWANN,] a member of the Committee on Appropriations, is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SWANN. Mr. Chairman, I design to say but a very few words on this bill. As a member of the Committee on Appropriations on this side of the House I have given to this subject all the examination that it seemed to require in order to enable me to make up my judgment in reference to its important recommendations. I will say in advance that I cordially concur in the views which have been submitted to this House by the Committee on Appropriations.

It will be found by an examination of the bill that the total reduction proposed, after a careful examination by the committee as well as an interchange with the heads of the Departments who have spoken in reference to it, amounts in the aggregate to $2,700,000. I am not prepared to say positively that that reduction can be maintained. It proposes a large decrease in the amount originally recommended and concurred in by officers who have the means of forming a correct judgment connected with this subject. But I think it is a move in the right direction. If we are compelled hereafter to bring in a deficiency bill, we stand then just as we stood before, as the deficiency, whatever it may be, will have to be provided in some shape or other.

I regret that the antagonism to this bill has come mainly from this side of the House. My honorable friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] seems to be doubtful as to his exact position. Although he did not positively object to the provisions of the bill, he seemed to feel uncomfortable under the report of the committee, exhibiting some doubt as to whether we should be able to carry out the large reduction which has been made in the estimates originally submitted. But I do not really know now exactly in what position my honorable friend from Kentucky stands in reference to the leading provisions of this bill.

My friend from New York [Mr. WOOD] has given us the benefit of his experience in reference to the recent panic which has swept over this country, in its bearing upon these estimates; and I was sorry to hear that it had fallen with so heavy a hand upon the great commercial community which he represents in part on this floor. I concur with him as to the effect of that panic, not only in New York but throughout the country; but I was sorry to hear from the gentleman one remark which I am not prepared to sanction—that this Government is in a state of bankruptcy. Although this panic has been wide-spread, affecting all the important commercial, manufacturing, and material interests of the country, I am not prepared to admit that it has so far affected the credit of this Government as to place it in a condition of bankruptcy, or anything approaching it. Far from it, Mr. Speaker. I think that the financial credit of this Government stands as high to-day as it did before that panic commenced. I think that at this particular time, when in the opinion of the gentleman from New York, our national Treasury is bankrupt, the power of the Government to raise money upon its credit is as undoubted as at any former period. I am not disposed to admit that if the Government wanted ten million, twenty million, one hundred million dollars, to-day, it would not be able to obtain it promptly either by loan or in whatever way the judgment of Congress might in its wisdom suggest.

The panic, I grant, has unsettled values and produced distrust throughout the country; it has prostrated financially many strong men; but it is a significant fact, a fact honorable to the Government and the public credit, that when we were in the midst of the panic Government securities stood as high, if not higher than the obligations of any other moneyed institutions in this country. I say, then, that it is idle for us to entertain any doubt as to the power of this Government to raise whatever amount of money may be necessary to meet its wants, its present or increased ordinary expenses, if this House should think proper to maintain, without change or abatement, the position in which we have heretofore stood in support of the great interests now dependent upon it for support. I was, therefore, a little surprised to hear my honorable friend, who comes from a community embracing a large proportion of the ablest financiers of the country, advance the opinion that we were in a condition of bankruptcy.

I wish gentlemen to understand the position in which I have always stood in reference to this naval appropriation bill, and all similar bills making appropriations for the legitimate wants of the Government in the construction of its public improvements and in the doing of whatever may be necessary to carry on this Government upon a liberal scale. I believe not only that it is within the power of this Government, but that it is wise and judicious, that we should not materially change the course we have heretofore followed in fostering all the great interests upon which we are so dependent.

Another of my honorable friends on this floor—a gentleman from my own State, [Mr. ARCHER,] whose opinions as a member of the Naval Committee are, I know, always founded upon careful examination—objects to this bill, if I understand him correctly, upon the ground that we have not gone far enough in our estimates of the probable wants of the Navy. He wants a large increase of the Navy. I feel bound just here to say that I am not prepared for any large increase of the Navy at the present time; and I will remark in general terms that I am utterly opposed to any increase of the Navy which shall operate hereafter as a tax upon the people, whom we all know are taxed heavily enough already. I would not burden the people to keep afloat a navy which could compete with those of Great Britain and other nations of the same class, which the gentleman no doubt had in his eye at the time he made his speech.

Mr. ARCHER. With the gentleman's permission I will say that he misconstrues my remarks. So far as they were applicable to this bill, I meant to say that the appropriations made in the bill cannot run the Navy as it now stands; and that a deficiency bill will inevitably be necessary to make up for what should have been appropriated in this bill.

Mr. SWANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not expressing the opinion that upon the estimates submitted in the bill we shall be able to run the Navy upon the scale which has been suggested by my honorable friend. But from a careful examination by the heads of the Departments and those who are immediately connected with the details of this bill I am not prepared to say that we may not maintain these estimates. At all events I consider it my duty as a member of the Committee on Appropriations to accept whatever reduction has been offered by the majority of that committee. I will do them the justice to say that they took up this whole subject in a spirit of economy, with a sincere and single purpose to reduce the expenditures of this Government. This is the spirit that will control their policy, not only in reference to this bill, but to all other great measures that will engage the attention of the committee.

Just here I feel it my duty to recognize the valuable services of the honorable gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] who reports this bill and takes charge of it in this House. The Committee on Appropriations are largely indebted to him for the zeal, energy, ability, and intelligent perseverance with which he labored in the preparation of the bill. He has singled out the various objects of appropriation and made such recommendations as have enabled us to act advisedly and with proper circumspection. I have found in that committee entire accord in the effort to reduce the expenditures of the Government; and I will say for myself that, although as one member of the committee, I am not prepared to promise that these estimates can be maintained or that we shall be able to make the large reductions proposed in this bill, I for one am disposed to accept the measures offered here, because I believe them to have been offered in a spirit of honesty, with a single-minded determination to reduce if possible the expenditures of this Government.

My honorable friend from Maryland [Mr. ARCHER] spoke of the exigency of the occasion. He spoke of the precarious position in which we stood in regard to foreign nations. He was afraid we were on the verge of another war. He believed we were so complicated with Spain that in all probability war was imminent and might come upon us at any moment. I considered that as an expression on his part of some knowledge, of information which has not yet come to this House. My honorable friend from Pennsylvania, chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] as stated in debate the other day, was in possession of information which it would have been convenient for the House to have had before legislating on the subject which was at that time pending. It would have been convenient for the House to have been put in possession of that information, and we might have acted more advisedly than we did when we came to vote on this subject. I now put the question to my honorable friend from Maryland, whether any information has come to him, as a member of the Naval Committee, which leads him to believe our complications with Spain are such that we may be precipitated into a war at any moment?

Mr. ARCHER. None such has come to the committee to my knowledge.

Mr. SWANN. Then I understand my friend to express the opinion these naval estimates ought to be greatly increased. He is not satisfied with what we have done here, nor is he satisfied with the existing Navy; and he thinks, owing to the condition of affairs, and the warlike spirit which has been manifested in Spain by the minions of that power, it is necessary we should make these large appropriations. The question arose in the committee, I recollect, when this bill was before the committee, as to whether we would or not put in commission the vessels now lying in Philadelphia Harbor, which involved about $1,000,000; and I said to the Secretary of the Navy at the time, if he would come before the committee and say that there was necessity for putting those vessels in commission I was prepared to vote that million dollars if necessary for the wants of the service and the exigencies of the country. But, sir, we had no direct recommendation of that sort, and it was the only thing which deterred me from voting for the additional million dollars; for I would have voted for it if it had been urged and insisted upon by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. Chairman, when war is imminent, when we are so complicated that it is necessary for the American people to fight, I am ready to vote the money of this Government freely, if it be necessary to maintain its character and dignity. I would vote millions of dollars if the same complications existed now which made it probable that we were to have a conflict with Spain. I would have said, so far as I am concerned and my individual vote is concerned, "Ask whatever is necessary to maintain the character and dignity of the Government and you shall have it."

Now, Mr. Chairman, this Cuban matter has given rise to some uneasiness. My honorable friend from New York, [Mr. COX,] in the speech he made the other day, took occasion to say that the great harbor of New York was without defense; that if a foreign power were to get into the harbor they would find it in such a condition as not to be capable of making any successful resistance. That I understand to be the opinion expressed by the honorable gentleman from New York. I can only say, from information with which I have been furnished by the heads of Bureaus in the Navy Department, by high officers of the Government, that by reason of appropriations made for interior defense, and for the defense of our great harbors, that if such an attempt were made, while it might be possible a hostile fleet might go into that harbor, it was not very certain it would ever come out again. I do not think the thing would be possible; and I thought it a subject of just remark that a gentleman occupying the high position he does as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs should have expressed an opinion which might have been an inducement perhaps to foreign powers to try whether or not they could risk the experiment. I believe New York at this day is prepared for any such emergency. A foreign enemy would find there, in torpedoes and in the preparation necessary to give protection to that harbor, although these preparations may not be as complete as they are likely to be hereafter, that it would be difficult to penetrate into that harbor and make an effective hostile demonstration against the city of New York.

Mr. Chairman, the Cuban matter appears to have produced a sort of panic. I have had something to do with it in time past, when I happened to be a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I have expressed my views at large on that subject; and while I should like to see that community free and independent under its own government, I was not prepared at that time to vote for the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX;] and I was not prepared then to recognize the belligerency of Cuba, because I believed such a measure would have resulted in war in forty-eight hours. And what would have been the effect of that war? Why, sir, our commerce would have been exposed to the mercy of Spain. I believe that such a war, no matter how controlled, would have entailed millions of expense upon this Government. It would have cost more than the honorable gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ARCHER] would require to build up his whole Navy. I am satisfied that the people of this country are not prepared for any such action on the part of this House. We have had enough of war.

It would have had, sir, another effect, which I duly weighed at the time when this resolution was presented here for the sanction of the House. It would have had the effect of building up a power there that would have been felt in this House. For if you recognize the independence of Cuba, or the belligerency of Cuba, you are erecting that government into an independent government, or are putting it under the protection of the United States; and then, sir, it would have been inevitable that Cuba should be represented upon this floor. I was not prepared to countenance the infusion of such an element into this body, because I believe it would have been adverse to the interests of the country and adverse to the principles upon which this Government has been established and worked heretofore.

I am not here, Mr. Chairman, to say that I have approved of all that has been done by the State Department in reference to Spain. I might have thought that that Department might have acted more rigorously with that power. I might have been more exacting. But I do say, and not because I am a member of this House, but because I am one who looks closely into the material interests of the country where no question of power is involved as well as its honor, that although outrages were perpetrated by Spaniards in Cuba, although our citizens were massacred in cold blood, while I might have demanded reparation for every man that was struck down in that unfortunate massacre, I should have endeavored to manage it with the same caution and the same deliberation that characterized the acts of the Secretary of State in relation to this important question. I believe, sir, that he has conducted this whole affair in the spirit of a Christian statesman. And I say that boldly, not that I wish to shield him from censure, but because I believe he has been trying to do his duty; and by the result, so far as it is known to this House, I believe he has already saved this country, by his judicious management in reference to these complications, millions upon millions of money that would have been required to conduct a war of this sort, if it had been allowed to break out. I say this, sir, in justice to the Department of State, without reference to party, without reference to any feeling that I might have had when these difficulties were engaging the attention of the country. I might have hanged the captain of the Virginius, and I dare say I would have hanged him as high as Haman. I would have done what was necessary to maintain the honor of the country as I understood it. But I admit, sir, that a little deliberation and reflection and a little caution are necessary in all such complications, where there is reasonable doubt; and I think that the Secretary in the settlement of this question, so far as it has been settled, up to this time has acted judiciously and wisely according to his unbiased judgment and as became a man occupying the high and responsible position which he did at the time.

Now, sir, I am opposed to this whole system. I know that my honorable friend from Maryland [Mr. ARCHER] entertains different views. But I am opposed to these large floating palaces, for no other conceivable purpose, so far as I understand, than to eat out the substance of the people, costing the Government an enormous amount of money. The details of the cost I must refer to my honorable friend, because I do not know what appropriation will be necessary to keep one of these first-class steamers afloat; but I suppose eight hundred or one thousand men would not be a complement for one of these vessels, to put it in condition in a time of peace; for I must say to my friend that we are enjoying the blessings of peace at this moment. Though Spaniards are fond of bluster, are fond of getting up all sorts of complications, yet the settlement of this question is a settlement, so far as I can understand, and I do think they would be the last power to try to disturb the existing relations with this country. And why, sir? In the first place it would wipe out Cuba. People may talk as they please; but our Navy as it stands now could take Cuba almost without a serious effort, if we threw our whole strength into an attempt of that sort. It is a very easy matter to take Cuba. But we have to look to what would be the future consequences of such a measure, and the depredations that might go on in every water on our commerce by privateers infesting the seas. And I say, in a time of peace, when this Government is pronounced bankrupt by my friend from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] although I am sure he does not mean it——

Mr. WOOD. My friend from Maryland [Mr. SWANN] has criticised in his usual good-natured manner the remark I made in the discussion of this bill to the effect that the country was bankrupt. He is kind enough to give me the opportunity to say now just what I meant by that remark. That gentleman represents, like myself, a commercial constituency. He, as well as myself, knows what is meant by bankruptcy. I esteem either a government or an individual bankrupt if they cannot pay their liabilities, or if they cannot pay their liabilities from funds legitimately, properly, and appropriately within their possession. Now, I repeat, and I think that in a few moments I can show, that this Government has been bankrupt for these last two months. It has been unable to meet its obligations. It could not pay its debts from the funds appropriated and provided for that purpose; but it has laid violent and illegal hands upon a sacred fund, a special deposit kept in reserve beyond the reach of any executive action. It has taken a portion of that reserve, which on no ground it could properly appropriate to its own uses, and has with that fund paid its obligations. I therefore had a right to conclude that as it could not pay its debts it was bankrupt. If I, as a merchant, cannot pay my obligations, I am forced under the law into the bankruptcy court; my affairs are summarily wound up, and I am declared to be a bankrupt.

Now, I say, this Government could not pay its debts. I say that it cannot pay its debts to-day, and that it is drawing continually on a reserve of $44,000,000, that the law explicitly declares shall not be touched forever. That is the language of the law. Hence it is that I repeat what I said the other day, that the Government is bankrupt.

Mr. SWANN. I resume the floor. I am not here, sir, to take issue upon this collateral question. I listened to the gentleman with very great pleasure, but I could not agree with him when he declared the Government of this country was bankrupt. If the gentleman will take into due consideration the great resources of this country—I had almost said the illimitable resources of the country—he will say that it is in the power of the Government at any time to raise a fund of one hundred millions if necessary, or forty millions, or thirty millions, in any emergency which might arise.

Mr. WOOD. Let me say to the gentleman that many of the commercial and other houses that have failed in the city of New York had resources, that were not available, to the extent of twice the obligations upon which they failed; and therefore the fact that Congress could vote money does not save the Government from the disgrace involved in laying its hands upon a fund to which it was not entitled.

Mr. SWANN. Sir, I do not propose to discuss that point with the gentleman. What I mean to say is, that this Government is not only able to meet all the obligations which are forced upon it now, but I mean to say that it could go into the market to-morrow and raise whatever amount of money it needed in the course of a very short time—every dollar necessary to extricate it from the emergency in which it was placed. That is all I wish to say upon that point.

Well now, Mr. Chairman, I am aware that this panic has disturbed values, not only in the city of New York, but in my own city and throughout the country. It has deranged all the operations of trade, and the inconvenience resulting from this we may not recover from for a long time to come. But I cannot admit that it has affected the Government in the same proportion that it has individual citizens. Sir, the Government of this great nation can raise money by millions and hundreds of millions of dollars. But when Jay Cooke & Co. and these other men went down they had been overtrading, and perhaps that was the reason why many persons in the gentleman's district and in his city failed. What I mean to say is, that the power exists here to raise whatever money may be needed for this Government to carry it on successfully. We have the power, and we have only to exercise it through this Congress, to raise all the money necessary for the wants of the Government, and it could be accomplished in a time that would surprise even the gentleman himself, whatever views he may entertain on that subject.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Appropriations have suggested to the House the adoption of the recommendations contained in this bill. The estimates on which it is founded have been made up upon a careful examination of all these different Departments. There has been entire co-operation everywhere. The reductions have been made with the consent of those who recommended higher appropriations in the first instance; and they are now disposed to co-operate with the committee in this great work of retrenchment in which we are all earnestly engaged. And, sir, although I might admit here that the committee may not be able to maintain the appropriations at the rate at which they are suggested in this bill, still I will vote for this measure, even if I thought it would be necessary to bring in a deficiency bill to cover any deficiencies that may exist hereafter from the inability of the Government to supply the needs of this Department. Sir, it is our duty in the present condition of things, with the nation convulsed by these extraordinary panics—extraordinary, because they have existed to an extent to which they have never existed heretofore—it is our duty to make any reduction we can, looking to economy in the affairs of this Government. We are bound to do this work, and I say that the committee have done it without fear and without the expectation of any antagonism on the part of this House. As I said before, I regret extremely that the main antagonism to this bill has come from the democratic side of the House. The democratic members of the Committee on Appropriations have been working with the same diligence and industry that could be expected from anybody for a reduction in these large expenses, and we have concurred in the report of that reduction to the House.

Mr. Chairman, I will say, once for all, and I think that has been my course ever since I have been a member of the committee, that I will vote whatever is necessary to conduct this Government on a liberal scale. I cannot consent by my vote that it shall be conducted on a niggardly scale. We ought to make proper provision for all the Departments of the Government, and we should not ignore those great and useful improvements that are going on now in every State in this Union upon any such ground as that which has been indicated—that our Government was bankrupt.

We are not in a bankrupt condition; we are in a safe condition, a condition of which no other nation can boast to-day. As for a matter of one hundred millions or two hundred millions to sustain the credit of this great nation and keep in operation all the great works of improvement, I would say for one, as a member of that committee, that I feel myself bound to vote liberally whatever is necessary to conduct this Government upon a plan commensurate with its greatness and importance, and to do whatever else is necessary to maintain the credit of the nation.

I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. BECK. I yield for a few minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE.]

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Chairman, I had no purpose to engage in the present discussion until the colloquy which occurred on this floor on Thursday last between the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, [Mr. SCOFIELD;] in reference to the matter of which I believe it to be due myself, as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to say that I was not in possession of any information, other than that furnished by the letter of the Secretary of the Navy and the general knowledge had by the country. Believing that out of the complication then existing with Spain a war with that power was imminent, I thought it was my duty not to withhold sanction to any reasonable request made by the Government toward preparation for the defense of the lives, property, and honor of the people of the United States, and hence I assented to the proposition made to increase the naval force. And such were the motives of this side of the House. By its faith and traditional policy the democratic party is committed to a most jealous regard for the rights of the citizen of the United States, wherever he may be. And hence, when it was believed that it was the purpose, as it was the duty, of this Administration, in the measure alluded to, to maintain at all hazards the right of an American vessel to sail unquestioned wherever her commander might choose to hoist his flag, and the right of the American citizen, under the protection of his flag, to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, the representatives of the democratic party on this floor did not hesitate to give their sanction and approval to the measure.

May I pause here, sir, to ask those who have the ear of the Administration, has that emergency and duty passed? From my own observation I would answer no. But it would seem, in the professions now being made by the party in power, that they answer affirmatively.

The present bill is said to be in the interest of economy. And the fact that it is less in amount than the appropriations of last year, and the fact that in the civil list, so called, there are reductions made, is paraded as conclusive evidence of retrenchment and reform. Is it true?

When you come to regard the fact that at the time the four million appropriation was made by this House it was known by those who demanded it that war was not imminent with Spain; that the necessities of the country did not require so large an amount; and that what was really required was simply used or to be used, so to speak, anticipatory of what would have been (as was usual) the customary appropriations, the common sense of the country will arrive at the conclusions presented by the honorable member from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] that the pretense of large reduction and economy made in this bill is not true.

It may be admitted that the proposed reduction in the civil list is submitted; but in considering this, it is well to inquire if the reductions here made go to the extent of the increase made in these offices and salaries since the year 1865.

I invite the attention of the gentleman from Maine—who has called our attention to the comparison of the expenditures of the Navy Department for 1859 and this bill—to a comparison of those for the year 1868, which were $16,288,244.01, to those of the present bill, which are $16,500,000, and to which justly should be added the sum of $4,000,000 appropriated this session. In this comparison there is no partisanship. But in making it he will find that since the year 1867 there has been an increase of officers and an increase of salaries not warranted by the exigencies of the service; and that, looking to the present condition of the country and its just demands for retrenchment and reform, these should be repealed. When this is attempted to be done we will be sincerely on the road of reform. And deferentially I suggest that, if the party in power mean to retrace their steps, intend to call back extravagant expenditures, correct gross abuses, lop off all "useless and dead limbs," and clean the "Augean stables," in this branch of the public service there is room for work, in this, that there are useless navy-yards which should be abolished; that there are too many and unnecessary officers and employés in the civil list of these yards, and that they are too highly paid. Again, the policy of increase of rank and pay—especially of increase of rank and pay on the retired list—is one that should be repealed and abandoned. When these measures of reform are adopted, then indeed will the people be convinced of the sincerity of the professions now being made by those in power and in influence on this floor.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, when the Committee on Naval Affairs called upon the House in December, asking for authority to be given to the President and his Secretary to enlist fifteen hundred additional sailors in consequence of the threatening aspect of our relations with Spain, growing out of the Virginius affair, I, in common with all the gentlemen on this side of the House, avowed my willingness to furnish them all the men and all the money necessary to maintain the dignity of this country and the honor of the flag; all we asked was that the Navy should not be increased permanently beyond the eighty-five hundred men to which it is now limited by law. Therefore we voted for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] which reads thus:

Provided, That the temporary increase of the force of enlisted men in the Navy herein authorized shall not continue beyond the 1st of January, 1875.

This amendment was adopted by a vote of 134 to 26, and, as amended, the bill passed without a division.

A few days afterward this bill was followed by one from the Committee on Appropriations, calling for $4,000,000 to meet the expenses incurred in putting the Navy in order, and to pay the additional men we were willing the Secretary should employ. When that bill was laid before us the chairman of the committee caused to be read from the Clerk's desk the following letters from the Secretary on the subject of enlisting sailors, from which it appeared that up to that date at least no additional man had been enlisted; indeed, none could be legally, and cannot be now, as the Senate has not yet passed the bill authorizing it to be done; and I hope it will not, as it is now admitted that the exigency which was presented to the House has passed away, if, indeed, it ever existed. The letters read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, December 8, 1873.

SIR: Under the circumstances of the present emergency, I am compelled to ask that a special appropriation be made to cover the expenses of putting the iron-clad and cruising Navy of the United States in condition for immediate and active service.

I have taken measures to put every available iron and wooden ship of our Navy in condition for immediate duty.

I have ordered all the ships of the various squadrons within reach to rendezvous at Key West. I am enlisting men to supply and fill up the crews of all our vessels. I have accumulated materials, provisions, and supplies for their maintenance and support; and ordnance, ammunition, and all the weapons of naval warfare for their use.

The circumstances which have constrained the Department to this unusual activity and consequent expenditure are known to you and to the country. The fact that they occurred during the recess of Congress made it necessary that I should myself assume the responsibility of prompt action, relying upon the wisdom and justice of the people and their representatives for support.

I have not as yet exceeded the appropriation for the current year, but these measures, with the cost of preparing, transporting, and concentrating everything necessary to carry them out, have already almost exhausted the money of the working Bureaus of the Department, and these must be supplied at once if the work is to go on.

The cost of putting our iron-clads in condition for service (a work already undertaken and in some instances far advanced) will also require a large immediate appropriation. The amount required to reimburse the Bureaus, so as to carry them through the year, and also to put all our available monitors in order, will not be less than $4,000,000.

If our force is to be increased, or if the powerful double-turreted monitors Miantonomah, Monadnock, and Puritan are to be put in a condition of usefulness, at least $1,000,000 more will be required.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEORGE M. ROBESON,
Secretary of the Navy.

The SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

I also call attention to the supplemental letter of the Secretary of the Navy. That letter is as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, December 8, 1873.

SIR: I find, on review of my letter to the Speaker, that I omitted to ask that Congress give me the necessary authority to enlist men beyond the limit fixed by law. I shall be obliged, in order to man the ships now fitting out, to exceed the limit by about fifteen hundred or two thousand men, and this excess should be authorized. The number of men can be reduced at any time by discharges when they are not needed.

Also, in view of the difficulty of deciding at once between the many things pressing to be done, and of the impossibility of enumerating in advance or even foreseeing from day to day what calls the Department may have upon it, I think the fifth million asked for in the last clause of my letter ought to be appropriated, and the Department or the President given discretion in its use, to meet any emergency.

Yours, very respectfully,

GEORGE M. ROBESON,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. JAMES A. GARFIELD,
Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

[Indorsement.]

DEAR SIR: I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to refer the paragraph of the within letter, relating to authorizing additional enlistments into the Navy, to your committee; and to say that the Committee on Appropriations do not feel authorized to consider it. If your committee desire to offer any amendments to the appropriation bill which we expect to introduce to-day, this committee will be glad to have you do so.

Respectfully,

J. A. GARFIELD,
Chairman.

Hon. G. W. SCOFIELD,
Chairman Committee Naval Affairs.

There can be no pretense that the Secretary by either of these letters advised the House that he was enlisting men in excess of his authority or in violation of law. In that to the Speaker he showed that he was enlisting men to fill up the crews of our vessels, of course within the eighty-five hundred limit; and his letter to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. GARFIELD] makes that construction clear, because in it he says he omitted to ask for authority to go beyond that limit, adding, "I shall be"—not "I have been"—"obliged in order to man ships now fitting out"—December 8, 1873—"to exceed the limit"—when of course the ships are ready for sea. That is the plain meaning of these letters.

When that bill was before the House I said:

The only reason I desire to make a remark is this: while I have made objection to the expenditures of the Navy Department in times gone by, and may do so again, still when a bill is presented stating that it is to meet extraordinary expenses of the naval service, and when it would not, perhaps, be proper even for Congress to inquire what those extraordinary expenses were, nor would it be proper, perhaps, for the Department to inform us of the exact condition of our relations with Spain at this time, so that we could properly go into a detail of all matters involved in this bill, I merely desire to say that I shall vote for all the appropriations asked for under these circumstances, reserving the right, however, when the general bill comes in, to call the Secretary of the Navy and the executive officers of this Government to account for anything that may have been expended wrongfully. But, in the mean time, I feel that my mouth is closed, because I do not know what the full necessity has been for this expenditure; I have not the means of ascertaining. It would, perhaps, be improper for the Executive Department to tell now what those extraordinary expenses are. Therefore I am willing to trust them with this money, large as the amount seems to be.

That feeling seemed to pervade the House, and the appropriations were granted precisely as asked for, the House adding, on my motion, to the provision that the appropriations made may be, in case of emergency, transferred from one Bureau to another by special order of the President, these words: "which orders, with the reasons therefor, shall be communicated to Congress whenever the good of the public service will permit," so as to keep the representatives of the people fully advised of any change made in the disposition of money voted for special objects by those to whom it is intrusted. When these bills were passed we had not been furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury with the estimates of expenditures for the next fiscal year, nor had any account been laid before us of the expenditures of any of the Departments for any portion of the current fiscal year. Since that time we have been furnished with the Book of Estimates, and on page 257 of it, under head of "Statement of appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874," title "Navy Department," I find the following:

Appropriations for pay of the Navy for 1874	$6, 250, 000 00
Expended during the first quarter of the fiscal year	5, 035, 818 90
Available for the remaining three quarters	1, 214, 181.10

That statement was so remarkable that I could scarcely realize its truth. The $6,250,000 was amply sufficient to pay all the eighty-five hundred men and the officers legally in the naval service for the whole fiscal year ending June 30, 1874. Neither the Secretary nor any of his subordinates had any right to use a dollar of it for any other purposes than the pay of the officers and sailors in the service under existing laws after it had been specifically appropriated by Congress for that purpose. The Secretary of the Navy had given the House to understand, in his letter of December 8, 1873, that up to that date at least he had not enlisted any additional men, and asked authority to do so to man ships then being repaired. I knew that the Secretary of the Treasury would not lay before Congress a false report, and I did not see how to reach the facts otherwise than by presenting the resolution of inquiry which the House passed on last Friday, which reads thus:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to inform the House how many, if any, of the fifteen hundred men sought to be added temporarily to the Navy by the bill now pending in the Senate of the United States, which passed the House of Representatives December 9, 1873, have been enlisted, giving the date of said enlistments, and the amount expended in consequence thereof; and that he further inform the House how much of the appropriation made for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, was expended prior to January 1, 1874; and that he further inform the House how much of the $4,000,000 appropriated by the present Congress has been expended, and for what purposes.

I had been startled the day before by the extraordinary statement, made by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. GARFIELD,] that the Secretary had enlisted men in violation of law, that his letter, which I have read, admitted it, and that he had asked Congress to ratify his acts and condone his offenses; no part of which statement is sustained by the facts. Let me read his statement, so as to do him no injustice:

Mr. GARFIELD. I think gentlemen are laboring under a misapprehension as to a matter of fact. The Secretary of the Navy sent in a letter to the House of Representatives, setting forth that when the emergency arose he took the authority, assumed it in order to meet the emergency, of increasing the number of enlisted men in the Navy up to ten thousand; that in doing so he exceeded the law; and he laid the facts before Congress, and asked Congress to pass a condoning law and an additional sum of money to pay for the enlistment of the additional men. He asked the Committee on Appropriations to legalize his action; but the committee told him that they could give him an appropriation but could not in an appropriation bill legalize what he had done contrary to law; and that he had better call upon the Naval Committee to bring in a condoning act authorizing this temporary increase of the Navy. We referred that very letter to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and they brought in a bill, not to provide for a permanent increase of the Navy, but to condone what had been done by the Secretary in the emergency.

I venture to assert, and I challenge contradiction here and now, that there is no intimation in the letter of the Secretary which I have read—and it is the only one ever laid before the House—that he had in violation of law enlisted fifteen hundred men, and asked Congress to condone his offense; and I assert further that the record will show that neither the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. GARFIELD,] nor the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] nor any member of either committee, nor any one else, informed the House that the law had been violated, the force of the Navy illegally increased, or the money appropriated by Congress for the pay of the regular officers and men for the year ending June 30, 1874, diverted from its legitimate purpose and applied to other and illegal purposes. The record shows that the first intimation we ever had of that fact was on Thursday last, nearly four weeks after we had passed both bills.

The gentleman in charge of the naval bill, [Mr. HALE,] in his speech of an hour on Thursday, not only did not allude to it or intimate that any of the fund of $6,250,000 for pay of the Navy had been used for other purposes, or had been all exhausted except $1,214,181, in the first three months of the year, but he assured us there would be no deficiency in the naval appropriations for the current fiscal year; and he furnished a tabular statement of the appropriations for 1874 and those proposed in his bill for 1875; in each of which the pay is put down at $6,250,000. At the close of the tabular statement he says: "The Pay Department is a matter fixed by law; that of course has not been interfered with." Why did he not advise us, as he must have known from the Book of Estimates, with which he was more familiar than any of us, that $5,035,818.90 of the pay for the current year had been spent in the first three months of it, if he knew, as his chairman says he did, that fifteen hundred men had been enlisted in violation of law, and the money appropriated for the regular service expended on them? Why did he not so inform the House? And why did he take so much pains to show that nearly $3,000,000 out of the $4,000,000 of the extraordinary appropriation made for the Navy in December had been expended on three large ships not fit for service in time of peace?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Does the gentleman not know that in the previous year, with the same naval force, the appropriation was the same for the entire year? And does he not know that at the end of the year there was not a dollar of deficiency?

Mr. BECK. I know that five out of six millions were spent in the first three months according to the statement of the Secretary, and that one million cannot pay the officers and men of the Navy for the rest of the year. I know, too, that the gentleman announced that there would be no deficiency. He gave us a tabular statement, in which he put down the pay of the Navy at $6,250,000 for this year, and $6,250,000 for the next year. And he then added that the pay of the Department fixed by law has of course not been interfered with.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Does the gentleman really believe that in the first quarter of the fiscal year now running the Navy Department paid out over $5,000,000 of the appropriation for the whole year? And if he does believe that, does he believe that it was paid out because it became due, and that the Department intends to bring in a deficiency corresponding to that large amount? Has the gentleman any real fear of that?

Mr. BECK. I state the facts; I have no fears. My statement is this: that $6,250,000 was the whole amount appropriated to pay all the officers and men of the Navy; it was all the Department asked. The Secretary of the Treasury shows that over $5,000,000 of that $6,000,000 were gone in the first three months. I know that the statement is not false when made by the Secretary. But I knew that this remarkable statement was kept concealed from the House when this bill was reported to us. Therefore it was I offered the resolution I have read.

The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs also took part in the debate on Thursday, and he not only admits in his statement then made that he did not tell the House what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] says was told, but that he withheld information he had, because he believed the House would not pass the bill if he had told what he knew. He says he wanted a permanent increase of fifteen hundred men, and took advantage of the "Cuba-Spanish craze" as he called it, but he never intimated that any of the fifteen hundred were already in the service when he presented his bill. I was so much astonished at his statement that I asked him two questions, which, with their answers, were as follows:

Mr. BECK. Now, let me ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] this question: Does he believe that this House, but for the impression that was upon the minds of its members that war was imminent, or that there was danger of it, would have increased the Navy from eighty-five hundred to ten thousand men? No matter what his individual opinion was, if he had told us that he knew then that there was no danger, does he believe the House would have done it?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I believe the House would never have passed that bill if they had not had this Cuba-Spanish craze. The whole country had it, too, at that time. But I was frank enough to state to the House that that did not affect me, and I believe it did not affect the committee. They reported the bill because they believed we needed that force all the time, even if we had had no difficulties with Spain. And if the House was fairly treated by the committee which reported the bill, they have no right to complain if they did what they may think now they should not have done.

Mr. BECK. Does the gentleman not think that it was his duty to have told the House what he now tells us he knew all that time?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I could not tell the House, because that would be telling the country what I knew at that time; but I do state that I had the best evidence to believe the Virginius would be in our ports in a very few days. And the committee did not ask the House to pass the bill on account of any threatening difficulties with Spain.

Now let the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, [Mr. SCOFIELD] answer each other. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations said "We referred the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, who asked us to condone what he had done; we referred that to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and they brought in a bill, not to provide for a permanent increase of the Navy, but to condone what had been done by the Secretary." The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs says that is not true, that they brought in the bill for a permanent increase, and that the committee did not ask the House to pass the bill on account of any threatening difficulties with Spain.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The bill itself shows that it was a permanent addition to the number of enlisted men.

Mr. BECK. Then the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations told the House relative to your committee what he ought not to have done.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The bill itself shows that it was a permanent addition, and the limitation was put on by an amendment in the House.

Mr. BECK. The gentleman from Ohio said that they referred that letter, not to provide for a permanent increase, but to condone what had been done by the Secretary of the Navy. Now, I ask if any member of either of those committees rose here in his place and told the House that the Secretary had enlisted those men before the bills were presented, or that he had spent, in the first three months, five millions out of the six that had been appropriated for the entire year, or told any of the facts that have now leaked out? I say not.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word?

Mr. BECK. O yes; but I may want a little extension of my time

Mr. SCOFIELD. The bill as reported provided for a permanent increase. That was my view; and it was the action of the Committee on Naval Affairs. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] holding the opinion that the increase ought to be limited as to time, and should relate only to the occasion, moved an amendment, that all these additional men should be discharged at the beginning of the year 1875. That sentiment prevailed with the House, but it was adopted as an amendment. Both ideas were presented to the House, one proposition (that reported by the committee) providing for a permanent addition, the other proposing a temporary increase in accordance with the idea of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BECK. What does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] do with the statement made by the gentleman from Ohio that the Secretary of the Navy for himself did not ask this increase, but that he came and asked pardon for what he had done wrong?

Mr. GARFIELD. It was not regarded as "wrong." It was a violation of law; but not wrong.

Mr. BECK. What is implied by the word "condone?" Does not that imply an offense? I again read the language:

He asked the Committee on Appropriations to legalize his action; but the committee told him that they could give him an appropriation but could not in an appropriation bill legalize what he had done contrary to law; and that he had better call upon the Naval Committee to bring in a condoning act authorizing this temporary increase of the Navy. We referred that very letter to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and they brought in a bill, not to provide for a permanent increase of the Navy, but to condone what had been done by the Secretary in the emergency.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Several MEMBERS. Let him go on.

Mr. BECK. I would like to have ten minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr BECK] has expired; and the hour to which general debate was limited has expired.

Mr. GARFIELD. The committee cannot extend the time without unanimous consent; but I hope it will be granted.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I think there will be unanimous consent to a proposition which I am about to submit. At the end of the hour already allowed for general debate I had proposed that we should proceed to consider the bill in detail, for the purpose of amendment; but as some gentlemen who desire to speak, not at great length, have not yet been heard, I hope there will be no objection made now to allowing the general debate to run on for half an hour longer. The gentleman from Kentucky has indicated that he can finish in ten minutes. Let him do so; and let the remainder of the time be divided among other gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done only by unanimous consent.

Objection was made.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move, then, that the committee rise. I will make the motion in the House.

The motion of Mr. HALE, of Maine, was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. E. H. ROBERTS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the naval appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move that general debate in Committee of the Whole on the naval appropriation bill be extended for half an hour longer.

Mr. GARFIELD. Say forty minutes.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I modify my motion as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] I also add a further provision that speeches under this extension be limited to ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. That matter can be regulated by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Then I do not press that part of the motion.

The motion of Mr. HALE, of Maine, as modified, was agreed to.

The House, on motion of Mr. HALE, of Maine, again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resumed the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move that the forty minutes allowed by the House for a continuation of the general debate be divided into speeches of ten minutes each.

There being no objection, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BECK resumed the floor.

Mr. MYERS. If the gentleman from Kentucky will yield a moment, I desire to make a single statement. I was not a member of the Naval Committee at the time the bill which has been alluded to was reported. The chairman of that committee, however, very properly stated that, as reported, it provided for a permanent increase. The Committee on Appropriations desired that the increase should be temporary; and an amendment to that effect, which I opposed, was adopted by the House. The gentleman has spoken of an "offense," and of "condoning" it. I desire to know from him whether, in view of the emergency existing at that time, a war with Spain being apparently imminent, he considers that the Secretary of the Navy did wrong in enlisting more men; whether it was a very grave offense if he did transcend the law, (Congress not being then in session,) and wait until it assembled in order to have his action approved.

Mr. BECK. I regard it as a far higher offense on the part of committees of this House not to call attention to facts within their knowledge than for the Secretary of the Navy to overstep the law on account of emergencies. But I deny the right of any Secretary, or the President, or anybody else, to make or to violate laws. This Congress alone determines what the laws shall be, and it is the duty of our executive officers to execute them. I make the same comment upon the action of the Secretary of the Navy in using for another purpose the money appropriated for the pay of the Navy and for enlisting men without authority that I did upon the action of the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to the $44,000,000 that he used illegally. I am not making personal attacks; I am dealing with official conduct. No Secretary, no President, has any right to take such action. No monarch in Europe has such authority. No legislative body that has any respect for itself will allow such proceedings on the part of executive officers. This is the old conflict between legislative and executive authority. Whenever executive officers can grasp power they will do so, and use it for their own purposes, without asking the consent of the law-making power. That is despotism when successful. It is against such proceedings that I protest, and demand that respect for law shall be demanded from all officials.

Mr. MYERS. If the gentleman's doctrine were carried out, might it not, in a time of great emergency, destroy the life of the nation?

Mr. BECK. Congress can be called together at any moment by the President of the United States; and, as in this case, democrats as well as republicans will vote him all the men and all the money he may want to protect the national honor. But we deny the right of any Secretary, or of the President himself, to put his hands into the Treasury of the United States and take out what he pleases without authority of law, or to increase the Army or Navy at his pleasure; and we demand of all our committees, whenever they may have any private information from a Secretary, or any other official, and seek to induce the Representatives of the people to vote money, which must be raised by taxation, upon it, that they should state what they know, whether it militates against their own views or sustains them. We have a right to know what they have learned; and when they fail to give it to us, it is the duty of every one of us to get the information as best we may, as I have tried to do through the resolution the House passed on Friday.

I do not follow men blindly any longer when I find they hold back information because they do not like it. That is not their right. It is their business to tell us. They are committees working for us to enable us to act on all the information they can obtain for us. That is all I have time to say.

Now, leaving this subject, I desire in the few moments I have left to refer to my statement on Thursday last, that in appropriations made before presidential elections there is great apparent economy practiced, the deficiency always being made up afterward. I want to put myself right upon that point, as I overstated it the other day when I said the deficiency asked for was about $28,000,000. The report of Secretary McCulloch in December, 1868, states the deficiencies as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 7, 1868.

SIR: Agreeably to the joint resolution of Congress of the 7th of January, 1846, I have the honor to transmit, for the information of the House of Representatives, printed estimates of additional appropriations required for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and previous years, namely:

Civil and miscellaneous	$7,276,682 23
Indian	93,469 48
War	13,975,000 00
	21,345,151 71

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

HUGH McCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

I admit I stated, on information, the deficiencies then to be more than they really were. I will verify my declaration still further by saying that the next year, 1869, when no elections were pending, the deficiencies were only $3,200,000. That is the fact, as the Book of Estimates shows. Again, it appears that at the last session of the last Congress, after the last presidential election was over, and when members were not soon to be called to answer to the people, then, for the first time since I have been in Congress, for the first time in the history of the country as I believe, Congress appropriated $15,329,000 more than all the estimates of all the Departments. Three hundred and eight million dollars was the amount the Departments asked; Congress gave them $319,600,000, and $4,000,000 more the other day, making $323,000,000, an excess of $15,000,000, the highest amount ever given in time of peace, and that, too, immediately after the last presidential election was over.

And let this be observed: we are spending these immense sums now, when only last year $302,000,000 was called for by the estimates and $299,000,000 was the amount of the appropriations; and this is being done, too, at a time when we have paid off enough bonds of the country to reduce the interest $21,000,000, and when we have converted $200,000,000 of 6 per cents into 5 per cents, saving $2,000,000 in that form, having nearly $23,000,000 less interest to provide for than we had four years ago. Yet, I repeat, in the face of all that, the appropriations are going up twenty-odd millions beyond what they ever were before, and for this year are $15,000,000 beyond the estimates of all the Departments. The Departments have taken advantage of that; and now they are asking for $319,000,000 for the next fiscal year, because Congress gave them $319,000,000 for this year. They will add the other $4,000,000 whenever they have time to consider. So much on that subject, as my time is nearly out.

Now, one word on another point. I refused to vote for the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] to-day. Why? Because I deny that there is any necessity now either to lay additional taxation or to increase the debt. Therefore, I would not vote for that resolution, and pronounced it a humbug. I say we can, by economy in expenditure, without embarrassing any Department, furnish the Government with all the means it needs from our present revenues. I have the figures of the Department, showing that at the close of the last fiscal year the excess of revenues over expenditures—as given in the report of the Secretary now lying before me—was forty-odd million dollars—in round numbers $43,000,000. There was, he says, in money in the Treasury, $131,000,000 on the 1st day of last July. We have collected, as I learned at the Department on Saturday, from customs, internal revenue, and other sources from the 1st of July to 1st of January, $142,000,000. Of the $131,000,000 in the Treasury, I was told the Government could use about $60,000,000. I put it at $58,000,000. The Secretary claims the right to use all of the $44,000,000. It makes a total in his hands now, without additional interest-bearing debt and without additional taxation, of $244,000,000 if the legal-tenders are restored to $400,000,000. All the appropriations for this year, extravagant as they were, amounted to $323,000,000; one half of that would make $166,500,000; while in fact $152,000,000 have been expended. So, on the 1st day of January last, the cash balance in the Treasury was only cut down $10,000,000, as the Treasury books will show.

How, then, Mr. Chairman, can it be said that we must issue more bonds? How can it be urged that we must resort to additional taxation, that we must borrow money, when it appears, notwithstanding the crisis we have passed through, that we have received $142,000,000 into the Treasury, and have only been compelled to pay $152,000,000 out, with a cash balance in the Treasury of $131,000,000 at the beginning of the year, with $44,000,000 now being used as they are by the Secretary? Beyond all question reasonable economy will enable us to run this Government without additional debt and without additional taxation. We can reduce our expenditures to $275,000,000, and amply provide for every just demand of the Government, as I will show when time will allow.

Mr. GARFIELD. I welcome all close, thorough, and searching criticism of the acts of the Committee on Appropriations, and of their recommendations to the House. I desire now to call attention to some of the criticisms made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.] In the first place, the gentleman charges that the Committee on Appropriations, and, in company with it, the Committee on Naval Affairs, have withheld or misrepresented facts in their possession concerning the extraordinary appropriation of $4,000,000 to meet emergencies in the naval service. I deny this allegation in toto, and call the gentleman's attention to the plain facts. On the 8th of December a letter, addressed to the Speaker, was printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, setting forth what the Secretary of the Navy had done in consequence of the threatened Spanish war. And, among other things, the Secretary said:

> I have taken measures to put every available iron and wooden ship of our Navy in condition for immediate duty. I have ordered all the ships of the various squadrons within reach to rendezvous at Key West.

Also, in this letter, he said:

> I am enlisting men to supply and fill up the crews of all our vessels.

What does that mean? Manifestly that our Navy, which was already enlisted to its full complement, was afloat on the sea, and that the Secretary was putting more ships in commission, and was enlisting men to fill up the crews of those new vessels thus put in commission; a plain, palpable statement that he was then filling up the naval force beyond the limit fixed in the law. Nobody was taken by surprise. Everybody understood it. Everybody approved it, except those who claimed that the Administration had not gone far enough.

The Committee on Appropriations considered that letter and called the Secretary to explain more fully the situation, to show for what purpose the four millions would be needed. The Secretary gave us the statement of the repairs he had ordered, of the supplies he had purchased, and of the sum he would need to reimburse the several Bureaus for the expenditures required by the trouble with Spain. Among other sums, he asked for $300,000 for the pay of enlisted men. In the bill reported by the committee and passed by the House on the 13th of December, the first item was "for pay of Navy, $300,000." Was that a surprise to the gentleman? There was no need of $300,000 except for the purpose of paying more men than were already provided for by law. In our naval appropriation act of last year we had appropriated for the pay of eighty-five hundred men. Gentlemen will see this in the language of the Book of Estimates, page 77, where enough was asked and granted to pay the full quota of men. Why, then, did we appropriate $300,000 more if it was not for these very extra men that the Secretary said in his letter he was then enlisting in the Navy? There was no concealment in this. It was a plain matter of public business, properly done by the Secretary, by the Committee on Appropriations, and by the House.

While the subject was being considered by the committee I myself called the attention of the Secretary of the Navy to the fact that he needed the authority of law for continuing this work of enlistment; and by the direction of the committee I sent his letter to the Committee on Naval Affairs, making this indorsement, which I find printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 13:

> DEAR SIR: I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to refer the paragraph of the within letter, relating to authorizing additional enlistments into the Navy, to your committee; and to say that the Committee on Appropriations do not feel authorized to consider it. If your committee desire to offer any amendments to the appropriation bill which we expect to introduce to-day this committee will be glad to have you do so.
>
> J. A. GARFIELD,
> Chairman.
>
> Hon. G. W. SCOFIELD,
> Chairman Committee Naval Affairs.

In brief, the Secretary on that day, at the suggestion of the Committee on Appropriations, asked special authority to increase his enlistments to ten thousand men. We gave him $300,000 to do it with. The Committee on Naval Affairs brought in the bill to authorize the increase of fifteen hundred men. His letter was written on the 8th of December. On the 13th of December the House voted to give him $300,000 to meet the extraordinary demand in the Bureau of Enlistment and Recruiting, and on the same day the House passed the bill from the Naval Committee, authorizing the increase for one year.

Now, what has happened? A month passed, and the Secretary of the Navy, before the Committee on Appropriations on the 6th of January—for I have the memorandum here in my copy of the estimates—informed the committee that he had completed his enlistment of fifteen hundred additional men to man the ships he had put in commission to meet the dangers of threatened war. This he had done mainly during the holiday recess of Congress. We had given him money to do it with. Congress had made the necessary appropriation and the House had passed a bill authorizing him to make the temporary increase. When Congress adjourned the Spanish question was looming up and hastening to its crisis. The Secretary would have deserved impeachment if he had not made every reasonable preparation to meet it. He did his duty wisely and well. It was largely due to his promptness that the crisis was safely passed. When he was before the committee on the 6th of January he was asked if he could not now abandon his proposed increase of the Navy. He answered that it was already done, and the new recruits were afloat. Thus, on the 6th of January, the Committee on Appropriations first learned that the temporary contingent of fifteen hundred men had been filled; and two days afterward stated in the House that the actual enlistments had been made, but it was understood to be only a temporary increase. So far as I was concerned, and so far as the Committee on Appropriations was concerned, we have regarded it as altogether temporary.

Now, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] took a different view—if he was in favor of a permanent increase of the Navy—that was his own affair. He was not bound by my opinion nor I by his. I spoke for the Committee on Appropriations, that treated it only as a temporary increase to meet a great and pressing emergency.

If the gentleman can find in all this any concealment of the facts, or any lack of frankness in dealing with the House, he is welcome to his discovery.

Nothing in my remarks on Friday last can be construed into an attack on the Secretary of the Navy. I am glad that he met the emergency as he did. In my judgment he did right. He would have committed a very grave wrong if he had not armed and manned these additional ships so as to put the Navy in readiness to meet a possible war with Spain; and when gentlemen represent me as calling it a crime or a wrong that needs to be forgiven, they use no words which I uttered. He technically violated the law, and needed an act of Congress to condone that technical violation. That was what I said on Friday last, and I say so yet.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I call attention to another remark of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] which I cannot allow to pass unchallenged. It is my purpose, when the legislative appropriation bill comes up for discussion, to go quite fully into a statement of the relations of appropriations to estimates for a series of years past; but I will only now ask the indulgence of the committee to say that the gentleman from Kentucky is wholly in error when he says that last year Congress appropriated $13,000,000, or $15,000,000, or any other sum whatever above the aggregate estimates sent to us by the Executive Departments. I deny the truth of that statement, and am prepared to maintain that denial against all comers.

Mr. BECK. I hold now in my hand a book prepared at the Treasury Department, which shows that the appropriations amounted to $319,000,000, when the estimates amounted to only $308,000,000. Here is the book, and the gentleman can examine it for himself.

Mr. GARFIELD. Who says that the appropriations amounted to $319,000,000, and the estimates to but $308,000,000?

Mr. BECK. The Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Secretary of the Treasury says that the aggregate of his estimates for next year is $319,000,000.

Mr. BECK. No, sir.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman turn to the final footings of the Book of Estimates?

Mr. BECK. My dear sir, I suppose you never saw this book before.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am familiar with that book.

Mr. BECK. You never saw it, or you would not talk in that way about it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am perfectly familiar with the book, and I say to gentlemen that if they will turn to the ordinary Book of Estimates, I will give them facts which will, perhaps, help to guide us all. On page 36 the Secretary of the Treasury has summed up in one column this statement: "Appropriations for the year 1874, three hundred and six millions and odd dollars." In the next column, "Estimates for 1874, three hundred and eight millions."

Now, the Secretary of the Treasury is himself on record in the book before you, printed as the first document of this session, as saying that the total estimates laid before the last Congress for the year 1874 amounted to but $308,322,256.27; and this is one of the sums from which the gentleman draws the inference that the appropriations made by Congress exceeded the estimates by some thirteen millions. I have seen this charge floating through the press; but I am surprised to hear the Secretary of the Treasury quoted as authority for it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. NIBLACK obtained the floor.

Mr. GARFIELD. I beg the gentleman from Indiana to yield to me for a few moments to complete the statement I am making concerning this matter. It is due to the House and to the Committee on Appropriations that that statement should be completed.

Mr. NIBLACK. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. DAWES. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that it is true that there were appropriations made last year for which there were not corresponding estimates in the Book of Estimates, but there were estimates sent in for those items.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am coming to that point, and will now proceed with my statement. I ask the committee to inquire how the Secretary of the Treasury got the three hundred and eight and one-third millions which the gentleman sets down as the total estimates for last year. I will tell you. He goes to the old Book of Estimates of last year, the book we received on the first day of that session, and takes the sum of its estimates as the total of all the estimates for that year. But, sir, that book had not been in our hands one week before additional estimates began to pour in upon us, in letters and reports, by the hundred, from all the Departments, asking additional appropriations, appropriations not asked for in the original Book of Estimates. Those additional estimates came to the Speaker, were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, or went to the Senate and were there added to the bills. They were just as really estimates as though they had been printed in the Book of Estimates, and should all be reckoned among the estimates of the Executive Departments as all others are; and yet in the statement made by the gentleman he uses figures in which the Secretary of the Treasury has not credited Congress nor charged the Departments with any estimates whatever, except those in the last year's Book of Estimates, which was delivered to the House on the first day of its meeting. Now, sir, I have compiled and will soon lay before the House a list of items amounting to nearly $13,000,000, which at its last session Congress was asked to appropriate, but which do not appear at all in the Book of Estimates from which the Secretary quotes his $308,000,000 as the sum asked of Congress. For example, we gave $3,500,000 to eight new sloops of war. That never entered into the Book of Estimates last year, but it came as an estimate backed up by the whole strength of the Navy Department, and the House and Senate gave it. Now Congress is charged with having appropriated $3,500,000 more than was asked for, simply because the $3,500,000 was not asked for in the big printed book, but was asked for by executive letter, transmitted a few weeks after the Book of Estimates was printed. I can multiply this example by hundreds.

The charge that Congress has thus exceeded the estimates I repel as an outrage both on the House and on the Committee on Appropriations. I affirm, on the contrary, that last year the Committee on Appropriations cut down the estimates in almost every branch of the service, and in many cases largely reduced them. It is true there were many appropriations made that the committee did not have charge of, and all of which went to make up the aggregate of appropriations.

Every pension granted by Congress, every private claim that passed through the Committee on Claims, every new building provided for that came from any committee or from individual members, the salary increase, and all such appropriations, went to swell the total; and for these the Committee on Appropriations were in no sense responsible. I say, without fear of successful contradiction, that the Committee on Appropriations cut down item by item, from beginning to end, these very estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, who is now quoted as saying to the country that we made appropriations far beyond his estimates. I am willing that Congress shall bear its full share of the responsibility; but I insist that each Department shall likewise bear its own burdens, and not toss them over upon the shoulders of this House, much less of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Chairman, having served for years on the Committee on Appropriations, I feel of course an interest in the subject of appropriations, and my attention is naturally directed to every important appropriation bill that is brought in here. I shall endeavor to co-operate with the Committee on Appropriations in every way possible. From the very condition of things to which I have referred I am disposed to treat that committee with the utmost fairness always, and to always concur with them when I think they are right, and to differ with them only in cases where I think they are clearly wrong.

I do not complain that in the present instance the committee has reported too large a sum for the Navy Department. On the contrary, if this bill passes both Houses without any increase in amount, I believe that the sequel will demonstrate that the sum which the bill appropriates will be found insufficient for the purpose of supporting the naval establishment of the country during the next fiscal year. I make that prediction with regret; but what I have seen and realized during the last four Congresses convinces me of the truth of that proposition.

I do not care who may be at the head of the Departments of this Government, or what administration may be in power; I have come to the deliberate conclusion that no material reduction can be made in the expenses of any Department of the Government except by the active, energetic, and enlightened co-operation of the head of that particular Department. I do not wish to be understood as intimating—because I have no facts upon which to base properly any such intimation—that the Secretary of the Navy does not desire to economize in every way that is practicable, that he does not desire to co-operate with the Committee on Appropriations in an honest effort to reduce the expenses of the Navy Department. But I am entirely convinced that so long as the present laws governing the Navy Department are allowed to remain in force the sums proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, to be appropriated by this bill, will not be sufficient to carry that Department through upon the scale it is now organized upon. There is but one way to successfully apply the knife to that Department, and that is by the proper committee, the Committee on Naval Affairs, taking the matter in hand, and modifying or repealing existing laws in relation to that Department.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. NIBLACK. Certainly.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Does the gentleman not know, from his experience heretofore as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, that the present Secretary of the Navy has always kept himself and his Department religiously within the appropriations?

Mr. NIBLACK. So far as my information goes I believe he has.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. And that the Secretary of the Navy is almost the sole exception to the rule?

Mr. NIBLACK. I believe that he has endeavored in good faith to conform his expenditures, as far as possible, to the appropriations made year by year. I am the more disposed on that account to give him credence for what he says on this occasion. My principal object in seeking the floor now was to have read to the House a letter addressed by the Secretary of the Navy to the President of the United States when he was called upon to revise the estimates of his Department. I ask to have read the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT.
Washington, January 5, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a copy of the resolution passed by the honorable the House of Representatives on the 15th day of December last, requesting, for reasons therein stated, a revision of the estimates of the various Executive Departments.

I recognize fully the propriety of every economy which can be practiced without injury to the best interests of the country, and I have, in consultation with the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, indicated where reductions in the estimates for the civil establishment and other parts of the machinery of the naval service can best be made without seriously crippling this most important arm.

These reductions, amounting in the aggregate to about one million and a half of dollars, are shown in detail in the accompanying statement.

Though earnestly desiring to reduce the naval expenditures wherever reduction is economy, I cannot say with truth that I think reduction to any greater amount, or in any other direction, is either proper or safe.

The estimates of the Navy, already considerably less than the appropriations of last year, are based upon the legally authorized force in the service, and are made largely to meet the fixed requirements of existing laws.

That portion which is estimated for the general maintenance of the Navy is closely calculated to meet its absolute necessities in time of peace, and these necessities are not reduced by anything which has occurred since the estimates were made.

There has been some accumulation of available supplies during the last two months, and where this has been the case there I have indicated corresponding reductions. But it must not be assumed that all, or even a large part, of our recent accumulations will be available for ordinary purposes.

Very few of the ships fitted out to meet the emergency just passed will be useful for our ordinary purposes.

The monitors are in no sense sea-going cruisers, and the size of the large wooden ships prevents their economical use in time of peace.

Thus neither of these classes, though of immense value in time of war, are available for the peace purposes of our cruising Navy, while their equipment, armament, and ammunition, adapted to their special use, are unsuited for vessels of different size and character.

Our cruising force in commission is not large. Indeed, our squadrons are exceedingly small for the immense area over which they are distributed, and the various and extended work which is required of them. Within the last six weeks it was necessary, in order to concentrate a respectable force at Key West, to abandon every other station on the Atlantic Ocean, and to call home every available ship, with the single exception of one on the South Atlantic station.

Yet to maintain these squadrons in efficiency, supplying the places of the old, worn-out, and expensive ships with new and useful ones, will require the full amount estimated for the various working Bureaus, and if these are materially cut down the squadrons themselves must be reduced.

All the foregoing considerations apply to a condition of profound and lasting peace. But we cannot expect this always to endure, and when war does come, it will come to us from the ocean, scattering our commerce, infesting our immense coast line on both oceans, and threatening our great sea-ports, where is concentrated so much of the business and the property of the people.

The lesson of the day in truth is, that our Navy should be increased, not diminished.

Recent events have demonstrated to all that the great immediate military necessity of this nation is seaworthy war-vessels adequate to contend with those of other nations, and well armed and completely equipped for cruising or fighting. In my judgment the expenditures to meet this necessity cannot be wisely, perhaps not safely, postponed; and while I have, in accordance with the resolution of the House of Representatives, indicated the reductions referred to which may be made, possibly without serious injury to the service, I am constrained to the duty, disagreeable as it is, of declaring frankly my opinion not only that no reductions should be made at this time in the appropriations which are especially intended to put the cruising vessels of the Navy in condition for active and immediate service, but that, on the contrary, it will be wise statesmanship and real economy to increase these appropriations to a sum sufficient at least to make efficient all the remainder of our iron-clad force, and also to place the dock at the Pensacola navy-yard in a condition for use. And this work should be commenced as soon as possible, even to the postponement, if necessary, of other public works. It is hardly necessary to add that while I entertain these views, and I feel bound to express them when called upon, I shall, of course, be ready to accommodate the action of the Department to the wishes of Congress on this subject, and do the best I can with the means they see fit to supply; for theirs is the power, and with them will rest the responsibility.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEORGE M. ROBESON,
Secretary of the Navy.

The PRESIDENT.

Mr. NIBLACK. One remark further and I shall be through. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that, assuming the Secretary of the Navy endeavors to deal frankly with the House—as I have always found him dealing with everybody he comes in connection with—it will be impossible for him to carry on the Navy Department, under its present organization, with the amount of money proposed to be appropriated by the Committee on Appropriations. Therefore, if we really desire to economize we must repeal existing laws, we must cut down the naval establishment as at present existing, under authority of law; we must not expect to accomplish the result by merely reducing appropriations.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, I was startled, as I think the House was, by the declaration of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] that the Navy Department had expended in the first quarter of the year $5,000,000 of the $6,000,000 appropriated for the year. This has led me to make some examination, which I think will be verified to-morrow; and the investigation I have thus far made leads me to believe that the figures which seem to sanction the gentleman's statement have been accidentally transposed; that the figures $1,214,700 should have been embraced in the column comprising expenses of the first quarter, while the $5,000,000 should have been included in the column charged with the remaining three quarters. In other words, there has been a transposition by a clerical mistake.

Mr. BECK. The gentleman will not find it so.

Mr. KASSON. If the gentleman will look at the pay of the Marine Corps, which has not been transposed, he will find that it exactly harmonizes with the proportions of the pay of the Navy as it would be if my hypothesis is correct.

Mr. GARFIELD. That point will be settled to-morrow.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] did not seem to understand from what book I was reading. I want to call his attention to the fact that I was not referring to the Book of Estimates at all. I was referring to a book containing all the laws making appropriations, giving the amounts appropriated.

Mr. GARFIELD. I presume it was the Book of Warrants. I have that book.

Mr. BECK. It is not the Book of Warrants at all. It is a book of which the title page is as follows:

Appropriations for the support of the Government of the United States, on account of the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and of deficiencies for previous years; made by the third session of the Forty-second Congress, and an account of permanent and indefinite appropriations made by that and previous Congresses, 1874.

This book is prefaced by the following notice of the Secretary of the Treasury:

NOTICE.

The following appropriations made by the third session of the Forty-second Congress, for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and for deficiencies for previous years, including the permanent and indefinite appropriations made by that and previous Congresses, are printed for the information of those concerned. In all estimates, disbursements, accounts, vouchers, settlements, and warrants affecting or relating to any appropriation herein authorized the titles as printed in italics shall be quoted as the appropriation out of which payment is to be made.

WILLIAM A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary.

The summary is as follows:

	Second session, fiscal year 1873.	Third session, fiscal year 1874.
Legislative	$5,276,061 19	$6,636,074 61
Executive	6,610,428 09	9,888,147 42
Judicial	4,588,775 00	3,743,243 87
Foreign intercourse	1,945,299 00	1,874,515 00
Independent Treasury	577,526 00	499,660 00
Mints and assay offices	959,772 00	976,620 31
Territorial governments	267,721 92	280,038 57
Military establishment	32,484,766 64	36,732,025 17
Naval establishment	18,248,198 02	22,498,620 55
Indian affairs	6,633,897 51	6,468,977 44
Pensions	30,480,000 00	30,480,000 00
Public works	14,256,616 66	20,057,132 00
Rivers and harbors	5,888,000 00	6,102,900 00
Forts and fortifications	2,037,000 00	1,899,000 00
Public lands	1,838,025 00	1,982,979 59
Postal service	6,425,970 00	6,496,602 00
Miscellaneous	15,698,694 29	15,674,164 29
Totals	154,216,751 32	172,290,700 82
Permanent appropriations	159,162,907 13	147,361,943 49
(Book of Estimates 1873–'74, page 158.)
		319,652,644 31
Additional for Navy in December		4,000,000 00
		323,652,644 31
Estimates for 1874		308,323,256 27
Excess		15,329,388 04

The additions only are my figures. The amount of permanent appropriations is stated as obtained at the Department. The excess of expenditure is $18,000,000 over the year before, or $172,000,000 against $154,000,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will allow me to add to his reading the line at the head of the title-page, "Treasury Department-Warrant Division." In other words, the book comprises the appropriations made by warrant.

Mr. BECK. It does not say so.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is what the book is understood to be everywhere.

Mr. BECK. That is a mistake. It is a book giving the various laws making appropriations, showing every dollar of appropriation passed by Congress for the year. It does not contain appropriations paid by warrant, but appropriations made by law, whether set forth in estimates or not, and is swelled by appropriations for former years, for this District and for other things not estimated for as current expenses by the Departments.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The statement of the gentleman from Kentucky about that matter did not startle me. I do not believe, and I do not suppose he believes, that the Navy Department has really expended during the first three months of the fiscal year three-quarters of all its appropriation for the pay-list, and that it now comes in with a deficiency resulting from that excessive expenditure. The gentleman has simply made a point on the figures; and to-morrow morning I will show him how the mistake occurred.

I now propose to move that the committee rise. But, before doing so, I wish to ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Then, to-morrow, when we go into Committee of the Whole, we shall be ready to consider the bill clause by clause for amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must object to that proposition, for this evening at least.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Then I will renew the request in the morning. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. E. H. ROBERTS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the naval appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move that the House now adjourn.

CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. LUTTRELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which, without being read, was referred, together with evidence upon the same subject, to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed:

Whereas the Central Pacific Railroad Company, was incorporated by the State of California on the 27th day of June, A. D. 1861, to construct a railroad to the eastern boundary of said State; and whereas by acts of Congress of the years 1862 and 1863 said company was authorized to extend said railroad eastward through the territory of the United States by an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean," and received from the United States, under said act and the acts supplemental thereto and amendatory thereof, and from the State of California and counties and corporations within said State, from the State of Nevada, and from the Territory of Utah, the following amounts, estimated in gold coin, to wit:

Aid granted by the United States, of the value in gold coin of	$50,288,000 00
Granted and donated by various corporations within the State of California	5,000,000 00
Granted and donated by various corporations and individuals situated within the State of Nevada	3,000,000 00
Granted and donated by various corporations and individuals within the Territory of Utah	1,500,000 00
Donated by the State of California	1,500,000 00
Bonds on which the State of California guarantees and pays its interest	12,000,000 00
Donated by the county of Placer, in the State of California, bonds	250,000 00
Donated by the city and county of San Francisco, interest bonds	400,000 00
Donated by the city and county of Sacramento, interest bonds	300,000 00
Bonds by the United States Government	27,389,120 00
First-mortgage bonds of the Central Pacific Railroad Company	27,389,120 00
Second-mortgage bonds of said Central Pacific Railroad Company legalized by law	15,601,741 83
Second-mortgage bonds issued and sold as above	11,787,378 17
Total	156,825,360 00

And whereas the directors of said Central Pacific Railroad Company made contract with certain of their own members, to construct said road, known as the "Contract and Finance Company," for consideration in lands, money, and bonds far in excess of the actual cost of construction; and whereas said Central Pacific Railroad is and has been completed and in running order for, in part and in whole, over six years last past; and the profits accruing from the same, amounting to over ——— million dollars annually, have been kept and appropriated to their own use in violation of their duties and in fraud of the United States Government; and whereas said directors of the said Central Pacific Railroad Company issued to themselves and for their personal profit the second-mortgage bonds of said Central Pacific Railroad Company, to the amount of $27,387,120, payable in United States gold coin, with interest at 10 per cent. per annum, and have with said profits accruing to the Central Pacific Railroad Company from the sales of the United States bonds, lands, and other subsidies as aforesaid mentioned, and the issue to themselves of the bonds aforesaid, bought, in order to defraud the Government of the United States out of the interest now due from said Central Pacific Railroad Company, other railroads in the State of California, and expended in doing the same all of the accruing profits of said Central Pacific Railroad for the benefit of the directors, failing and fraudulently refusing to pay the Government of the United States the interest legally due on said second-mortgage bonds: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That a select committee of seven members of this House be appointed by the Speaker, and such committee be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire whether or not any person connected with the organization or association commonly known as the Contract and Finance Company of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, now holds any of the bonds, lands, or other subsidies granted said company for the payment of which, or the interest thereon, the United States is in any way liable; and whether or not such holders, if any, or their assignees of such bonds, lands, or other subsidies are holders in good faith and for a valuable consideration, or procured the same illegally or by fraud and whether or not the United States may properly refuse to pay interest thereon, or the principal thereof when the same shall become due; and whether or not any relinquishment of the first-mortgage lien that may have heretofore been made by the United States with reference to the bonds of said Central Pacific Railroad Company, or any other branch roads connected therewith, may be set aside; and to inquire into the character and purpose of such organization, and fully of all the transactions of said Central Pacific Railroad Company, and of all transactions had and contracted by and between the directors of the Central Pacific Railroad Company and Charles Crocker & Co., and of all transactions and contracts made by said directors with the Contract and Finance Company, for the furnishing of material of every kind and character whatsoever, and the construction of the Central Pacific Railroad and other branch roads connected therewith. and of all contracts made by said directors of the Central Pacific Railroad Company with Wells, Fargo & Co., or any other corporation or corporations, individual or individuals for material furnished, or for the construction of said Central Pacific Railroad, or railroads constructed or purchased by said directors; and what officers of the United States, or members of Congress, if any, have at any time been connected therewith; and to report the facts to this House, together with such bill as may be necessary to protect the interest of the United States Government and the people on account of any of the bonds, lands, and subsidies of the class hereinbefore referred to, and against the combinations to defraud the Government and the people. And said committee is hereby authorized to send for persons and papers, and to report at any time.

FRED RETTIG.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the draught of a bill for the relief of Fred Rettig, first lieutenant in the First Florida Battery; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FALLS OF SAINT ANTHONY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in relation to an appropriation for the preservation of the Falls of Saint Anthony; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

FORT REYNOLDS MILITARY RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in relation to the sale of the military reservation at Fort Reynolds, Colorado Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR INDIAN SERVICE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the draught of a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to use certain unexpended balances of appropriation for the Indian service; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PERMANENT DEFENSES.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement showing in detail the amount of appropriations which have been, or will be, expended on each of the permanent forts and batteries for which regular appropriations have been made, from the period of the commencement of each of them to the present time; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

GOVERNMENT RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with the act of August 26, 1842, an account of the receipts and expenditures of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1871; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

PROCEEDS OF SALES OF COMMISSARY STORES.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the draught of a bill repealing section 5 of the act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government, approved May 8, 1872, relating to the proceeds of sales of commissary stores; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PAWNEE INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the draught of a bill making available certain unexpended balances of funds to be used for the civilization of the Pawnee Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the reading of the draught of that bill. This practice of draughts of bills coming from the Departments is not new, I know, but I have never known so large a number of draughts of bills coming from the Departments to this House before. I hope, therefore, we will see what this draught of a bill is.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman ask to have it read?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do.

The SPEAKER. It is quite lengthy, and has been ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOLMAN. If it has been ordered to be printed I do not ask to have it read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair agrees with the gentleman from Indiana that draughts of bills from the Departments are more frequent than any necessity seems to call for.

CAPTAIN ROBERTSON, SECOND UNITED STATES ARTILLERY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the promotion of Captain Robertson, Second United States Artillery, to the rank of major; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CONTEST—FOURTH DISTRICT OF LOUISIANA.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House additional papers relating to the contest in the fourth district of Louisiana; which were referred to the Committee on Elections.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Clerk of the House, transmitting testimony taken by the Committee on Ways and Means, third session Forty-second Congress, touching the subsidy to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

INCREASED SOLDIERS' PAY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a draught of an amendment to the act entitled "An act to increase the pay of soldiers in the United States Army, and for other purposes;" which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

UTE INDIANS, COLORADO.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in relation to an agreement concluded with the Ute Indians in Colorado, September 13, 1873; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MODE OF PAYING INDIAN ANNUITIES.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draught of a bill providing for the manner of paying annuities to the Indian tribes under treaty stipulations; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that it be printed.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask whether these departmental bills have any special privileges?

The SPEAKER. None whatever.

Mr. RANDALL. I think we ought to be able to draw up our own bills without dictation from the Departments.

The SPEAKER. They are sent here, perhaps, after consultation with some member and upon his request.

Mr. HOLMAN'S motion was agreed to.

SPRINGFIELD ARMORY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the act of April 2, 1794, a statement exhibiting the expenditures at the Springfield armory; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that these draughts are sent here on the request of some members of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that all draughts of bills coming from the Departments to-day be ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. It will be so ordered.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. These draughts are merely a part of the letters sent to us.

The SPEAKER. If there be any excuse it will be found, perhaps, in the request of the members of Congress to the heads of Departments to put their recommendations in the shape of bills.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I do not see why the bill should be printed unless the committee to which it is referred chooses to report it back.

The SPEAKER. Executive communications, in nine cases out of ten, are usually ordered to be printed.

JOHN B. CHAPMAN.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of February 14, 1873, the claim of John B. Chapman against the Osage Nation of Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PAYMENTS TO THE ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD, ETC.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in answer to the resolution of the House of December 12, 1873, in relation to payments made to the Illinois Central and other railroad companies since January 1, 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

ABOLITION OF THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, in answer to a resolution of the House of December 8, 1873, transmitting a statement of expenses incurred by the abolition of the franking privilege; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

ARMY EXPENDITURES.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of expenditures effected by the reduction or increase of the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COBURN. I think that it is not necessary to have that communication printed.

WILLARD HOWE.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1213) for the relief of Willard Howe, of Massachusetts; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

PAYMENT OF COMMITTEE CLERK.

Mr. HARRISON. I am directed by the Committee on Elections to report the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, instructed to pay to Henry R. Wells the regular compensation as clerk to the Committee on Elections from the time he actually entered upon duty as such, notwithstanding his failure to be sworn until a later day.

Mr. HARRISON. I will state that a similar resolution was adopted in the case of the Committee on Railways and Canals the other day. The Clerk of the House did not feel authorized to pay the amount unless the party had taken the oath on the first day of commencing his duties. He took it subsequently; and the committee directed me to report this resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. HALE, of Maine, that the House do now adjourn; and it was agreed to.

And thereupon (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. ALBERT: The memorial of Joseph Forrest for compensation for occupation of his property, and for wood cut from his land.

Also, a petition of the State Temperance Union, Grand Division Sons of Temperance, and Independent Order of Good Templars, of the State of Maryland, for the appointment of a committee of inquiry concerning the liquor traffic.

By Mr. ARMSTRONG: Petitions from citizens of Northern Dakota, praying for the organization of the new Territory of Pembina.

Also, petitions of citizens of Yankton County, Dakota, in relation to reserving lands for Menonnite (Russian) colonies.

Also, petitions of citizens of Lincoln, Turner, and Armstrong Counties, Dakota, praying for an amendment of the act to encourage tree culture on western prairies.

By Mr. ATKINS: A petition of sundry citizens of McNairy County, Tennessee, praying the establishment of a post-route from Purdy to Stantonville.

By Mr. AVERILL: Petition of the State Temperance Union of Minnesota, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the liquor traffic.

By Mr. BANNING: Resolutions of the Board of Trade of Cincinnati, against further inflation of the currency.

Also, the petition of Mrs. Frances A. Kusie and others, praying for an amendment to the act of Congress of April 22, 1872, providing for payment of $100 bounty to soldiers who enlisted prior to July 22, 1861.

By Mr. BASS: A petition of Jewett & Root, Pratt & Co., and Pratt & Letchworth, manufacturers, of Buffalo, against the repeal of the bankrupt law, and for its amendment.

Also, a petition of Messrs. Altman & Co., Barnes & Bancroft, Flint & Kent, and other merchants of Buffalo, New York, for amendment of the bankrupt law, and against its repeal.

By Mr. BLOUNT: A petition of the South Georgia Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, for the payment of the claim of the Southern Methodist publishing house, of Nashville, Tennessee.

By Mr. BRIGHT: The petition of W. B. Black and others, of Tennessee, for the relief of Southern Methodist publishing house.

By Mr. CALDWELL: A petition of certain citizens of Alabama, in relation to newspaper postage and the manner of appointing postmasters.

By Mr. CESSNA: A petition of the Grand Temple of Honor and Temperance of the State of Pennsylvania, signed by its officers, asking the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the liquor traffic.

By Mr. CHAFFEE: A petition of citizens of Denver, signed by over 2,000, asking the passage of an act to enable the people to form a State government and be admitted as a State.

Also, a petition asking that the branch mint at Denver be put upon a coinage basis.

By Mr. CHIPMAN: The memorials of J. N. Carpenter, M. W. Galt, and others, and Thomas Malone.

By Mr. CLAYTON: A petition and resolutions of the House Carpenters' Eight-hour League and Shop of Mechanics of California, condemning the recommendations of Supervising Architect Mullett, for the repeal of the eight-hour law, and indorsing an editorial on the subject in the Shop and Senate; also a copy of said editorial above referred to.

Also, the memorial of Redick McKee, late disbursing agent of the Indian Department in California, asking certain allowances.

By Mr. COBB, of Kansas: A petition relative to the tree-culture act.

By Mr. COX: A memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of New York State, on the bankrupt law.

Also, a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of New York State, on the use of electric lights on ships at sea.

Also, another from the same, as to the use of life-rafts at sea.

By Mr. CROUNSE: A petition of citizens of Nebraska, asking Congress to provide for the appointment of a commission to inquire into matters relating to traffic in intoxicating liquors in the United States, &c.

By Mr. DANFORTH: The petition of George Macomber and others, of Cambridge, Ohio, asking that the law of February 14, 1871, be so amended as to grant pensions to all soldiers of 1812 who were mustered into service during said war and honorably discharged.

By Mr. DONNAN: The petition of M. A. Chamberlain and 35 other officers and soldiers of the late Union Army, now residents of Iowa, asking for a modification of the homestead laws so as to dispense with the requirement of actual residence before receiving title to lands located by soldiers and sailors honorably discharged from the United States Army.

By Mr. DURHAM: The petition of Mrs. Elizabeth J. King, praying for a pension.

By Mr. FREEMAN: The petition of Martha J. Waits, praying for a pension.

By Mr. FRYE: The petition of C. E. Barron, and other citizens of Maine, asking for an appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the liquor traffic.

Also, petition of M. H. Scott and other citizens of Maine, for same.

Also, petition of Moses Stone and other citizens of Maine, for same.

By Mr. HANCOCK: The memorial of Mary K. Brown, widow of James D. Brown, with accompanying papers.

By Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia: Petition and resolutions of the manufacturers of tobacco, at Richmond, Virginia, protesting against the increase of tax on tobacco.

By Mr. HAVENS: The memorial of Edward Dunscomb, late acting assistant surgeon United States Army.

Also, the memorial of Alexander C. Cloud, of Newton County, asking compensation for certain cotton appropriated to Government use.

By Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut: A petition of officers and members of the Grand Temple of Honor and Temperance of Connecticut, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the liquor traffic.

By Mr. HENDEE: The memorial of A. M. Gangeson and others, for aid to the Industrial Home School.

By Mr. HOOPER: The petition of Henry Savage, for compensation for his services as acting chargé d'affaires of the United States in Gautemala.

By Mr. HUBBELL: A petition for the improvement of Pine River Harbor, Charlevoix County, Michigan.

Also, the petition of Charles L. Sheldon, and 28 others of Marquette County, Michigan, praying the enactment of a law providing for the issue of convertible United States bonds, bearing interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum, and authorizing the national banks to hold such bonds as a part of their reserve.

By Mr. LOWE: The memorial of J. H. Frint and others, with reference to irrigation and land grants.

Also, the petition of Judge M. V. Voss and others, for relief of settlers on New York Indian lands in Kansas.

Also, the petition of Marcelles La Croix and others, Indians of the Miami tribe, for relief.

By Mr. McCRARY: The petition of Captain W. G. Allen, and other soldiers of Iowa, praying the passage of an act granting one hundred and sixty acres of land to each honorably discharged soldier of the United States.

By Mr. McFADDEN: A petition of 254 citizens of Olympia, in Washington Territory, praying that the Tide Flats of Budd's Inlet may be donated to the town of Olympia.

Also, a memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Washington, relative to the Tide Flats on Elliott Bay, adjacent to the town of Seattle, in said Territory.

Also, a memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Washington, relative to the Seattle and Walla-Walla Railroad and Transportation Company.

Also, a memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Washington, praying Congress to grant William Packwood three hundred and twenty acres of land as compensation for his exploration and discovery of stone-coal and minerals in the Cascade Mountains of said Territory.

By Mr. MOORE: A petition of 125 citizens of Lawrence County,

Pennsylvania, praying that the postal laws be so amended as to require prepayment of the postage on newspapers; and also that a more simple and equitable method of determining the salaries of postmasters be devised.

By Mr. MORRISON: The petition and resolutions of the Saint Clair Pharmaceutical Association of Southern Illinois, for modification of section 13, schedule C, of the internal-revenue law of 1866.

By Mr. MYERS: A memorial and accompanying papers of General Samuel W. Crawford, United States Army, asking for the rank of major-general on the retired list.

By Mr. NEGLEY: A memorial relative to artificial obstructions to the navigation of the Ohio River.

By Mr. NESMITH: Sundry petitions from the people of Oregon, asking for an appropriation to improve the navigation of the Willamette River.

Also, the petition of R. Bird, Jacob Armsley, and a large number of citizens of Oregon, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the liquor traffic.

Also, a petition of the State Temperance Alliance and Father Mathew Society of the State of Oregon, signed by their officers, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the liquor traffic.

By Mr. NIBLACK: The memorial of Isaac H. Laud, of Perry County, Indiana, praying for a pension.

By Mr. O'BRIEN: The memorial of Isaiah Dewling, acting assistant surgeon, United States Navy, to be appointed to the retired list of the Navy with the rank of passed assistant surgeon, from the volunteer service, on account of loss of eyesight while on duty on board the United States coast survey steamer Corwin, in May, 1867.

By Mr. O'NEILL: A petition of the Religious Society of Progressive Friends, of Langwood, Chester County, Pennsylvania, for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the liquor traffic.

Also, a petition for the relief of John P. Ellison, formerly a private in Company C, Twenty-second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and Company A, Sixty-ninth Regiment.

By Mr. ORR: A memorial of the Central Temperance League, of Washington City, in behalf of a home for inebriates.

Also, a petition for a mail route from Wolfdale to Oto, in Woodbury County, Iowa.

By Mr. PERRY: The petition of C. K. Curtis, K. Niles, and 24 other graduates of the United States Naval Academy of the date of June 4, 1869, praying that said graduates may take rank and precedence as determined by the date of their graduation.

By Mr. PHILLIPS: Petitions in favor of a prohibitory law, from the National Temperance Society.

By Mr. ROBBINS: A petition of numerous citizens of North Carolina, for a mail-route from Lenoir to Boone, North Carolina.

By Mr. E. H. ROBERTS: A petition of the officers of the Delaware Division of the Sons and Daughters of Temperance, of Franklin, New York, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the liquor traffic.

By Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey: A petition of the Grand Division of the Sons of Temperance of the State of New Jersey and subordinate lodges, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the liquor traffic.

By Mr. SENER: The petition of J. R. Garrison and R. M. Shelton, trustees of Methodist church near Garrisonville, Stafford County, Virginia, praying compensation for damages and injuries for use of said church by Federal troops in 1862 and 1863.

Also, the petition of Robert R. Morrison, Moses Morrison, James Morrison, Thomas L. Morrison, George Morrison, and William C. Morrison, praying to be reimbursed for property lost by them during the late war for the preservation of the Union.

Also, the petition of John B. Crenshaw, trustee of Richmond Female Institute, of Richmond, Virginia, praying relief.

By Mr. SHOEMAKER, of Pennsylvania: The petition of James B. Pierce and others, citizens of Luzerne County, Pennsylvania, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the liquor traffic.

By Mr. STONE: The petition of James Clark, private, late of Captain Robert Colven's Company, Pennsylvania Volunteers, for pay and pension.

By Mr. STRAWBRIDGE: A petition of citizens of Bradford County, Pennsylvania, against the free transmission of newspapers through the United States mails.

Also, the petition of Elias Snyder, Chandler Eves, and 974 other citizens of Pennsylvania, in favor of the settlement of all international difficulties by arbitration or other pacific measures, and for the establishment of a high court of nations.

By Mr. SWANN: The petition of the Library and Literary Association of the Society of Friends of Baltimore, Maryland, signed by E. Stabler, jr., president, and George M. Lamb, secretary, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the liquor traffic.

Also, the memorial of Thomas Galloway, late captain Company C, First Maryland Volunteer Cavalry, for change of record in Adjutant-General's office.

By Mr. TOWNSEND: A petition of the officers of the Kennett Branch of the National Temperance Society and the Good Templars of Kennett township, Chester County, Pennsylvania, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the liquor traffic.

By Mr. WARD, of New Jersey: A petition of the Grand Temple of Honor, &c., asking appointment of commission of inquiry concerning the liquor traffic.

By Mr. WOLFE: A memorial of the Indianapolis Woman Suffrage Association, against any legislation by Congress limiting suffrage in the Territories to male citizens.

By Mr. WOODFORD: A petition of druggists of Brooklyn, New York, asking repeal of stamp tax on medicinal preparations.

Also, the memorial or petition of Edward Bissell, for restoration to the pay corps, United States Navy.

Also, a petition of the Kings County Temperance Association, of Brooklyn, New York, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the liquor traffic.

Also, a like petition of J. N. Stearns and others, citizens of Brooklyn, New York.

POST-ROUTE BILLS.

The following bills were introduced under the rules, and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads:

By Mr. DONNAN: A bill to establish certain post-roads in Iowa.

By Mr. GARFIELD: A bill to establish a post-road between Orwell, Ashtabula County, Ohio, and Claridon, Geauga County, Ohio.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 13, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. MORTON. If there are no Senators desiring to hear the minutes, I suggest that the reading be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the reading is dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of War, communicating, in obedience to a resolution of the Senate, a statement of the number of officers and employés in, or connected with, the War Department, who have been furnished with official postage-stamps; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a report from the Secretary of the Navy, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of January 5, 1874, information in relation to officers or employés of the Department furnished with official postage-stamps; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of L. M. Goddard and others, of Wisconsin, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented five petitions of citizens of Bent County, Colorado Territory, complaining of the manner in which patents have been issued and sales made of the public lands in that county; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair also presents the memorial and petition of DeLorma Brooks, of Wisconsin, representing that he has been despoiled and defrauded of a large amount of property by a decree of the district court of the United States for the district of Wisconsin, affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, in flagrant violation of law and justice, and praying that steps be taken to procure an amendment of the Constitution of the United States dispensing with our present judicial system, and substituting therefor arbitration by persons chosen and paid by the parties litigant. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of H. W. Read, with accompanying papers, praying compensation for superintending the transportation of money belonging to the United States from Saint Louis to Santa Fé, New Mexico, in the year 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PRATT. I present a memorial, emanating from a meeting held by working men and women in Philadelphia, on the 4th instant. They pray—

First. That no further national bonds may be issued payable in gold.

Second. That national legal-tender money be issued in place of the existing currency, bearing on its face that it represents a national debt, convertible into United States bonds at the option of the holder.

Third. That the national money be increased until it represents 5 per cent. of the wealth of the country.

Fourth. For amendments to the national-banking law, particularly one prohibiting what are known as "call loans."

I move the reference of this memorial to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a letter of the Secretary of War, communicating information in relation to the military reservation at Fort Stevens, Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Southeastern Oregon, praying compensation for property destroyed by the Modoc Indians during the late war with them; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of citizens of the counties of Marion, Polk, Linn, Benton, and Lane, in the State of Oregon, praying an appropriation of $75,000 for the removal of obstructions in the Willamette River, in that State, so as to make it navigable; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CHANDLER presented the petition of Robert Halsey, praying for the repeal of the fifth section of the mining law of May 10, 1872, and the amendment of the law in other particulars; which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

He also presented two petitions of soldiers and the heirs of soldiers, who served in the late war, praying to be allowed one hundred and sixty acres of land, and for the equalization of bounties; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CLAYTON presented a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Arkansas, asking for the passage of a law allowing bounties to all soldiers alike, without regard to race, color, previous condition, or record of slavery; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Arkansas, asking for the passage of a law to perfect the title to certain lands entered under the graduation act; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Arkansas, asking for the passage of a law providing for the sale of the Hot Springs reservation, reserving to bona-fide settlers the right of pre-emption; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Arkansas, asking the General Government to reimburse the State for expenses incurred in arming, equipping, and subsisting the militia called into service during the years 1868 and 1869, to protect the citizens, and quell disturbances arising in consequence of the enforcement of the reconstruction laws in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Arkansas, asking that the cotton tax may be refunded; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Arkansas, asking Congress to restore the right to, or compensate citizens of, the State of Arkansas for lands of the State surveyed and marked off as a portion of the Indian Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Arkansas, asking that the law authorizing the disposal of the Fort Smith military reservation may be amended, so as to set apart the buildings and a certain portion of that reservation for the use of the United States courts, other portions for a national cemetery, and that the residue shall be disposed of and the proceeds applied for the benefit of public free schools; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of the trustees of Cane Hill College, Cane Hill, Washington County, Arkansas, praying for indemnity for property destroyed during the war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a petition of a large number of citizens of the Territory of Dakota, settlers on the Bois des Sioux River and the Red River of the North, praying an appropriation for the improvement of the Red River of the North, and that a pro rata proportion of such appropriation be expended upon that river between Moorhead and Breckinridge; also praying for the establishment of a land district at Chahinkapa, the county seat of Richland County, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CONKLING presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, in favor of the adoption of the monitor life-saving raft for the use of steamships carrying passengers; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, in favor of the use of electric lights at sea; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SCOTT presented the petition of William Wheeler Hubbell, praying for the settlement of his claim to a royalty for the use of his explosive shell-fuse patents in the naval service; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HITCHCOCK presented the memorial of Benjamin Holladay, praying to be indemnified for losses to property sustained by Indian depredations while transporting the mails on the overland mail route between the Missouri River and Salt Lake City, Utah Territory, from 1860 to 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, presented the petition of Rev. A. Owen, A. Sheley, and other citizens of Michigan, praying that the "Chinese indemnity fund" be appropriated for the education of the Chinese in the Pacific States; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CLAYTON presented additional papers in the case of Captain George A. Armes, late of the Tenth United States Cavalry, praying for an honorable discharge; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. FLANAGAN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of L. D. Evans, late collector of the fourth district of Texas, praying relief for losses sustained by him while holding office, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of B. H. Shepard, of Ann Arbor, Michigan, praying to be allowed a pension, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. ALLISON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Susan Currier, widow of the late Captain Currier, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, it was Ordered, That the citizens of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, who petitioned for reimbursement of expenditures to prevent the damaging effects of the Parkersburgh bridge upon the navigation of the Ohio River, have leave to withdraw their petition and papers from the files.

REPORTING OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 795) making an appropriation to pay the salaries of the official reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House, have had the same under consideration, and instructed me to report it back with an amendment, and to ask for its present consideration, as it is a matter of importance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks for the present consideration of the bill reported by him. It will be read for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. The House bill is as follows:

That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $25,185 for the payment of the five Official Reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House of Representatives, during the first year of the Forty-third Congress, said reporters to be paid monthly at the rate fixed by law.

The amendment of the Committee on Appropriations is to insert as additional sections the following:

SEC. 2. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,636.12 to pay D. F. Murphy, Official Reporter of the Senate, for reporting the proceedings and debates of the Senate at the special session of March, 1873, according to the arrangement made with him by the Committee on Printing of the Senate, which was reported by said committee to the Senate on the 21st day of March, 1873.

SEC. 3. That there is hereby appropriated for reporting the proceedings and debates of the Senate for the congressional year ending March 4, 1874, the sum of $6,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, which sum shall be added to the contingent fund of the Senate, and be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate under the terms of the resolution aforesaid.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is due, perhaps, to the Senate that I should make a statement of the facts upon which the bill is reported.

At the close of the Forty-second Congress the contract for publishing the Globe and reporting the debates in it with Rives & Bailey expired. That left the reporting without anybody to perform the service. The House, on its part, assuming that it had a right to provide for its own reporting, passed a resolution by which it made the reporters under the old contract its official reporters, and fixed their salary at the rate of $5,000 a year, and the sum of $25,000 named in the House bill is to cover that salary, they having five reporters, paid at the rate of $5,000 each for one year, ending on the 4th of March, 1874.

The amendment to the bill is to provide for the reporting on the part of the Senate. A provision was made by the Senate Committee on Printing by which the compensation which had been fixed under the old contract was applied to our reporters, and by the resolution passed by the Senate on the recommendation of that committee it was established at the old price, and the present reporter was declared to be the Official Reporter of the Senate for the time being. In the House it will be seen that the compensation is fixed by a salary; the compensation in the Senate is fixed upon the basis of piecework—if I may express myself in that way—so much for a thousand ems.

Mr. CONKLING. On the basis of what?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. On the basis of a thousand ems.

I have now stated the bill and amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CONKLING. Before the Senator from Maine takes his seat I propose to see, if the Chair will permit me, whether I want the bill to go over, that I may look at it, or not. I should like to know from the Senator from Maine whether, for the year ending March 4 next—the twelve months between March 4, 1873, and March 4, 1874—the reporters in the House will have received $5,000 each, and the reporters in the Senate, for precisely the same time, $1,000 and something over each?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. As I understand, the law is as I have stated; and the effect is a matter of inference, of course. I do not understand that the House was in session after the 4th of March until the 1st of December. Consequently, up to December 1 I suppose there was no reporting done; but a resolution of the House was passed on the 3d of March last fixing the salaries, which of course covers the vacation, and the compensation of the House reporters is as well for the time between March 4 and December 1 as since that time. That is my understanding.

Mr. CONKLING. And that is $5,000 a year?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. And for Senate reporters how much?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senate reporters, by the contract, which is of a different character, get paid for precisely the work done.

Mr. CONKLING. And that comes to how much?

Mr. MORRILL of Maine. To sixteen hundred and some odd dollars for the extra session; and then their compensation begins with this session.

Mr. CONKLING. Without due information on this subject, I do not wish to express any opinion at this time. I wish, however, to make one suggestion. If, by reason of a contract or a law amounting to a contract, we have no discretion except that which good faith in the execution of an obligation leaves us, there probably is little, perhaps nothing, to be said. If, however, we are to legislate in the ordinary acceptation of that term, in order to determine what is right, I am struck by a consideration which in a moment I can state. The last Congress expiring on the 3d of March last, the end of that parliamentary day, the House never reconvened until the first Monday of December, which was only the other day. On the contrary, the Senate did convene, not for executive business merely, but to consider, among other things, a long contested-election case. We sat here for weeks, and, my recollection is, sat rather more than the average number of hours per day. During all that time the reporters of this body—and certainly I shall not disparage the House reporters when I say that no reporters are more skillful or faithful than the reporters of this body—sat here and performed work which, measured by the thousand ems, at the regular price, amounts to $1,600, and only $1,600. During that time the reporters of the House performed, and can have performed, no service whatever. Now, as the result of this bill, the reporters of the House are to be paid $5,000 each, all of which is unearned except that which falls between the 1st of December last and the 4th of March next, and the reporters of the Senate, who have performed an amount of work so large as to amount as piecework measured by ems to $1,600, are to receive precisely the fixed equivalent for what they have actually done.

If the House has placed us in this position, as I said before virtually withdrawing from us all discretion and leaving us nothing to do but to perform or refuse to perform an ordinary obligation, I repeat perhaps very little can be said; but certainly my honorable friend from Maine will agree with me that if this question was before his committee, or if it is within reach of the Senate, we should hardly in this time, when "back pay" is not so fashionable as "back pay" once was, vote to reporters of either House $3,400, if not $5,000, for nothing, while at the same time we are adjudging that had they rendered service for a length of time as long as that during which this House sat, $1,600 would be an abundant reward for the service rendered.

I do not know that I shall interpose an objection to the consideration of this bill; and yet, unless my friend from Maine is prepared to assure us that we cannot exercise our discretion here to make this right without violating a contract, I think it had better lie over, to the end that we may consult a little and see it, and judge what we can do.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will the Senator allow me to make an explanation before he makes the objection?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have stated the general facts controlling the case. The House did pass a resolution by which they undertook to make a contract in the nature of law with these parties fixing their salary at $5,000. Now, whether technically that is the law or not, the Senator is quite as competent to judge as I am, and perhaps as any man on the floor. The Senate committee were disposed to regard it as a contract, if not in law technically, still by comity, because such has been the practice of these bodies; and particularly as we find ourselves involved in precisely the same predicament. We did undertake to fix a compensation for our reporters, and they are acting upon it now. They are either acting upon a bona fide contract, or they are acting under a total misapprehension. My own belief about it is that, regarding the usages of these two bodies over their own employés, we are bound to consider the resolution of the House in the nature of a contract, as we are the resolution of the Senate employing reporters, and should appropriate accordingly.

The committee felt obliged to regard this as a contract, and particularly as the Senate has participated practically in the same thing; and it does not seem to me that we are in a predicament to go back upon it. But the Senator from New York will observe that we have limited this whole arrangement to the 4th of March following, within which I take occasion now to admonish the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] or would if he was in his place—accidentally, for the first time, I believe, in several days, he is now out of his seat—that some definite arrangement ought to be made by the joint consent of the two Houses in regard to the publication of our proceedings; and, therefore, we have limited the action of Congress upon this whole subject to the 4th of March next.

I hope my honorable friend from New York, on the whole, will come to the conclusion, although there is a great deal in what has been suggested about drawing the salary, yet that it is a compensation fixed unquestionably in good faith on the part of the House with reference to their employés by a usage which I think has obtained in both branches, and will not feel that he ought to interpose an objection to the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. DAVIS. Whether or not there is a remedy, I of course leave to Senators of more experience than myself; but the result of this bill is that the Senate reporters, including the extra session, according to the calculations, up to March 4, 1874, get $7,600, and the House reporters get a little upward of $25,000; so that while the reporting of the debates in the Senate will cost $7,600 for the year ending the 4th of March next, the House reporting will cost $25,000 and a little upward. Perhaps it results from a regulation in the House of a fixed salary and here by the thousand ems; but that is the practical result of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will assume that there is no objection to the present consideration of this bill. It is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SHERMAN. Upon the amendment I have but a word to say, and that is, that in my opinion we ought to now fix the question of the compensation of these reporters, and I think by a salary. I am inclined to believe that my friend from New York was mistaken in supposing that the pay of the Senate reporters would be less under the provisions of this bill than the House reporters. I have no doubt the pay of the Senate reporters will be more, and I think it ought to be more. The Senate reporters are confined here a greater number of hours; there are but two of them who constantly take notes, and they have, consequently, more work to do than the House reporters, and they ought to have a liberal salary, because their art is a very difficult one to acquire; they are very skillful in their art, and probably none surpass them in the United States. They ought to be well paid, but I think they ought to be paid by a fixed salary.

I wish therefore, if possible, as the House has already abandoned the habit of paying by the thousand ems—a very indefinite measure to outsiders like ourselves—to have a fixed salary for our reporters. That might give some motive to cut down these debates. I am willing to vote any salary to the reporters of the Senate that a committee of the Senate—the Committee on Appropriations or the Committee on Printing—may allow; but I am not willing to do anything more now than carry out the resolution of the Senate during the last called session, that for that session we shall pay the reporters at the old rate; and so, perhaps, until a new contract can be made. But I suggest, as an amendment to the amendment, that after the 4th of March next the compensation of the reporters of the Senate shall be fixed at an annual salary, to be reported by the Committee on Printing. The House have provided $5,000 a year. There may be reasons why the Senate reporters should have a larger salary, because they are here more hours. There are but two of them doing the note-taking regularly, while there are five in the House. I propose to leave the amount of the salary to the Committee on Printing; but I would prefer a compensation at so much per annum, to be fixed by the Committee on Printing. I am perfectly willing to leave to that committee the adjustment of this matter, because they are better informed than I am. I move an amendment to the amendment:

That after the 4th of March the compensation of the Senate reporters shall be fixed by contract at an annual salary, to be paid monthly; the amount thereof to be arranged by the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CONKLING. If there were nothing but the regular sessions of Congress to be taken into consideration, it might be feasible to fix for the reporters' salary that the salary in each House should be the same; but when you come to called sessions of the Senate particularly, and the repeated unusual sessions of Congress that we have had in the past, and may, to some extent, have in the future, it would be pretty difficult, I should say, for the committee on the one side or the reporter on the other to undertake for a compensation measured by the year to do all the work falling within the year. It might, contrary to his expectations, occur that a called session would take place, and he would be occupied two or three months, which he might otherwise devote to the practice of his art in other fields. I suggest that merely to the Senator from Ohio for his consideration.

I wish also to ascertain whether the Senator is right in supposing that I have fallen into an error about this comparative compensation. The Senator says, as I understand him, that I am mistaken in supposing as to the past, namely, as to the period from now back to the 4th of March last, under the resolution of the House, the House reporters receive the most.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is not what I said. I meant that, taking a Congress through—taking the compensation of the Senate reporters for the two months of the session now passed, and adding it to the compensation they earned in March of last year and the compensation they will draw under the present arrangement, it is, probably, higher than a salary for the year would be.

Mr. CONKLING. That may be so; I had not all that in mind; and the Senator doubtless knows what he says. The point to which I called the attention of the Senate, and to which I again invite the attention of the Senator from Ohio, is this: under this bill, as I understand it, the Senate reporters are to be paid for what they earn, and nothing more; while at the same time the House reporters are to be paid a large sum of money, to wit, $5,000 a year, for which, less the unexpired period from now to the 4th of March, they have rendered no service whatever. Will the Senator from Maine tell me whether I am right in that?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is true.

Mr. CONKLING. Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio, and the Senate, as far as Senators attend, will see the point. Unless the Senate is constrained by a contract, which cannot be violated except by bad faith, we are voting to pay a large sum of money, thirty-five hundred or four thousand dollars each, amounting to eighteen or twenty thousand dollars for a past period, during which period not one ounce of service was rendered by those who are to receive it. I say again with the Senator from Maine, as far as this is a question between the Senate and the House, it would be governed by considerations of courtesy—comity, I think my honorable friend styled it. As far as it is a question between Congress, as I suppose it to be, on the one side, and the persons who are to receive this money on the other, it is a matter of contract and good faith. But if the question can escape those two considerations so as to be committed to the discretion and conscience of every member of this body, then I say, whoever these gentlemen may be, however meritorious they are, the simple question is, whether the Senate is going to vote, applicable to a period already past, a large sum of money for which no service whatever has been rendered. I venture to say that there is no Senator, however kind might be his inclinations toward the particular claimants, who would for one moment entertain the idea if, as I said before, it is a new question, open to his unrestricted discretion and conviction, of voting away $20,000 for a past period for which no equivalent whatever has been rendered. So I have said. My honorable friend from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] reminds me that it runs up to the 4th of next March. But the point is, it not only pays the legal and contract rate for all service to be rendered between the 1st of December and the 4th of March, but it goes back and pays for all the period between the 1st of December and the 4th of March last, during which time there was no session of the House, and no possibility of the performance of any service. That is the point.

Now, Mr. President, if this be a contract—and I do not understand the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] to have said that, although he says the committee were disposed to so treat it even if technically it might be otherwise—if it be a contract, so be it. If it is nominated in the bond, be it the pound of flesh or anything else, the bond must prevail. If, on the contrary, it is a question of comity or etiquette between the two Houses, and the House of Representatives say, "In courtesy we have the absolute jus disponendi of a question of this sort, because it is our own," and if we cannot interfere with it without an impropriety, certainly I acquiesce in that; but if I am called on to vote upon my conscience and my judgment, and the case is such that I have the right to judge of it, then I must say that I do not see how, sitting here as a trustee voting away trust-money, I can justify myself in voting $20,000 of back pay for a period of time during which no service whatever was performed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think this general fact may be stated in regard to the compensation of the reporters of the House: that the compensation which the House fixed would not be much in excess of the compensation which they would have received under the rule by which our reporters are now receiving pay; and therefore it would not be a question of a salary greatly in excess of the ordinary pay. It is true, unquestionably, as the Senator from New York says, that while doing very little or nothing, they have been receiving a portion of this pay, but he fails to remark that now the time has come when they are to earn this salary. The House thought that a salary of $5,000 was not excessive; and probably it was not excessive. It is not as much, perhaps, as we are paying our own reporters to-day, and the only question which can arise which can address itself to the Senate here at all, is, whether the fact that this is a proposition to pay the reporters of the House for a period of time when they were doing nothing, considering that now the time has come within which they are to do all the work, really affects the equity of the case. I do not see that it does. I do not see that they stand any different from other officers who are paid by a salary instead of being paid by their work.

Mr. MORTON. If the arrangement of the House is to pay their reporters a salary of so much per annum, what have vacations to do with it? Members of Congress get so much per annum, and they get it monthly, without regard to vacation or session; and so it would be with any employés paid by the year. The Senate pursues a different system at present—pays by the job. Which is the more economical I believe the chairman is not ready to say.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think the salary would be the more economical.

Mr. MORTON. I hope we shall pass the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to make one observation more. The argument of the Senator from New York is sufficiently answered by the statement of the Senator from Indiana. This is a question of compensation, and we have always adopted the principle of salary rather than compensation by a rule that we cannot understand. The chairman of the Committee on Printing not being present at the moment, I was informed by his clerk that that committee had under consideration this question. If so, I do not want to embarrass it. I wish to observe, however, that my object in preferring a salary to a compensation such as is proposed to the Senate reporters, is this: I want to exclude from our published records here everything that does not pertain to the debates of the Senate; and we know that this mode of paying by ems—I do not know precisely what they are, but I know printers use that term very often—does tend to increase the volume of the published debates. The object of Congress ought to be to reduce as far as practicable the volume of the RECORD. Therefore, I trust that in any arrangement that may be made hereafter, they will have some amount of compensation that will induce, so far as proper, the reporters to condense the debates of Congress, and certainly not to put in more than has been uttered on the floor of the Senate.

Under the circumstances, as the Senator from Rhode Island is now present, I will withdraw my amendment, upon the understanding that the Committee on Printing are considering this subject, and that the bill now before us only extends to the 4th of March next.

Mr. ANTHONY. I was not in when the Senator from Ohio put the question to me; but it will be remembered that at the end of the last Congress the contract for publishing the debates in the Globe ceased—ceased by law—and at the opening of the special session of the Senate there was no law for publishing the debates, or would have been none but for the fact that a provision was put into an appropriation bill directing the Committee on Printing on the part of the Senate to make a temporary arrangement; and the power was confided to the committee on the part of the Senate, not including the House committee, because at that time there would be no Committee on Printing on the part of the House. Under that provision, under that instruction, the Committee on Printing on the part of the Senate made an arrangement with the chief of the old reporting corps to continue the work, at precisely the compensation which had been paid for it before, until we could have time to make a new contract, which we of course preferred to do in consultation with the committee on the part of the House. I notice that there is a bill before us now, sent over by the House, placing the RECORD under the charge of the Committee on Printing of both Houses instead of under the charge of the committee of the Senate alone, which is very proper and very much in accordance with the wishes of the committee on the part of the Senate. We have thought it better to make a contract with one man for reporting the Senate debates and hold him responsible, he employing his assistants. In the House they make a contract with a certain number of reporters, they employing their own assistants, and paying them a fixed salary.

Mr. SHERMAN. Employing this one man, would it not be better to fix a gross sum rather than fix it by a rule which tends to amplify the debates? That is the question.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is very difficult to do that justly; and there is no amplification. There is nothing put in the RECORD that is not said on the floor of the Senate. Undoubtedly, it would be a very great advantage if the RECORD could be edited and the unimportant and irrelevant matter left out; but I would not edit it for $50,000 a year; and, after all, there is a very great advantage in having in an authentic form a complete literal record of everything that is said in both Houses of Congress. There are more than two bushels of chaff to two grains of wheat; but the two grains of wheat are worth finding, and there are times when the light which a discussion throws upon a law is of very great importance. Although I am not very patient of debate, and although I know there is an immense amount in this publication that is entirely useless, still, upon the whole, I think we should make a mistake if we changed the form and reduced it from its present literal completeness.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to say one word for the benefit of the Senator from Rhode Island. The Committee on Appropriations have made this appropriation with reference to the termination of the present arrangement for the compensation of our reporters on the 4th of March next, in the expectation that some arrangement by the proper committee will be made or brought before Congress to provide for the future compensation, which shall be in harmony in both branches; and I desire to invite his attention to that subject.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is ample time for that, and it has been delayed only because there was no provision for placing the work under the charge of both committees; and although I do not wish to violate parliamentary propriety by making any reference to what was said in the other House, yet if there is any jealousy on the part of the House that the whole of this business is in the control of the committee on the part of the Senate, the members have only to remember that at the time that it was put in the control of the committee on the part of the Senate there was no committee on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio withdraws the amendment proposed by him, and the question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed, and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, the title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill making appropriations to pay for reporting the debates and proceedings of Congress."

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FLANAGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 290) changing the present boundaries of the eastern and western judicial districts of Texas; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FLANAGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 291) to create a port of delivery at Jefferson, Texas; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROWNLOW asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 292) for the relief of the trustees of the Tennessee Hospital for the Insane at Nashville, Tennessee; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CROZIER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 293) authorizing the sale of a portion of the Fort Leavenworth military reservation to the Kansas Agricultural and Mechanical Association for fair grounds; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DENNIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 294) for the relief of Thomas Galloway, late captain Company C, First Regiment Maryland Cavalry; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BOREMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 295) for the relief of the trustees of the Methodist Episcopal church at New Creek, West Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 296) to establish a reservation for certain Indians in the Territory of Montana; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and, with papers presented by him, ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 297) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to use certain unexpended balances of appropriations remaining on the books of the Indian Office June 30, 1873; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and, with papers presented by him, ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 298) to increase the pension of Harriet DeWitt Mitchell, invalid daughter of the late General O. M. Mitchell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill(S. No. 299) to establish the Bismarck land district in the Territory of Dakota; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SUMNER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 300) providing for a bust of the late Chief Justice Chase, to be placed in the room of the Supreme Court; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE STATE OF THE NAVY.

Mr. HAMLIN submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was read, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That a committee of four members, two of whom shall be members of the House and two of the Senate, shall be appointed, who shall inquire into the condition of the Navy of the United States, its adaptability to the necessities of the country, the method of enlisting for the Navy, the system pursued at the dock-yards, and report what changes, improvements, and suggestions are necessary to bring it to the highest state of efficiency; and that the report of said committee shall be presented to this Congress at the opening of the second session.

Resolved, That the joint committee to inquire into the state of the Navy can have associated with them two officers of the Navy, either from the active or retired list, not below the rank of commander, to be selected by the Secretary of the Navy, and may request as secretary a captain or commander from the active list of the Navy.

REGENTS OF THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to take up a resolution reported from the Committee on the Library yesterday morning, to supply certain vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution. It was objected to at the time by my friend from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] who has no objection now. This action is necessary at once, because these vacancies exist, and before the board can meet they must be supplied.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 35) filling existing vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

The resolution proposes to fill the existing vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than members of Congress, by the appointment of Asa Gray, of Massachusetts, in place of Louis Agassiz, deceased; of J. D. Dana, of Connecticut, in place of Theodore D. Woolsey; and of Henry Coppée, of Pennsylvania, in place of W. B. Astor; and John Maclean and Peter Parker, whose terms have expired, are reappointed.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair appoints the Senator from California, Mr. SARGENT, to fill the vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution on the part of the Senate.

SPECIE PAYMENTS—THE CURRENCY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business the Senate will resume the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on Finance on the 10th of December last, upon which the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] is entitled to the floor. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it is the duty of Congress, during its present session, to adopt definite measures to redeem the pledge made in the act approved March 18, 1869, entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," as follows: "And the United States also pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin;" and the Committee on Finance is directed to report to the Senate, at as early a day as practicable, such measures as will not only redeem this pledge of the public faith, but will also furnish a currency of uniform value, always redeemable in gold or its equivalent, and so adjusted as to meet the changing wants of trade and commerce.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Before the Senator from New Jersey proceeds, will he yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Mr. President, sharing the public anxiety that the Senate should act upon the question of finance in a manner that shall give tone to financial interests and reanimate the business confidence of the country, I am to that end desirous of stripping every other consideration from the primary one which I think will effectually restore confidence to the country. The increase of currency, in my judgment, is that primary act, and the principal one, which will have in its effect the restoration of confidence by assurance of adequate circulation, and thereby in effect unlocking the currency which is now withheld by individuals and by banks. Not withdrawing, but waiving for the present subsidiary features of the plan which I have had the honor to propose as a remedy for existing evils in our financial affairs, I shall now so far remedy my substitute as to narrow down the question to the moderate increase of currency, and upon that I shall invite a vote of the Senate; and when it shall have expressed itself upon that feature, I shall then offer the others seriatim, that the Senate may on the different features I propose express itself, and thus give its judgment to the country.

I therefore withdraw my former substitute for the resolution, and ask that this may take its place:

Strike out all after the word "Resolved" in the committee's resolution and insert: "That the Committee on Finance is directed to report to the Senate, at as early a day as practicable, such measures as will restore commercial confidence and give stability and elasticity to the circulating medium through a moderate increase of currency."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, while fulfilling my obligation to render what aid I may in solving the important financial problem before us, I shall hold myself free from all advocacy even of the measure which I shall suggest; and I shall hold myself ready to act with unbiased judgment on all worthy propositions in reference to this important question.

In my view the evils resulting from the character of our currency, the many pledges which we have made in reference to it, and the duty that rests upon us growing out of the provision of the Constitution, that we may regulate the value of money, forbid that we longer procrastinate this subject, and demand its present consideration.

Let me premise, that we are not bound now to consider the whole subject of political economy as it affects our financial system. We as a people may have imported too much; we may have lived too luxuriously; we may have exhausted our credit by untimely and extravagant expenditures, even in behalf of imporant and valuable internal improvements; and these causes may have tended to produce our financial disaster; but these are considerations with which we are not now directly dealing. The question that we have to do with is our monetary system, and nothing else.

We must remember, too, that financial credit by no means rests alone on the currency of a country, be it convertible or inconvertible. It rests on property, on capital, on skill, on enterprise, on industry, and on all that gives the ability to keep the promise of payment and that gives the assurance that the promise will be kept. Credit rests on the assurance and the confidence that the promise will be kept. Why, sir, all the mines, mints, machines for printing in the land, pouring out coin and currency continually could not supply a sufficient circulation to transact the business of the country if confidence be banished. With confidence a hundred dollars will pay thousands. Without confidence it will not pay the sum nominated on its face, because it will not circulate but will be hoarded.

The soundness of the currency is one element in creating and preserving this confidence. It is a very important element, and it is the only one with which we have to do. I make this suggestion for the purpose of reminding us that the credit of the country may not be established or business prosperity restored necessarily by any monetary system that we may devise, be it ever so perfect; but we can do much by giving the country a sound currency.

The problem we have before us is this: How shall we establish a proper volume of currency for the business of the country, and how place it and keep it at par, at home and abroad, when measured by the world's index or standard of values, which is gold? I do not say that the world's standard of values should be gold. Perhaps our beautiful greenbacks, our five-twenties or our ten-forties—perhaps that dreamy, undefined thing called "the great wealth of the nation," ought to be the standard of value. I am not theorizing or dealing with ethics, but with facts. The world's standard of value is gold, and every Senator knows it. The question is, how shall we get a proper volume of currency and bring it to the world's standard at home and abroad?

Let me name, though not elaborate, a few pertinent and unquestionable financial truths:

First, the principal use of currency is for the purposes of daily private traffic, and to settle balances. The great bulk of the business of this and other countries is not transacted with currency but by means of book accounts, bonds and mortgages, barter, due-bills, promissory notes, bills of exchange, and checks. Why, sir, the checks of this country pay a hundred times the amount of debts that the currency does. Experience shows that in England checks alone in a given time pay of debts and exchanges one hundred and thirty-five times as much as money.

Then, as currency represents so inconsiderable a portion of the business transactions of the country, it is very clear that our financial prosperity does not depend upon the amount of our currency. Whether our currency were $700,000,000 or $800,000,000 convertible into coin would be a matter of very little importance. If it was the larger sum more business would be transacted in currency; and if the smaller sum it would only discover greater ingenuity in devising means to economize the currency, as we have recently seen in New York. There is a convenient amount of currency necessary for the purposes of daily traffic and to settle balances; but whether that amount be seven hundred millions, or seven hundred and forty millions, or eight hundred millions, convertible into coin, is very immaterial. If the currency be irredeemable paper, mere promises to pay, then of course the more of those promises there are out the farther is it removed from having the essential qualities of money.

I make this suggestion for the purpose of calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that our financial troubles are not to be cured by increasing our currency fifty or sixty millions, and if any one believes so he is cherishing a grave error and a delusion.

Secondly, while little depends within certain limits on the amount of the circulation, everything depends—financial prosperity or adversity depends—upon the character of the currency; and for these reasons: We make the currency of the country the index and standard of values, a standard affecting every one of the millions of transactions which constantly occur. Every contract is based and predicated on the currency. The "dollar" is the essential thing in every contract. Now if that dollar is not an index of values, but is itself subject and subordinate to the true standard of values, gold, so that it rises and falls in value from month to month and week to week, as from various considerations it is more readily or with greater difficulty converted into coin, of course all business transactions and contracts are changing and fluctuating, and these changes discourage and embarrass business and prevent true prosperity. The change in the value of the dollar in which the contract sounds, must be to the injury of one party and to the undue advantage of the other, and the affairs of life thus become a game of chance, which in the long run is disastrous to all.

To illustrate: Suppose in 1860 I sold a lot for $1,000; in 1863, the interest having been paid, the purchaser owes me $1,000 in gold, or owes me $2,800 in currency, because gold in 1863 is worth 280; but the contract is not regulated by the permanent dollar, but by the uncertain and changing dollar, and instead of his owing me in 1863 $1,000 in gold or $2,800 in currency, he owes me $357.14 in gold or $1,000 in currency. This is a strong illustration, but it brings out the effect of a fluctuating currency.

Take another illustration which I saw stated somewhere. A merchant buys an invoice of goods in Europe on four months' time; he brings the goods here and sells them at what he supposes will remunerate him, and gets his pay; but in the mean time gold has risen in value and he meets with a loss, or gold has fallen in value and the purchaser meets with a loss.

This fluctuation has for ten or twelve years embarrassed the business of the country, and unless our currency is brought to a gold basis the difficulty will continue and increase.

It is said, however, that our currency and gold have now so approximated that the same difficulty does not exist. That is only temporarily true. We know that during the continental wars England sent gold to pay her troops and to support them, and the Bank of England was obliged to suspend, and remained suspended for twenty years. During that time there were many periods in which gold and notes very nearly approximated, but yet the bank could not resume. Who will give the assurance that this approximation of gold will continue? The panic has induced people to hoard the currency, and the demand being greater than the supply it has appreciated in value; but it will again depreciate. Remember, gold is not only a standard, not only an inactive index; it is also valuable and necessary for currency. It must be had to pay duties, to pay foreign balances, to pay the interest on our bonds, while at the same time we are excluding it from our circulation because it cannot commingle with our currency. Thus causes are at work to make the supply of gold small, the demand considerable, and the price high; so that the approximation of the price of gold and greenbacks is only temporary. This fluctuation in the currency which we make our standard of values, affecting every contract, will continue to increase unless we come to the true standard, gold.

Thirdly, our currency should not only be divested of this fluctuating nature, but it should have all the characteristics of money, and that all over the world. Our currency performs many of the offices of money; but it is nothing else—no one can gainsay or deny the proposition—it is nothing more than a promise to pay money. And observe—for it seems to me that here is the strongest argument for resumption—our currency derives its chief value from the expectation that its promise will be kept, and that it will be redeemed in coin. Were it settled that one promise was only to be paid by another promise, one piece of paper by another piece of paper in infinite succession, the purchasing power of our currency would constantly become less; the depreciation would create the necessity for a larger volume of currency, and the increased volume produce greater depreciation.

It is said that our currency if permanently inconvertible would still be valuable, because by force of law it has the capacity to pay debts. That is true only in this country, which is only a fractional part of the world's market. And, besides, let it be understood by our want of action that our currency is not to be redeemed, and contracts will be so formed and shaped that they cannot be satisfied by irredeemable and depreciating paper.

It is said again that our currency, though inconvertible into coin, will buy bonds. But the United States must some day stop selling bonds, and irredeemable paper will have no more capacity to purchase bonds of any party other than the Government than to buy any other commodity.

It is said again that our currency is good, though inconvertible, because sustained by the whole wealth of the nation. What is the meaning of the phrase "the whole wealth of the nation?" The bill-holder cannot issue an execution. The wealth of this nation is a matter of no interest to the bill-holder if we sitting here refuse to appropriate any part of this great wealth for his benefit. It is a delusion to suppose that the nation's wealth makes the greenbacks good if we say that we will not pay them. Our currency is valuable because of the expectation that it will be redeemed in coin, and is valuable just as that redemption is near and probable. Let us place and keep our currency at par by making its convertibility into coin not an expectation but a realization.

Our currency, too, is unworthy of the nation, and inadequate to the business of the people, unless it is good everywhere and for every purpose. We are not an isolated people. We have business relations with every part of the world. The advance of civilization, the submarine telegraph, and the ocean steamer, have made of all the nations of the world a republic, of which we are a prominent member. Our business relations extending everywhere, our currency should be good wherever our trade finds its way.

It may be said that, if our legal-tenders were convertible into gold, they would not be received in Europe. Perhaps not; yet that is a subject upon which we have no experience. We have never yet had a currency of the nation readily and surely convertible into coin. The notes of the Bank of England are received in settlements by the merchants of this country, and those notes circulate freely on the continent of Europe. Why, in the rapidly increasing intercourse between this country and Europe, may it not be that the specie-paying notes of the United States will be received there, and we thus profit by the credit?

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend allow an interruption to ask a question?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator speaks about the notes of the Bank of England circulating freely on the continent of Europe. I desire to ask him to what extent that circulation takes place, and if it is not a very rare thing to meet with a note of the Bank of England anywhere on the continent or to meet with a note of the Bank of France in England?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I cannot inform my friend of the amount of the circulation; but I well know the fact that those notes circulate freely, and are the best possible currency that travelers can get who are traveling on the continent of Europe.

Mr. MORTON. That brings me to another point, if my friend will allow me. I ask him if American gold at any time ever circulated in England or anywhere upon the continent of Europe? Was it not shipped simply in bullion?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think that is so, and for reasons not affecting this question.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I do not wish to interrupt at all, but the Senator from New Jersey has stated a point that I should like a little explanation upon; and if it will not embarrass him I should like to interrupt him now.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Just as the Senator pleases. I would prefer that he should wait until I get through; but I am willing to hear him now.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The Senator prefers that I should wait till he concludes, but as my question is in regard to a statement that has just fallen from his lips, I prefer to put it now. He says that this country has had no experience of the convertibility of the issues of the Government, either directly or through its banks. I want to call his attention to the old demand notes, and ask him if, upon the fifty or sixty millions of those, we had not the very experience which he states now that the country has not enjoyed?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not think we ever had a national currency readily convertible into gold. The demand notes were receivable for dues, and that gave them no value abroad. But, be that as it may, one thing is certain, that if our currency was convertible into coin it would afford a suitable and fixed index or standard by which all contracts with other parts of the world could be measured, and it would command readily that circulating medium which would pass everywhere. With such a currency the gold money of the world would flow in and circulate here as in other specie-paying countries, and we should have an increase of circulation without inflation. The large quantities of gold that came to this country a few months since for the purpose of purchasing and moving commodities did not relieve the panic because they did not enter into the circulation, for we have little more gold than diamond circulation. Canada is flooded with silver, but it does not cross the Saint Lawrence, because it cannot commingle with our currency. Our circulation is provincial. Make it cosmopolitan, and the world's monetary currents will visit and enrich us. A quarter of a century ago one of our ablest statesmen said this:

> One of the highest functions of money is to measure values. That is a function which paper cannot perform. The measure of values must itself possess intrinsic value, and must itself be free from sudden or material variations of value. It must have a uniform and a universal value. As well might you attempt to make a measure of lengths out of that which has no length; a measure of weight out of that which has no weight; a measure of quantities out of that which has no capacity to hold any quantity, as to endeavor to make a measure out of that which has no intrinsic value. The precious metals alone can constitute a measure of values; paper money can measure the value of nothing, not even of itself.

Mr. President, it is not only to remove the fluctuating and provincial character of our currency, not only because its chief value results from the uncertain expectation that it will be made convertible, but it is especially because the faith and honor of the nation are pledged to redeem our promises that we are bound to return to specie payments. And, sir, we are bound to do it speedily, because we have the ability to do so, and that, too, without injury to business or to trade, not by a destructive contraction, but by a healthful expansion.

But before coming to the measure of redemption which I shall suggest, let us see if the faith of the nation is not pledged to pay its legal-tenders in coin now.

Here is a legal-tender note. It is the best of our currency. Bank circulation is redeemed by it. It says on its face, "The United States will pay to bearer one dollar." This it says when the United States exacts specie dollars for duties, and renders its bonds marketable by making the interest payable in gold. The one dollar to be paid is a gold dollar; it is something different from the paper on which the promise is written.

It is said "This is true, but no time of payment is fixed, and therefore it is a mistake to suppose the United States in any default." Let me say that a proposition bearing the form of a promise, in which no time of performance is fixed or capable of being fixed, by demand or otherwise, is no promise, but is a deception. One hundred dollars placed at interest, as sure as time rolls on, will pay the $356,000,000. They bear no interest; and the $100 in the cycles of ages will meet the payment. Is that keeping the promise?

But, Mr. President, let us see whether there was no time fixed. By the act of March 18, 1869, the Congress of the United States declared as follows:

> The United States solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin.

The faith of the nation is pledged, not inertly to wait and see if the wonderful resources of the country will not struggle through difficulties and embarrassment, so that at some future day we may fall into specie payments, but the pledge is that we, who are now considering the subject "will make provision for the redemption of the notes in coin." When does the solemn pledge of the nation's faith stipulate that this provision shall be made? It is at the "earliest practicable period." Has that time come? Let us see. The whole volume of legal-tenders is, say, three hundred and fifty-six millions.

Mr. ALLISON. Three hundred and eighty-one millions now.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is three hundred and eighty-one millions now, but I will call it the same as it was before we drew on the reserve. Have we not been able? Has it not been practicable, to keep the solemnly-pledged faith of the nation, not to pay them but to make them convertible into coin? Why, sir, from July 1, 1866, to July 1, 1873, we actually reduced our national debt, not by substituting one security for another, but by final payment, five hundred and seventy millions. Our debt in 1866 was twenty-seven hundred and seventy-three millions, and in 1873 only twenty-two hundred and three millions. To make these legal-tenders convertible into gold, if we could have obtained the gold, would not have cost their face—three hundred and fifty-six millions; not a third of it, as we shall see—would certainly not have cost the five hundred and seventy millions of indebtedness which we have paid off. It would cost the interest on the amount of gold that is necessary to make the legal-tenders convertible into gold.

Has the "earliest practicable period" come for us to begin to redeem the pledge? I think we should have made the effort long ago. Making these notes a legal tender was a proper measure, but it was only proper as an exercise of the war power of the nation. It was proper because "necessity has no law." But for eight years the war has ceased, and necessity has now become subordinate to law, and the tax on the people by this forced loan, since the war, at simple interest, is one hundred and seventy-one millions, if the greenbacks were issued at the time they were authorized to be issued.

But there is something more in this law beside this pledge. The act of 1869 contains a provision to this effect:

> But none of said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall be redeemed or paid before maturity, unless at such time United States notes shall be convertible into coin at the option of the holder, or unless at such time bonds of the United States, bearing a lower rate of interest than the bonds to be redeemed, can be sold at par in coin.

We have not made these notes convertible into gold. It may be said that we have not redeemed or paid our obligations. That is very close sailing. We have bought our obligations and canceled them. While these notes were not convertible into coin, it is very close sailing to say that we have not violated our express faith.

Mr. ALLISON. We have violated it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If it was any other country than the United States I would say, with my friend, that we have violated it.

Sir, the time has come when this exercise of war power should cease and an earnest effort be made to redeem the solemnly-pledged faith of the nation.

And now, Mr. President, what plan should we adopt to render the legal-tenders convertible into gold? In attempting to answer that inquiry I realize that we are entering upon a dangerous sea. It is easier, much easier, to theorize and criticise than to act affirmatively; but I will suggest a measure rather for the purpose of seeing whether our excellent Committee on Finance will not by placing it in its crucible evolve from it gold, than because I imagine that there is not much of alloy in my suggestion.

The Secretary of the Treasury should be authorized to issue bonds of the United States, bearing 6 per cent. interest, payable in United States specie-paying notes, or in gold; and these bonds should be issued in exchange, at not less than par, for gold, from time to time, as the opportunity occurred, or be issued and sold and the proceeds used from time to time in the purchase of gold, such gold to be held in the Treasury until enough was accumulated wherewith to commence the redemption of the outstanding United States notes in specie.

That there be no unnecessary issue of these bonds in obtaining the requisite amount of gold wherewith to commence the redemption, and that a sufficient supply of gold may be continuously in the Treasury, the Secretary should have the right to reissue the redeemed Treasury notes in exchange for coin at par, and for no other purpose, the aggregate amount of such notes which may be outstanding and those which may have been redeemed and held at no time to exceed the amount that shall have been lawfully issued at the date of the passage of the proposed act.

And to put it beyond question that when the redemption is commenced it will not be discontinued, the Secretary should be authorized, in the event of the supply of gold being unequal to the redemption, and in that event only, to redeem the said notes in sums of $1,000 with such of the 6 per cent. bonds as have not been issued.

To this plan (as to any other) plausible, perhaps grave, objections can be urged. Let us briefly consider those objections.

1. The first objection is, that we could not get the gold; that any great accumulation of gold in our Treasury would, to a degree, disturb the finances of the world; that the price of gold would rise, and thus the effort at resumption defeat itself; and that to prevent its flow to us, various devices and hostile legislation would be resorted to by other nations. All this is probably true, if the proposal was to secure this accumulation in a short period of time. And to meet that difficulty the proposed plan avoids fixing any period within which the accumulation shall be made, or the gold purchased, and it fixes no specific time when the redemption shall commence. The proposed act leaves that necessarily to the discretion of the Secretary, who would act in view of the price of gold from time to time, and would avail himself of those products of our own mines, which have never yet constituted a portion of the circulative medium of the world—a product which, I understand, is estimated to amount this year to sixty millions.

We at one time had in our Treasury one hundred millions; and if we had that amount now, with the power in the Secretary to reissue the redeemed notes at par for gold, and in default of gold to redeem with 6 per cent. bonds, we could, without risk of suspension, commence to redeem in coin to-day.

2. The next objection is, that the plan proposed would create a too sudden transition in the modes of business, and would produce a shock injurious to the country. I agree that resumption should not be sudden; and such is not the purpose of the bill. Due notice would be given by the passage of the act that the Government was moving slowly, though irresistibly and inevitably, to the fulfillment of its provisions and to resumption. The act would fix no time when the resumption would commence; that would depend on what success the Secretary had in obtaining the coin on sufficiently favorable terms, and when, in view of the situation of the money market, it was wise to commence the payment of coin; of all which the public, week by week, would have full notice.

Thus the objection as to impossibility of at once obtaining the gold, and the objection that the plan would be a shock to business, are met by having no arbitrary and definite time fixed for resumption, but having taken the firm resolve to redeem, having conferred on the Secretary the power to obtain the means wherewith to redeem, it is left to the Secretary, fully informed as to all the circumstances in his discretion, exercised in full view of the nation, to fix the day to commence resumption.

3. Another objection to the plan is, that combinations would be made to drain the Treasury of the gold, and resumption would be a failure—that it would be followed by suspension.

The one important point in any attempt at resumption, a consideration in importance overshadowing all others, is, that when we commence to redeem, the impossibility of defeat or failure must be apparent. It must come so slowly as to produce no jar, and so inevitably as to disarm opposition. The Secretary of the Treasury should have the power to issue two hundred and twenty-five million of these 6 per cent. bonds. He should have the right to reissue the redeemed United States notes in exchange for coin at par; to avoid possible failure he should have the right to redeem the United States notes in sums of $1,000 with such of the bonds as remained unissued. With such powers and resources, it would be apparent that resumption could not be defeated, when the Secretary, selecting the opportune time, should say the resumption would begin. That time he would select in view of the accumulation of gold he had made, in view of the condition of the money market, and in view of the permanent approximation in value the United States notes had made to gold. The passage of the proposed act, rendering it certain that at some time the United States notes were to be redeemable, would do much to raise their value in the market, and a much less gold reserve in the Treasury would be required for redemption than I would be willing now to state. Perhaps few would agree with me as to the amount.

A perfectly convertible currency is preferred by the people to gold, and if these United States notes were convertible into coin, coin would not be sought after. The banks would exchange their gold for the United States notes, as being a safer and more convenient shape in which to keep their reserve. This would be specie payment by the banks, as they would redeem in notes convertible into gold. It would become a matter of indifference whether the duties and interest on the bonds were paid in notes or gold, and consequently gold would not be in demand. By the reissue of the notes in exchange for coin at par, and by means of the other resources that the Government now possesses, the specie reserve could be maintained. There would be no occasion for issuing the bonds to redeem the greenbacks, thus producing a temporary contraction, as that could be done only when the Treasury was drained of its gold, which event would not occur. The provision for redeeming greenbacks with bonds is a mere reserve force, strengthening the column, but which in fact never would be brought into action. Resumption would not be a failure.

4. There is another objection that may be made, and I hesitate to name it, because should it invoke prejudice it would be less easily disposed of than those objections having some foundation in reason.

It may be said that giving the Secretary of the Treasury the right, after the redemption of the United States notes, to reissue them from time to time in exchange for coin at par, (even under the restriction that the aggregate of those outstanding and those on hand redeemed should not be increased,) would be subject to some of the objections applicable to a national bank. I answer that it would be giving the Secretary a power, incapable of abuse, which would secure to the nation all the benefits, and be free from all the dangers and abuses of a national bank. The dangers of a national bank are, that it affords an opportunity for the existence of a league of opulent capitalists, exercising through the bank an undue influence over the finances of the country; that the bank becomes the depository of large sums, which are subject to be withdrawn at inconvenient times, to the great injury of the national credit; and that the bank, by the power of discount and loan, can exercise a favoritism and influence injurious to a free people with an elective government.

None of these evils can be charged against the power proposed to be conferred on the Secretary of the Treasury, which is simply the authority to reissue United States notes in exchange for coin at par, thus enabling him to keep on hand a sufficient accumulation of coin to preserve and render stable the credit of the nation and of those moneyed institutions which, under our system, are dependent on the Government for the character of their reserve; and thus by rendering the currency of the country strong and steady, render business more healthful and prosperous and lessen the rate of interest the Government must pay on its loans.

The power given the Secretary of the Treasury creates no stockholders, and no institution either of deposit or discount, and this power to reissue the United States notes would be entirely under the control of Congress, and when the payment of specie was sufficiently established, the power could be withdrawn,

Among the reasons given for creating the Bank of England, I find in Francis's History the following:

It was necessary for the sake of a secure paper currency. It was required for he support of national credit. It was desirable as a method of reducing the rates of interest paid by the state—a rate so high that men were induced to take their money out of trade for the sake of securing it, an operation big with mischief.

5. The last objection to this plan of redemption is the expense that it will be to the nation. Let us consider that.

It will cost no premium to procure the gold. The premium on our 6 per cent. bonds in the market is 5 per cent. more than the premium on gold. The syndicate have placed two hundred and ten millions, and including those taken by national banks and the Geneva award, two hundred and eighty-eight millions of our bonds in exchange for gold securities, and those bonds bear only 5 per cent.

Where we have experience we discard theory. The Secretary of the Treasury, by his humoring the market, availing himself of the products of our own mines, and by acting with that deliberation which the avoiding of a jar to the business of the country requires, could with these 6 per cent. bonds accumulate an amount of gold equal to the issue of bonds. There would be no expense for premium. There would be an expenditure equal to the principal and interest of the bonds issued. I submit that it is as dishonest to take that expenditure into the account as for one to refuse to pay an honest debt because by so doing he loses the money that he pays, and the interest on it.

These three hundred and fifty-six millions of legal-tenders are a loan constitutionally imposed on the people in the exercise of the war power. It was a necessary and wise measure. The nation, by its sovereign right, took possession of the houses, horses, provisions, and other property of the people to save its own existence, and it had also a sovereign right to compel the creditor (who otherwise would have received no payment) to take the notes of the United States in payment of his debts, and thus constrain him without injury to himself to contribute to the defense of the nation.

But the issue of these legal-tenders was nevertheless a loan. It was effected under the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, which provides that "Congress shall have power to borrow money on the credit of the United States." It is under this provision of the Constitution that the most approved decisions find the authority for the measure. I do not maintain that the right to continue this forced loan ceased with the war, but I do insist that the right to continue without payment ceases when we become able to pay. And we might with the same propriety object to the payment of any other debt as to object to redeeming these notes because of its being expensive.

The interest on this loan of three hundred and fifty-six millions, if they were issued when authorized, of which I am not accurately informed, for the eight years since the war amounts to one hundred and seventy-one millions. We can afford to begin to be just by taking the initiative for payment. We do not know what amount of these United States notes would be presented for payment. If the measure proposed, or some like measure rendering it certain that the Government had the ability and the purpose to redeem, were adopted, I do not believe that one hundred millions would be presented for payment; and in that case the Government would, without any cost, have the benefit of the balance of one hundred and fifty-six millions of outstanding notes and the interest thereon.

These notes being as good as gold could be used for all the financial purposes of gold. But whether the interest on the amount of bonds to be issued be six millions on one hundred millions, or thirteen millions on two hundred and twenty-five millions, we should exorcise from our breasts the guilty greed which prompts us to retain in our coffers money we have "solemnly pledged the faith of the nation" to pay.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question at that point?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I do not understand whether the Senator's plan of resumption contemplates retaining the greenbacks as a part of the permanent circulation after they have been brought to gold value. Does the Senator contemplate that after the greenbacks shall have been brought to par with gold they shall remain as a part of the permanent circulation of the country?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The plan proposes—I will submit my bill presently—that these greenbacks shall be reissued by the Secretary of the Treasury from time to time, at par, in exchange for coin, so as to keep a sufficient gold reserve on hand, and that the amount of notes that are outstanding and those that are on hand redeemed shall never exceed the amount that are issued at the time of the passage of the act. Of course, when the legal-tenders were out they would be in the circulation.

Mr. President, we are subjecting the nation to a greater loss by neglecting to fulfill its promises than the expenditure required to perform them. We are doing that which neither individual nor nation can afford—impairing credit. Better far the expenditures necessary to its maintenance than the greater sacrifices incident to its decline.

To legislate for the benefit of the business interests of the country is an important duty; but it is not the highest duty. We are trustees for the great governmental corporation known as the United States of America. Its bonds issued to save its existence are scattered over the world. We are responsible that its promises are not dishonored nor its finances bankrupt. In 1881 one hundred and sixty millions, and in 1882 two hundred and sixty millions, of these bonds fall due. Many temporary loans are constantly becoming payable, and in the not distant future hundreds of millions mature. These bonds are payable in coin, and the payment can only be effected by our making new loans. We are and must continue to be in the market as borrowers. If we neglect to provide for the payment of the United States notes now, after eight years have passed since the war, we impair that assurance of payment which constitutes the highest attribute of value in the securities we must sell. The doubt, "Will it be paid as agreed?" the capitalist will see stamped on and depreciating every obligation. The recent placing of bonds by the syndicate does not militate against this view, for we had not then, under the favorable circumstances in which we are now placed, determined that we would make no provision for the payment of our outstanding notes; and had our credit been what it should be, had it been at par, 4 instead of 5 per cent. would have commanded the market. And further, if we continue our present provincial and local currency, (excluding, by its want of homogeneousness, the circulation of the world with its healthful expansion,) whether we should or should not, we will have an increase of the volume of irredeemable paper.

Under the plea that our obligations are sustained by the vast wealth of a gigantic nation—when the holder of our securities cannot reach a blade of grass or single plank of our wealth without our positive action conferring it upon him, which action we withhold; under this plea of national wealth—we will have promise added to promise in infinite succession; we will have prices enhanced, speculation rife, and our currency constantly removing farther and farther from the world's standard of values, and the expedient to meet the feverish craving of business will be currency, currency, more currency. And thus the day will come when we must pay much higher rates of interest to place our securities, and then the capitalist, tempted by the high interest Government securities afford, will withdraw his capital from the uncertain investments of industry, so that one class will toil to be taxed, and another, in inert security, will enjoy and hoard the fruits of such labor. And if this system of paper expansion is insisted on, the day will inevitably come when, no matter at what sacrifice, we must either abandon this policy of substituting promises for performance or we must face the possible bankruptcy of the Government.

Why, sir, the interest that we would be called upon to pay on the accumulated gold requisite to make resumption a certainty is inappreciable, when contrasted with the pecuniary loss which must follow when we break the bonds of national faith and drift away into the wild sea of inflation.

All other plans of resumption than some such as I have suggested will, in my opinion, create a monetary stringency injurious to the industries of the country, because all other plans seek the contraction of the currency so as to bring it within the compass of a small gold reserve. This plan, on the contrary, produces expansion. The currency will substantially be left as it is; and in addition thereto we will introduce into our circulation the general gold circulation of the world. This is the expansion we want. Can we not afford to pay the interest on the gold accumulation for the purpose of keeping our faith, preserving our credit, and securing a safe and self-adjusting currency? We cannot afford not to pay it.

This plan is in no way inconsistent with other plans to the same end. This would constitute the backbone of all measures to bring us to specie payments; it will do it alone; but it is perfectly consistent with the doctrine of free banking, and it puts the country in a better condition to carry more currency. I do not say, however, that even with this plan adopted I am in favor of free banking or more currency. We could bear both better with than without the resumption proposed.

Let, then, the resolute determination be made to pay the United States notes in coin, and we will have a currency affording a stable standard, by which our multitudinous business transactions will be measured; a currency which, by reason of its high credit or ready convertibility into gold, will aid in placing our trade and commerce on an equality with other nations; a currency which will commingle with the money circulation of the world, and thus permit our country to profit by the superior attractions it presents to capital; a currency which will expand with the demands of our industries, without that treacherous inflation which is sure to collapse, most untimely, under the strain of enterprise; a currency, too, which, by ever evincing our good faith, will place at par everywhere not only our moneyed securities, but our national honor.

Mr. President, I now ask leave, without previous notice, to introduce a bill.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 301) to secure the resumption of specie payments without contracting the currency; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SCHURZ obtained the floor.

REDUCTION OF SALARIES OF ARMY AND NAVY.

Mr. GORDON. If the Senator from Missouri will allow me one moment, I simply wish to introduce a resolution and have it printed. It lies on the desk, and I ask that it be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment be, and it is hereby, instructed to report a bill to reduce, as far as the same may be reduced with due regard to economy and with reference to the salaries of civil officers, and as far as may be consistent with the efficiency of the service, the salaries of all officers of the Army and Navy whose salaries and allowances exceed $5,000 per annum.

Mr. GORDON. I move that the resolution lie on the table and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

DEATH OF MESSRS. BROOKS AND FOSTER.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, communicated to the Senate intelligence of the death of Hon. JAMES BROOKS, late a member of the House from the State of New York, and of the death of Hon. WILDER D. FOSTER, late a member of the House from the State of Michigan, and transmitted the resolutions adopted by the House of Representatives on the announcement of the death of each.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SCHURZ. I understand from the Senator from New York that he desires to take up the resolutions just received from the House of Representatives. He asks me to yield, and I am willing to do so with the understanding that I shall have the floor upon the resolution of the Committee on Finance to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the resolutions of the House are called up, I desire to state that I shall be compelled to be absent to-morrow. I am sorry that I shall not be able to be present, but I hope that the order now pending will be continued and disposed of as soon as possible. The Senator from Missouri has the floor, I believe, upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri will be entitled to the floor when the resolution of the Senator from Ohio shall be again taken up.

Mr. FENTON. I ask that the resolution of the House of Representatives announcing the death of Hon. JAMES BROOKS be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That this House has heard with deep regret the death of Hon. JAMES BROOKS, a member of this House from the city of New York.

Resolved, That as a testimony of respect to the memory of this distinguished statesman the officers and members of this House will wear the usual badge of mourning for the space of thirty days.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted by the Clerk to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That these proceedings be communicated to the Senate.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. President, if we could transfer the tributes to the memory of Mr. BROOKS uttered by his associates in the House of Representatives from the city of New York to the records of the Senate, nothing more would be required by the highest civilization and sorrow. At least I cannot in terms so fitting speak of the early promise, the life of industry, the domestic virtues, the intellectual triumphs, and the noble patriotism of the distinguished dead.

At an early period, almost in his youth, his discernment and happy use of the pen challenged favorable attention, and from that on to the close of life his course led up to the heights of usefulness and knowledge. His success as a journalist and his eminence as a popular speaker were fully equaled by his mastery and presentation of public questions in the halls of legislation. His learning and experience served to supply his graceful pen and to give beauty and persuasiveness to the eloquence of his tongue.

But the scenes of these efforts and these triumphs, which already occupy an honorable place in the history of the period, are now closed. He comes not back to the Hall in yonder wing of the Capitol; he returns no more to editorial labors; he cannot indulge in the flights of oratory or in careful research; nor can he again enjoy the dear intercourse with family and friends which he so prized.

I know these customary tributes of Congress to the memory of departed members afford no benefit to the dead; but they serve to dignify the living and lead to profitable reflection. We are brought to see in these events of Providence the grand comparison between the strifes of politics, the honors of public station, and the achievements which are temporary on the one hand, and the endless and marvelous scenes of eternity—the life of immortality—on the other. To my mind the former are a failure, the chaff that scatters before the wind when they are unregulated by the hope of that enduring reward which lies beyond the grave. The rivalries for public honors and the ambitious aims of men, when fastened to this hope, are indeed worthy and tend to elevate and adorn our common humanity.

On an occasion like this I will not attempt to offer words of solace to those who occupy the chamber of private mourning; but I may be allowed to point the young men of my State to the industry, the perseverance, and the ability which enabled our departed friend to ascend high on the pathway of usefulness and honor, while I invoke the beneficence of his aspirations upon us all.

Mr. President, I offer the following resolutions for the action of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Senate receives with sincere regret the announcement of the death of Hon. JAMES BROOKS, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of New York, and tenders to the family and relatives of the deceased the assurance of sympathy with them under the bereavement they have been called to sustain.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to transmit to the family of Mr. BROOKS a certified copy of the foregoing resolution.

Resolved, That in further token of respect for the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I ask for the reading of the resolutions of the House of Representatives in regard to the death of Mr. FOSTER.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That this House has heard with deep regret the announcement of the death of Hon. WILDER D. FOSTER, late a member of this House from the State of Michigan.

Resolved, That as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, the members and officers of this House wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House transmit a copy of the foregoing resolutions to the widow of the deceased.

Resolved, As a further mark of respect, that this House do now adjourn.

Resolved, That these proceedings be communicated to the Senate.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Mr. President, the message of the House announces to the Senate the sad fact that still another member of Congress has departed life. In a special manner do I feel the force of this event. My immediate successor in the body sitting in the other wing of the Capitol, and a personal friend, the ties sundered forever leave sorrowful associations.

At the last session, Hon. WILDER D. FOSTER, representing the fifth congressional district of Michigan, filled his seat, attentive as ever to the duties which he always discharged with notable fidelity. With rooms at the same house, sharing the same table, and often conferring upon public interests kindred in local respects, a mutual regard and trust grew up, which, ripening into attached friendship, make this occasion to me the more sad and mournful.

Residing in cities but thirty miles apart, my personal acquaintance with the deceased dates back over a score of years. Learning his character in a more private way, and earlier impressions strengthening by later public contact, he had grown into my esteem by the force of his solid virtues. The first impression an acquaintance with him made was that of a manhood built upon faith in self and a simple-hearted trust in the living world surrounding him.

Born in the State of New York, Mr. FOSTER removed to Michigan in 1837, and took up his residence in Grand Rapids in 1838. With loss of the early advantages of the more favored, he commenced his fortune with a common-school education, an honest heart, resolute purpose, and the practical maxim that he is helped who helps himself. Of a business bent and mechanical turn, he apprenticed himself to the manufacture of and traffic in hardware. His industry and love of truth won him the confidence of his youthful city. Elected municipal treasurer, alderman, and repeatedly mayor, a broader district sent him to his State senate; then, at the occurrence of a vacancy in his congressional district, elected him, in 1871, to the Forty-second, and re-elected him, by increased majority, to the Forty-third Congress.

Having proven his capacity as a practical man by rising to the proprietorship of a leading mercantile house, passing through financial crises with no reproach upon his integrity and credit, he seemed a fit selection to illustrate like practical energy in a wider representative sphere. Modest in his estimate of self, he accepted with hesitation, but rarely sought, office. In the narrower labors in his State, in private walks and public trust, he won esteem for his virtues; was trusted for his integrity, respected for his modesty, honored for his charity, and beloved for his amiability and generosity. These formed the granite of his structure.

Availing myself of the privilege of attendance at his burial, I read in the throng of all classes present, from the most influential to the humblest, a reflex of his life in that living tribute at his grave. One incident illustrative, I may be suffered to mention, which speaks of his generous nobility. When from home during his last illness, seeking restoration, his affairs directed more immediately by others, one of his veteran employés wrote him that he was fearful of being pushed aside to make place for one more active; and the prompt reply came back, "As long as I do business you shall have place, if it is only a chair to sit in to draw your salary."

Dying in his fifty-fifth year, in the vigor of his powers, his loss, in the city of his pride and the State he honored, is widely felt. All who knew him mourn, for a good man has fallen. He will be missed most in the broad avenue of hearts his good deeds have so often touched. Many an obscure and humble one, made glad by his unpretentious bounty, will feel the loss of this touch.

A private life pursued with such considerate regard for others, and with a zeal and fidelity which gave him fame at home, was the key to unstinted trust in his integrity while filling official relation in the councils of the nation. Painstaking and matter of fact in his service, seldom seeking the floor, he was found vigilant at his seat and a worker in committee.

The wants of his constituents he regarded with a concern next to his personal interests; his State was his pride, and to serve his country the goal of his ambition. His sense of justice and charitable nature made him conservative in his views, which often led him to exculpate rather than excoriate political opponents.

Never an ultra partisan, he recognized in the most catholic spirit the brotherhood of man, and sought by example to inspire in others the mutual respect which an honest purpose, under whatever garb embodied, has a right to demand of a fellow-being.

Living as best he could near to a high resolve, he aimed in his life to realize the fact that whatever man does in thought or deed modifies, for weal or woe, the public conscience, and to the measure of ability must by a just tribunal be held responsible. Such an ideal of personal responsibility will carry to the individual conscience the burden of its part of the public faith.

It was not surprising, therefore, to those who knew him best that, howsoever his judgment might be questioned upon issues of public policy or private measures, his career would not unfold an act to impugn the purity of his motives. This characteristic of my friend is worthy of emulation, and any character thus made up stands, as his did, an impregnable rock in tides of crimination and recrimination.

To add more, Mr. President, would be trenching upon the proprieties of a sad memorial. Unhappily for all, his life is ended. To soothe the anguish of family bereavement is far from me to attempt. To speak to the ear of friends would only disappoint their estimate of his loss.

His State already writes him true to her trust. His country marks his fervid patriotism. His Maker, we believe, seals him "faithful servant."

The life is gone, but not the example. Its fragrance, like breath of flowers caught by rugged way-side, quickens the dawn of days, when more of public men and measures shall share the ennobling traits of life and acts, exemplified by WILDER D. FOSTER.

Mr. President, I ask for the adoption of the following resolutions, which I offer:

Resolved, That the Senate has received with sincere regret the announcement of the death of Hon. WILDER D. FOSTER, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Michigan, and that it tenders to the family of the deceased the assurance of its sympathy under the bereavement they have been called to sustain.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to transmit to the family of Mr. FOSTER a certified copy of the foregoing resolution.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect for the memory of Mr. FOSTER the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit to the Senate the question on the two series of resolutions together.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and (at two o'clock and twenty-six minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 13, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EDUCATIONAL FUND.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at seventeen minutes past twelve o'clock, and the House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 477) to establish an educational fund, and to apply the proceeds of the public lands to the education of the people. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MONROE. I yield the floor for a few minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. DAWES. When this bill was before the House at the last session I gave it my hearty support. I hailed it as a measure calculated, however there might possibly be defects in detail, as meeting a new and pressing exigency upon the Government that we could not ignore and must in some way provide for. I have never been able to divest myself of the conviction that when the Government entered into the local administration of affairs in this country, by undertaking itself to prescribe qualifications of suffrage and limitations upon local administration, it took upon itself a correlative duty and obligation; that it was not at liberty to impose upon the States limitations upon the right of suffrage, and then to withhold from them anything that was in its power to make those limitations safe to the States and to the nation; and that therefore, so far as it was in the power of the General Government, it was its bounden duty, if it declared to the States that no longer should it be in their power to say who in their local administrations should discharge the duties of the elective franchise, to see that, as regarded the exercise of that franchise, it should be made as safe as possible. I could not shut my eyes to the dangers which came along with these amendments to the Constitution, and therefore I hailed and gave my feeble support to this measure at the last session as doing something toward furnishing safe guards to those all-important amendments of the Constitution.

I am, sir, now, and for the same reasons, in favor of this measure. I believe that sooner or later the Government must address itself in good earnest to these duties which I have already indicated; and so far as we have been able to devise methods, this is the first, and it seems to me a wise provision.

But, sir, in the support of this measure to-day I find myself embarrassed. It comes before the House at a time and under circumstances quite different from those under which it came before the House at the last session. Then there was every reason to suppose that the receipts and expenditures of this Government bore such a relation to each other that this measure could be adopted without serious embarrassment to the Government. Now, sir, I find myself in quite a different position. I find the Government of the United States in its resources, as compared with the expenditures, if I may use the expression, straitened. I find the executive branch of this Government in such a condition at the present time as to make necessary a demand for increased taxation. Then, sir, the House of Representatives yesterday by three very significant votes, each of them by a very striking majority, declared, first, that they would not meet these exigencies of the Government by increased taxation; then, by an equally significant and even more striking majority, they declared that they would not meet them by borrowing money; and then again, by another striking majority, they declared that they would not meet them either by taxation or borrowing money. Therefore, sir, with the Administration of this Government declaring to us that there is a deficit that demands to-day several millions of dollars from one source or another, and this House of Representatives having by these three distinct votes declared that there is but one way left for us to meet the condition of the Treasury, and that is to cut down our expenditures until they meet our receipts, I am forced to the conclusion that this is not the right time to pass this measure. I hold, sir, that the Government of the United States, like individuals, is bound to cut its coat according to its cloth; that it is no more justified than is an individual in borrowing money to pay its current expenses; and I do not think that we are at liberty in time of peace to impose new taxes except by necessity. Therefore, sir, I am compelled to adopt this line, that I will not give my support at this time to any measure that does not fall within the line of absolute necessity. The policy that I propose to pursue in regard to our expenditures is to keep them at the present time down to the line of the absolute necessities of this Government; and however heartily I should give my approval to the measure before the House under ordinary circumstances, if the friends of this bill should press it to a vote to-day I should be compelled, according to this rule, to vote against it.

But, sir, I feel encouragements in reference to the receipts of this Government which perhaps are not indulged in by every member of the House, and which govern me in relation to the expenditures of the Government. I look forward to an early day, when, with economy, and retrenchment, and the improvement in our receipts consequent upon the revival of industry, enterprise, and prosperity throughout the land, the receipts and expenditures of the Government will come together; that is to say, that the receipts of the Government will meet its expenditures. With this confidence with reference to our finances, I hope before this session shall close to see such a condition of things as would justify me, even by the rule I have here laid down, in giving my ultimate support to this bill.

Sir, in the interest of the bill itself and of the cause it is intended to establish, I entreat the gentlemen having charge of the measure to themselves, of their own motion, postpone the further consideration of this bill to some day in the future of this session when we shall be able to make such an exhibit of our receipts and expenditures as will justify its support. I say this in the interest of the measure itself, as well as in the interest of the Government of the United States and its Treasury. Sir, the gentlemen who have special charge of this bill have a right to feel that they are promoting the best interests of this country; but I commend to them the idea that they jeopardize a great and good measure by pressing it at this time. I do not ask them to withdraw their bill altogether, but I do ask them, in view of the present exigency, to postpone it until such time in the future as we have reason to expect we can show such a condition of things that we can justify ourselves in giving it our support.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I ask leave of the gentleman to make a suggestion. I trust that as the committee have announced, both publicly and privately, that they propose to recommit this bill, they will listen to the appeal that the gentleman from Massachusetts has made to them looking in that direction.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, the committee who reported this bill cannot be blind to the force of the appeal made by my colleague, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. A class of objections has been made to the bill in this debate by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] and by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] which I am sure, although I know they prevail largely in the West, are based upon the want of a careful understanding of the provisions of the bill.

This subject has been before the House twice already. It has encountered in the debate the same arguments this time that were urged before. No arguments have yet been presented to show that gentlemen opposing the bill have fully examined the statistics upon the subject or read carefully the provisions of the bill itself.

But this appeal from the representative of the Committee on Ways and Means of this House is one that cannot be disregarded. We have no right to stand by his side and say we propose to obey the resolutions of the House passed on yesterday in regard to every other matter involving the expenditure of money, and to except from their operation the particular bill which we have in charge. Therefore I am prepared to accede to his request, and to move that the House postpone the further consideration of this bill until the fourth Tuesday in March, after the morning hour, so that it may be taken up in the morning hour and not stand longer in the way of committees. Before doing so, however, I will first yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PHILLIPS] for ten minutes.

NATIONALITY OF MERCHANT VESSELS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. With the consent of the gentleman from Kansas I ask permission to submit a resolution, to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee of the House be directed to inquire and report whether, under existing laws, the courts of the United States have adequate jurisdiction and authority to prevent and punish the improper use of the flag and national character of the United States on board merchant vessels upon the high seas and in foreign ports; and, furthermore, to inquire and report if any, and if so what, additional legislation by Congress is expedient or necessary to punish persons who fraudulently obtain or illegally use marine documents creating vessels of the United States, and to punish officers of the Government who carelessly and corruptly issue such documents; and also to inquire and report if any, and what, legislation is needed to enable military, naval, or consular officers of this Government to seize, on the high seas or in foreign ports, vessels illegally assuming the American national character, and to send them within a judicial district for adjudication.

The SPEAKER. This requires unanimous consent.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object. This manifestly belongs to the Committee on Commerce, and I must certainly object to its going to any other committee.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I cannot discuss that question now, in the time of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. PHILLIPS.] I will, therefore, withdraw the resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will withdraw my objection to the introduction of the resolution, and move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw the resolution.

EDUCATION FUND.

The House resumed the consideration of the educational-fund bill.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the gentleman has moved to postpone action on this bill. It necessarily conflicts with measures of land reform that will come before this House and that are before the committees, and I should prefer to dispose of it at once.

It is with profound regret I rise to oppose a measure which the learned and accomplished gentleman from Massachusetts, who has charge of the bill, has prepared with such labor and defended with such eloquence. His long, able, and consistent career as a champion of philanthropic and progressive measures, enables him to bring to the bill now before the House a great weight, and one to which it otherwise would not be entitled. I think I can comprehend the spirit which animates him, and other gentlemen with him; and its honesty and sincerity I admire and respect.

But, sir, it has been the misfortune of a small portion of the legislation of the past few years that its enthusiastic defenders mistook theories for statesmanship and earnest convictions for fact. Looking at the grand work which has regenerated American politics, fired with a laudable ambition to contribute something new to the work, inspired with a generous emotion, each new proposition was thrust on the country by its advocates as if it was a part of the great republican work that has dignified the history of the country for the past twelve years. And thus it has happened that many shooting and falling stars have crept into that grand constellation, and many outlandish barnacles been fastened to the bottom of the grand old ship.

And yet I have occasion to thank the gentleman from Massachusetts that he has not attempted to find support for this as a party measure or to dragoon this House. His candor and sense of justice led us naturally to expect this. It is one step in advance of the accidents which have environed us, and the course he has pursued I honor, because he has used no argument or effort save those which in his judgment might commend it to the discretion of this House.

In the brief remarks I propose to make, I shall confine myself chiefly to that phase of the question which deeply and vitally affects the constituency I have the honor to represent on this floor. The measure proposes in substance forever to devote the proceeds of Government lands for the purposes of education through the most ignorant portions of the United States. Now, sir, I yield to no man on this floor in devotion to the cause which urges intellectual and moral culture and the higher development of our people. I profoundly sympathize with the ignorant and darkened portions, although I do not presume to say which they are; nor does the gentleman's bill. Neither does it contain the requisite machinery to determine a question so delicate. We have "Old Probabilities" to measure the prospects of the weather; we have gas meters to measure the quantity of gas which flows in a certain direction; Providence has set the nose over the mouth, as a sort of alcoholimeter, to determine and expose the amount of strong fluids that pass beneath it; but what board of education or public works will have the ability to ascertain and the hardiness to publish the communities most entitled to the moneys flowing from the provisions of this bill.

The gentlemen defending the measure have claimed that this bill interferes with nothing; that it leaves the pre-emption and homestead laws intact; that it interferes with no new legislation; that it only takes moneys formerly derived from public lands and applies them as a school fund in the way specified. In taking this position I believe the gentlemen are honest; in expressing it, I am sure they are candid; I feel equally sure that they are mistaken.

On the American land question the public mind is deeply stirred; and the settlers, who are, after all, the interested parties, are determined on reform. An indignant protest has gone up against permitting the lands to go into the hands of corporations and speculators, great or small. The public lands left have little or no value save that which the labor of the settler gives them. That this value should not be taxed to sustain other interests, is demanded. And while these demands are being made, while the few good steps already taken are sought to be blended with better ones still to be taken, while the Committee on the Public Lands is engaged in preparing measures to properly dispose of the public domain, this bill comes in from the Committee on Education and Labor to settle the question effectively and ruinously, and to bar the avenues to land reform forever. Do not tell me that legislation hereafter may do what it pleases. Pass this bill, and you create a great interest, which will forever fight all questions of land reform, and which will be here, whenever a bill is pending to aid the struggling settlers, to argue that all lands are consecrated to education, and the ghost of religion and morals will be conjured up to make this bill a finality, and to seal and foreclose all the blunders of American land legislation.

The American land system, if anything so incongruous and absurd is worthy of the name, has been a chapter of accidents. The settlement of its lands is the one thing that has underlain the civilization and development of the whole North American continent. On this its politics, its progress, and its civilization rested. This was the pillar of its wealth and the pillar of its Government. Under such circumstances we are amazed at the manner in which the subject has been treated. It began in cupidity and ended in a compromise between cupidity and the fear of popular wrath. On the land question our governments, colonial and State, have never been overly wise and never overly virtuous. Individuals speculated in land, and States speculated in land. Everybody pretended to the right of disposing of it. Indian chiefs sold it for beads and blankets, the European governments sold it when they could find a purchaser, the Popes bestowed it on the faithful in Europe, the colonial governments sold it, the States sold it, and lastly the United States assumed a monopoly of the business, as if huckstering in land was one of its legitimate functions.

In early colonial days a Virginian named Henderson wandered across the Blue Ridge, and bought, or pretended to buy, from some Indians a large portion of what is now Kentucky. The colonial Legislature of Virginia took cognizance of the fact. They declared that the sale was good as far as the Indians were concerned, but bad so far as Henderson was concerned; and then, having allotted Henderson a small portion of his purchase on the ground that what they gave him was worth more than he gave for the whole, proceeded to dispose of the remainder by an act unparalleled even in legislative impudence.

From these and other modes of selling and granting, great and small, we come down step by step to the pre-emption of 1841 and the homestead law. Then we had gigantic grants to railroads. They, with all their faults, had some advantages. The theory was that the increased value of the soil should be used in its development. The internal improvements of Illinois developed that State. Where railroads are built through countries where there are no navigable streams they render its occupancy possible. The great blunder was that the Government parted with its title to these lands, and left corporations to speculate in them and make the hardest terms with the settler.

Now, what gives value to these lands? Go out on the plains, beyond the present settlements, and it is worth nothing. To-day, in the market of the world, it is not worth the parchment on which a deed of conveyance would be written. It derives almost its sole value from the labor of the pioneer, and this has been taxed just long enough. I do not doubt but the gentleman thinks so, but he propose taxing the settlers on their lands nevertheless.

The present popular movement against land monopoly is a just one. The people have groaned against the public domain going into the hands of great corporations. They have protested against all land speculation. In the present temper of the public mind these cannot be brought here. But we have the picture of a pedagogue, with a birch in one hand and a barefooted negro boy in the other—the last of all the land-grabbers.

I think it high time that the land question be considered apart from all such propositions. It is the foundation-stone of American politics. The time is surely coming when the hardy pioneers will no longer be asked to develop the country and maintain outside benevolence. I would a thousand times rather vote money from the Treasury. The last thing Congress should part with is the public domain.

I say there is a system of reform demanded, which shall sanctify to those people the right of occupancy, the right of improvement with respect to the lands to which they give value by their toil. I am sure that in asking to tax those lands for such a purpose as this bill contemplates, the framers of this bill have fallen into an error.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Let me ask the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. PHILLIPS] whether he finds in this bill anything proposing to tax those lands in any form or manner?

Mr. PHILLIPS. The bill proposes in effect a tax upon the energy of the settlers. The only value that those lands have is what the settlers give them; and the gentleman proposes to tax them for the support of schools in the Southern States.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I beg to inform the gentleman that there is no such thing in this bill; there is no such proposition pending before the House.

EDUCATION—MIXED SCHOOLS—ECONOMY.

From the time when rulers were thought demi-gods, there has been a gradual decline in men's estimates of their power. This decline is still in progress, and has still far to go. All superstitions die hard; and we fear that this belief in government omnipotence will form no exception.—Herbert Spencer's Essays, page 106.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill for several reasons: first, on economic grounds; secondly, because I am opposed to the enactment by Congress of the civil-rights bill as reported and recommitted; thirdly, because the bill itself augments Federal power, is unjust in the distribution of the funds, and is a part of a pernicious system of "over-legislation."

First, as to economy. Whether we stop prodigal expenditure or husband legitimate resources, it is alike wise; in fact, it is necessary in this emergency of the Treasury. I have before me the President's message. Last year, he says that there were 1,626,266 acres of public lands sold for cash. This was some 300,000 more than the year before. By the Land-Office Report of October 20, 1873, it appears that there were gross cash receipts, under various heads for lands sold, for the year ending June 30, 1873, amounting to $3,408,515.50. Under this head are certain scrip not strictly cash. These are to be deducted, together with the expenses of sale. The appropriation for land sales ending June 30, 1873, was $772,000.

Without being too nice, therefore, I may take the calculation of the gentleman who reports the bill, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] and reckon the proceeds of the lands for each year as from one to two millions net cash, the mean being one million and a half. Of this, under the bill, for five years the more illiterate sections, as where the negroes predominate, will get the most in proportion. New York gets $63,429.54, on a basis of one million and a half, being nearly sixty cents per capita of her illiterate school children, these children, of ten years and over, numbering in New York 239,271 in a population of 4,382,759; while the next State on the list—North Carolina—gets nearly twice as much money ($105,425.63) because she has more illiteracy, or 397,690 children of ten years and over in a population of 1,071,361. If these figures are inducement enough for North Carolina and other States to vote for this bill and "mixed schools," they are not inducement enough for one member from New York, at least, to divert one million and a half at this time from an imperiled Treasury. I say nothing now of the imminent disturbance it will bring upon the most admirable school system of the United States.

I am sure my colleague [Mr. MELLISH] who favored the civil-rights bill and its mixed-school system, in his speech of Saturday, could not have been aware of the public sentiment of the city of New York or of his own district. Why should he urge such imprudent legislation? The little thus donated to New York for education, in the present condition of the Treasury and country, while it would not be a great boon to our community or State, when inexorable economy is demanded should not be diverted for any purpose, however laudable.

The public lands belong to all. I suppose that they should be regarded in equity as property the proceeds of which are to be held in trust for extinguishing Indian titles and furnishing Indian annuities. That matters little? It matters much that taxes should be reduced, rather than reimposed as threatened; that no more debt should be created, even if no more debt is canceled. The very existence of society, in these days of disaffected farmers and unemployed workingmen—at least its harmony and peace—depends on a better system of economy.

It is not my purpose at this time to argue elaborately for economy. I know how combinations are made for prodigality under the shrieks of locality. Last year, how fruitlessly I contended against the reckless appropriations for the improvement of dried-up creeks and little local rivers! I know how hard it is, even for the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, [Mr. DAWES,] to vote against this bill of his colleague. But he must do it. If he does not, woe to that emphasis which he expects to wield when we come to close quarters on tax and appropriation bills.

Our resolution of December 15, calling on the Departments to reduce their estimates, has been answered. The replies are not such as to cheer us; but they fix responsibility on Congress for retrenchment.

The revenue required for the fiscal year of 1873–'74 will amount, at least, to $315,000,000. The Secretary of the Treasury's estimate is $319,198,736. The receipts for the first quarter of this year are $81,853,492. The estimated receipts for the other three quarters are $187,100,000. In any calculation there will be an expenditure in excess of income of $40,000,000. The illegal use of the forty-four million reserve will soon be ended by its consumption. We have to tax, or borrow, or else break. Congress must retrench or be condemned.

The question arises, why is it that a country like ours, so affluent in natural wealth and so rich in accumulated resources, should present such an exhibit of impoverishment and panic in business, labor, and government? Have we not plenty of land? Is it not full of iron, coal, gold, silver, copper? Have we not communications in abundance from inland to sea-board? Is not its surface fat and laughing with profusion? Do we not more than double the cereal product of all Europe? When were crops better?* When was labor more skilled, willing, and effective? When were there more accretions by immigration to our capital and muscle? Why does commerce languish, labor despair, and agriculture grumble? Why is our currency but a paper substitute, not even having the advantage of clipped or sweated coin as a standard?

To these queries there is but one reply—bad administration. All science, especially the science of politics and economy, is prevision. Has there been prevision? Where has there been any foresight to achieve the good and avoid the bad? Are we not late in applying the remedy? Or have we as yet found any remedy?

The party with whom I act are not responsible for the late panic or the present embarrassment. It is not our fault that instead of paying off the debt at one hundred millions a year it is growing at that rate, showing a loss of two hundred millions in resources. It is not our fault if the administration of this city and country has its—

> Rings of rogues that rob the luckless town,
> Those evil angels creeping up and down
> The Jacob's ladder of the Treasury stairs;
> Not stage, but real Turpins and Macaires.

It is, however, the fault of Congress that appropriations have been so lavish. The expenditures of 1860-'61, which included the first four months of Mr. Lincoln's administration, omitting pensions and interest, were less by $94,653,678.98 than they are now. Allowing for the increase of population in ten years, the expenses rose 150 per cent. compared with 22 per cent. only for population—or seven to one. Whence this ruinous excess? In the Army? Yes. The expenses there are doubled. The Indian business? Yes. With fewer red men by one-half, the cost is more than doubled. The premium paid for the purchased debt in advance of its maturity in 1870, 1871, 1872, and 1873, is nearly forty millions; yet this House, years ago, on my motion, passed a resolution condemning that policy.

But, sir, upon a bill of this nature, in which I only propose to reserve our resources, an exhaustive debate on economy is not so pertinent. Yet we should begin the work at once and here on this bill. Let the knife reach everywhere. Let it reach all useless leeches who hang upon the Government. Cut down exorbitant salaries! Let your pruning ramify to every department of the service!

I well remember that in 1857, when embarrassments like the present threatened Mr. Buchanan's administration, orders were at once issued to all the Departments and Bureaus to cut down unsparingly. It was done. It can be done again. We have a right to make this demand. It is in the interest of the workingmen of all classes, especially in the large cities. I can demonstrate that, on twelve necessary articles for a family of four, for twelve months, the increase of price from 1860 to 1873 is 92 per cent.; the increase in wages in New York City for workmen in eight different mechanical occupations is 60 per cent.; but the average increase days' labor to earn these twelve necessaries is 19½ per cent. The average purchasing power of labor has decreased 19½ per cent. For the tables from which I deduce these figures I am indebted to Mr. J. S. Moore, whose letter of May 27, 1873, to Hon. D. A. Wells I have before me. They are authentic—from official sources. The articles are beef, mutton, corned beef, butter, rice, milk, coffee, tea, sugar, molasses, coal, and rent. They are not directly influenced by the tariff. If the calculation included clothing, blankets, furniture, boots and shoes, spirits, tobacco, &c., another and a worse exhibit would appear. I add the tables to my remarks:

TABLE A.—Showing the annual consumption of twelve commodities by a family consisting of two adults and two children, and the cost of the same in 1860 and 1873, respectively, in the city of New York.

Article.	Quantity used during twelve months.	Price in 1860.	Amount of money expended in 1860.	Price in 1873.	Am't of money expended in 1873.
Fresh beef	250 lbs.	$0 10½ lb.	$25 62½	$0 20 lb.	$50 00
Mutton	100 lbs.	9 lb.	9 00	15 lb.	15 00
Corned beef	100 lbs.	7½ lb.	7 50	12 lb.	12 00
Butter	70 lbs.	18 lb.	12 60	30 lb.	21 00
Rice	50 lbs.	6 lb.	3 00	10 lb.	5 00
Milk	200 lbs.	5 qrt.	10 00	10 lb.	20 00
Coffee, (roasted)	20 lbs.	20 lb.	4 00	35 lb.	7 00
Tea	5 lbs.	63 lb.	3 15	80 lb.	4 00
Sugar, (good yellow)	100 lbs.	9½ lb.	9 50	13 lb.	13 00
Molasses	20 galls.	50 gal.	10 00	80 gal.	16 00
Coal	5 tons.	5 50 ton.	27 50	8 00 ton.	40 00
Rent for three rooms	12 m'nth.	5 00 m'nth	60 00	12 00 m'nth.	144 00
Total for twelve months			181 87½		347 00

Increase in price of commodities in 1873 over that of 1860, 92 per cent.

* The aggregate cereal product of all the nations of Europe, in 1868, with a total population of 296,123,293, was reported to the International Statistical Congress at the Hague, in 1869, to be 4,754,516,604 bushels, being 16 bushels to the head. The product in the United States, in 1870, of 1,357,230,096 bushels, with a population of 38,558,371, was 35 bushels to the head.

TABLE B.—Showing the earnings of workmen in eight different mechanical occupations in the city of New York in 1860 and 1873 respectively.

Occupation.	Earnings, per day, 1860.	Earnings, per day, 1873.
Cabinet-maker	$1 75	$2 75
Cooper	1 65	2 75
Carpenter	1 75	3 00
Painter	1 77	3 00
Shoemaker	1 50	2 35
Tailor	1 66	2 50
Tanner	1 75	2 65
Tinsmith	1 75	2 75
Total	13 58	21 75

Increase of average wages in 1873, a fraction over 60 per cent.

TABLE C.—Showing the number of days' labor it required the different-named mechanics to perform to procure the twelve commodities in Table A, in 1860 and 1873 respectively.

Occupation.	Number of days' labor to procure the twelve commodities in 1860.		Number of days' labor to procure the twelve commodities in 1873.		Increase of days' labor in 1873 over 1860.
	D.	H.	D.	H.	D.	H.
Cabinet-makers	103	9½	126	2	22	2½
Coopers	110	2	126	2	16	0
Carpenters	103	9½	115	6½	11	7½
Painters	102	7½	115	6½	12	9½
Shoemakers	121	2½	147	6½	26	4½
Tailors	109	6	138	8	29	2
Tanners	103	9½	130	9½	27	0
Tinsmiths	103	9½	126	2	22	2½
Total	859	5	1,027	3½	167	8½

Average depreciation of purchasing power of labor in 1873 to that of 1860, 19½ per cent.

RECAPITULATION.

Average increase of cost of twelve articles in 1873 over that of 1860, 92 per cent.

Average increase of wages of workmen in eight different trades in 1873 over 1860, 60 per cent.

Average increase days' labor in 1873 to earn the twelve necessaries, to 1860, 19½ per cent.

When, therefore, you seek to divert two millions from the Treasury, the proceeds of our common lands, and impose, as you must, so much additional burdens upon labor; when in this bill you give to the poor and illiterate of other States the larger shares for education, which, if fairly divided, should go pro rata to all the States on the basis of proprietorship and population, you pass an inequitable bill, and at the same time neglect the desideratum of the day—economy. Our legislation must be according to the facts. If we are not to reduce the taxes through the tariff, in so far as we can reach them in a Federal legislature, and at the same time increase revenue as I have proposed, we might at least keep all the funds we can to prevent further taxation, and among them the proceeds of the public lands; keep them as well from railroad and less obnoxious schemes as for credit and revenue.

Secondly, I am opposed to this bill because I am opposed to the congressional enactment of the civil-rights bill, as it was when recommitted.

Whoever opposes the civil-rights bill on account of the mixed-school system must oppose this bill, which furnishes funds for such a system. It is now very relevant, therefore, to discuss the civil-rights bill. This I do not propose to do, except so far as to show its consequences, if passed, as affecting this bill and the probability of its passage. It does not follow, however, that all who favor the civil-rights bill must vote for this; although it is singular to me how so sound a reasoner on this matter as the eminent and eloquent member from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] can aggrandize Federal power by voting mixed schools, and oppose this bill, as he does, because he would restrain this centralizing tendency. He seems to swing with the pendulum and describes the oscillating arc he so happily represented.

Nor does it follow that the colored advocates who have enraptured the galleries on the former bill will vote this. Can they do it if the House should "proscribe" them from the common use of the schools? Is it not irrefragable that if the right to the inn, railroad, theater, and cemetery be conceded to the black to the same extent as to the white to enjoy them, (though the enjoyment of the grave-yard is perhaps a melancholy hilarity,) that the same right should be extended to them as to the schools? The colored members are correct in their reasoning, assuming these premises. Indeed, all the amis des noirs who have spoken are right in demanding equality alike in school and inn, in cemetery and car. When you debar them from the school you as much keep up the bar sinister as by keeping them from the play-house. Would it not be a craven logic, unworthy of the struggling blacks and their admirers, to insist on the one and not the other? Is it not, therefore, nonsense to pretend that this bill does not have in it, indirectly, a colored element? "Hic niger est, hunc tu, Romane, caveto!"

Mr. Speaker, without invidious reflection upon any one, may I not commend the calm and statesmanlike way in which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] presented this bill. He did not appeal to the clamor of the House or to the claqueurs of the gallery. He did not seek to question that body up yonder, which, like the African Sphinx, sits an insoluble riddle until its sensibility is tickled by allusions to its industry, education, and heroism! If, however, its plaudits serve to grace the noble fervor of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ELLIOTT] who spoke so well for his race, or the chartered libertines of debate who tumble about in bellicose drollery, I am content to praise and enjoy this novel mode of deliberation.

But I do not refer to the civil-rights bill merely to mark the difference in the manner of debate. This act consecrates the net proceeds of the public lands for education, and provides the mode of their application. The civil-rights bill provides for mixed schools; and if it becomes a law the funds thereby dedicated will be thus applied.

"But," it is said, "the civil-rights bill is recommitted; and may be reported back without the mixed schools." I do not know as to that. I will give three or four reasons why I think "civil rights" and mixed schools will return to us again for our action: first, partisan reasons; secondly, the speech and oath of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] the champion of the measure; and, thirdly, the attitude of the colored people as to mixed schools since the recommittal of the bill.

First. Frequent reference has been made by members, both colored and white, to the democracy. The acrimony of the debate has sprung from their chronic prejudices against color. I have no such prejudice; nor do I mean to express any, when I say that the white advocates of the bill might well entitle it "An act to revive prejudice so as to rehabilitate the republican party." The appeals to the colored gallery, the plaintive reference to the African soldiers, the unintentional satire about black children outstripping the white at school, and even the sudden collapse of the bill, by its recommittal to placate a white republican opposition in Virginia and elsewhere, all indicate that it is a measure of party necessity with party complications. Is it not intended to renew and to keep up discussion upon it, and thus enkindle and embitter partisan rancor, now somewhat dull, "in the agricultural districts?" Is it not intended to revive something of the dying war feeling and re-create a new soul under the ribs of radical death?

It was remarked that the northern democrats took no part in the debate on the civil-rights bill. Why this remark? Was it a part of the plan of the shrewd leader of the republican party to inveigle the northern democracy into the debate, so as to arouse dormant antipathy; or to call attention from the bankrupt condition of the Treasury, or from the discontent and impoverishment of the laboring people? Was it a movement to recover from the overwhelming defeats of the Administration in Ohio, New York, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, California, and Iowa? Was it intended to reorganize the scattered forces of republicanism on the colored issue? I would do no injustice to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.] On the contrary, at the risk of embarrassing him, I say that I am sure he is sincere in his appeal to Heaven to save his party from the effects of such a measure as this of education; but he made no such appeal as to the civil-rights bill. Is Heaven against him irrevocably upon that? It is not the first time that that party has planted itself in a pietistic attitude. This is once too much. The grangers are up and alive. I could almost see my friend, like another Cincinnatus, at the plow; his auburn hair full of hayseed, and his democratic logic mowing down the crop of fallacies by which this and similar bills are defended. But I doubt if Heaven listens to the appeal. The "crow is not reckoned a religious bird because it keeps cawing from a steeple." The northern democracy are satisfied with such expositions of Federal power as the gentleman gives us. They would apply them further. They should go to the civil-rights bill, a fortiori.

His argument is not a new one to me. On the 17th February, 1864, when the Freedmen's Bureau bill came in, I was first to denounce it, for the very reasons given by the gentleman. In the light of recent developments, what a commentary is there in these remarks of mine, then made. May I be allowed to recall them?

> It begins, for this Federal Government of limited and express powers, a policy so latitudinarian that the whole system is changed. This is a new system. It opens a vast opportunity for corruption and abuse. It may be inaugurated in the name of humanity; but I doubt, sir, if any government, much less our Government of delegated powers, will ever succeed in the philanthropic line of business, such as contemplated by this bill. Hence, the highest humanity is in building strong the ramparts of constitutional restraint. If the gentleman can show us warrant in the Constitution to establish this eleemosynary system for the blacks, and for making the Government a plantation speculator and overseer and the Treasury a fund for the negro, I will then consider the charitable light in which he has commended his bill to our sympathies. If you can so frame your bill as to draw no money from the Treasury, and make your scheme self-supporting; or, if you can so perfect the system as to connect it legally with the military without degrading the Army, and still discipline and care for the unfortunate blacks, male and female, young and old, strong and weak, then we may consider its propriety and legality, with a view to aid its passage.

As in matters of charity and police, so in matters of education; the forum for their consideration is the State Legislature. New York has its educational system, and its civil-rights bill. The one is admirably executed; the other may be in time. But something is due to the spirit of a people. All the punishments you can invent as to school officers or their squandering, as to the theaters and schools, and the admission of the colored race to them, will not answer. There is no remedy here for the inconvenience and trouble likely to arise from such peculiar Federal intermeddling. Self-help, not State-help, is the law of success for every race and people.

When De Foe, the great friend of liberty, (better known as the author of Robinson Crusoe,) was placed in the pillory for defending the dissenters, the populace who were expected by the law to pelt him with eggs and heap contumelies on him, hung garlands on his pillory, huzzaed, and sung hymns to him.

> Tell them the men that placed him here,
> Are scandals to the times,
> Are at a loss to find his guilt,
> And can't commit his crimes.

So will it be with all legislation which interferes with local, social, and home relations. Honors will be heaped on those who defy the law when that law is adverse to public opinion and domestic prejudices. So it was with the fugitive-slave law; and so it will be with all laws interfering with matters of local and social concernment.

But, Mr. Speaker, if the civil-rights bill does come back with mixed schools out, the colored members here, and colored voters elsewhere, will not be satisfied. The battle will rage again. You may give them the freedom of the inn, the railroad, and the theater; you may bury them side by side with the white in the cemetery; you may go further, and provide that we shall all rise together out of the same mold in the resurrection, irrespective of race, of color, or of previous condition; but the broad-voweled Africanese tongue will talk, and the elegant elocution of the successor of John C. Calhoun will still make its music of agitation. Gentlemen of white persuasion may tender the forty acres, but the inquiry still will be, "Where's your mule?"

Secondly. Why do I say this? Because the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has sworn it on a gory battle-field? I am sure no one could have been more interested than myself in the dramatic effect of that adjuration, or rather in its histrionic recital. It was a masterpiece. It displayed the eminent actor in a new rôle. He wears, it seems, the buskin as well as the sock; his words so naturally fall into the heroic and tragic measure:

> How the cothurn treads majestic,
> Down the deep iambic lines,
> And the rolling anapæstic
> Curls like vapor over shrines.

But is he not a painter as well? His battle-scene is worthy the pencil of Vernet; nay, it has the rare chiarooscuro of Rembrandt, with its "gloomy light much like a shade;" and its weird afterpiece of death in its setting of bronze seemed so realistic that one could almost wish that the painful picture were overdrawn.

Here is the terrific oath that followed his eloquent battle-piece:

> Among my dead comrades there I swore to myself a solemn oath, "May my right hand forget its cunning and my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth if I ever fail to defend the rights of these men, who have given their blood for me and my country this day and for their race forever;" and, God helping me, I will keep that oath. [Great applause on the floor and in the galleries.]
>
> From that hour all prejudice was gone, and an old-time State-rights democrat became a lover of the negro race; and as long as their rights are not equal to the rights of other men under this Government I am with them against all comers, and when their rights are assured, as other men's rights are held sacred, then, I trust, we shall have what we ought to have, a united country North and South, white and black, under one glorious flag, for which we and our fathers have fought with an equal and not to be distinguished valor. [Applause.]

This sudden change from an old State-rights democrat to what Caleb Cushing used to sneeringly call a negrophilist was not less marvelous—like a certain scriptural conversion—than the scene itself which so wrought upon the gentleman's subjectivity.

But, sir, to the remarkable speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts! I do not assume to be an arbiter elegantiarum in oratory; but I confess to an æsthetic desire to commend this work of art. It had in it, besides, natural tremulous touches of pathos. I saw more than one "dew-drop" in the eyes of rugged veterans, like my gallant colleagues, the generals from Brooklyn. He who is capable of such an effort should give to his declining years more of that gentle service. Even though he depicts his own experience, we can pardon it. As was said of Raphael, "who but himself could paint his portrait?" Can this be the same rude hand which made those horse-laughs of the gallery groundlings by the free use of gamboge and small beer—sometimes plastered on with a wash-brush, like a theatrical side-scene? Nor is it necessary, in passing on a work of art which evoked such feeling, to inquire whether it springs from unreal grief and imaginary scenes. The sorrows of Werther and the troubles of Richardson's Clarissa—I do not refer to any females of the Treasury—have made worse men tearful; but they were signs of genius as well as of feeling. The point at which I aim in this line of remark is, that the persistent and vigorous gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is in terrible earnest in his sworn devotion to the black; and that he will never, never give up until his bill with mixed schools is law, and these funds are fixed in trust for their sustentation.

Already, Mr. Speaker, the angry press, because of the speeches of the gentlemen toward their craft, have tried to wreak their revenge, by casting suspicion over the plain, unvarnished tale of war, so eloquently recited by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and thus weaken our faith in his courage. It has been hinted, first, that in such an exciting and sanguinary scene the gentleman could not have been so observant of details as to recall the precise number of yards, miles, and troops. It has been more than hinted that the whistling bullets, crossed bayonets, disrupted abatis, and capless muskets, and even the redoubts, were "works of the imagination;" and that the brave black man, waving the "flag of starry light over the storm of battle," including the great oath itself of the general, are but figments, worthy of an unconverted democrat or a Sir John Falstaff.

It is further surmised that the gentleman could not have been there at all. Now, sir, I meet this last allegation boldly; not with a flat denial, but with an explanation honorable to the service and to his discretion. Where should the general be except in the rear? Who ever heard of a general, unless it were some youthful Napoleon at Lodi, or a careless Sedgwick, under fire? It is his duty—not to take to a stump, as Jomini would recommend, but for success to follow in the "track" of victory. Any general who would do otherwise would be cashiered.

No, sir. The past is at least secure on all these points. Let us who are making history forestall its careless muse of the future. Time has a relentless tooth. How it destroys our pleasing prospects! how it tumbles down our enchanted castles! What is Rome since the skeptic Niebuhr erased Romulus and Remus and the wolf from our juvenile faith? What is Greece with Numa and the divine nymph a mere myth? What the Argonautic expedition? Hardly a voyage for wool. The Golden Fleece has been washed out by the encrimsoned waves of the Crimean war. The heroes and gods of Homer; the ghostly figures of Dante's Inferno; the devils and angels of Milton, and the shadowy creations of Ossian—where are they now? Children of the mist—remote as the Milky Way! The braveries of Troy; the wanderings of Ulysses; the death of Agamemnon; the magical history of the Atrides; the knights of Prince Arthur in Spenser's Faërie allegory? Ashes only, inurned in golden verse!

Within our own time many believed in Dr. Whately's brochure, entitled "Historic doubts concerning Napoleon's existence." And yet men were still living who had seen the great Corsican. What may not be said of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, when the 4th of July, 1900, shall be celebrated?

If the Xanthus and the Scamander "dry up" under skepticism, where may not James River be ten centuries hence? Where then this battle of the blacks? A dactyl, a spondee—the hexameter verse of some New Zealand Virgil, or some Alaskan Longfellow—singing of a supposititious general on an imperceptible horse upon an imaginary battle-field, with an army of impalpable blacks cutting away a fictitious abatis with intangible axes, to capture an airy redoubt, held by a ghostly enemy, who did not incontinently fly over any number of miles, with nobody in pursuit!

Such is the fickleness of fame and the unreliance of history. If only twenty-seven names survive of all the millions before the flood, what matters it if these heroes are forgotten? It matters much. The heroic mind would have all the grand deeds of our world recorded in enduring brass. Alas! we have but a CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, made up of printing-ink and the pulp of rags.

Before the century is out, it may become as difficult to decipher our RECORD as the Egyptian hieroglyph or the Babylonian script. Some future Champollion or Smith, struggling through our mutilated record, may doubt, first, that if there ever was a rebellion, no such battle as that of Spring Hill took place; secondly, if there was such a battle, no colored troops fought in it; thirdly, if there were colored troops engaged, there was no such commander; fourthly, if there was such a commander, it was not General BUTLER; fifthly, if it was General BUTLER, no rebels ran away.

To dispel these possible illusions of posterity, the gentleman from Massachusetts, with wonderful foresight, called on those present who were cognizant to confirm his statement. Their silence afforded that confirmation. Lest, however, the captious critic of 1976 may still doubt, I add my belief to magnify the truth, by completing this epic of "arms and the man." Anxious for my country's future in history, and that the leader of the Forty-third Congress shall have his niche in the Pantheon of fame, I would resolve these nebulous doubts into authentic stars.

Nay, I confirm my belief by a document before me, dated October 11, 1864, from the army of the James before Richmond, issued by command of General B. F. BUTLER.* It refers to this fight and the colored troops in admirable phrase. It only lacks the picturesque and poetical imagery and oath of the impassioned orator. I call attention to this order only to show that the general of that army is in dead and bloody earnest in swearing that he would lose the cunning of his hand and the use of his tongue before he would give up the colored cause; and hence I infer that the proceeds of the public lands will go to the mixed schools.

I have been elaborately particular on these points, for the gentleman knows well the apochryphal character of printed matter; in fact I think I have heard him make a few remarks as to the unreliable character of the daily press. How much more, then, sir, would he doubt the literature of the coming centuries, when Time's effacing hand shall spoil the now, alas! imperfect record of the newspapers.

I am the more inclined to make this vindication, because, as my friend once confidentially told me, I was debauched by literature; so that the quality of that species of human employment stands in poor esteem in his mind. I fear it will stand still less so when I tell you, sir, that my apprehensions about the future of this remarkable battle and his gallantry in its track may subject him to such derogation as I find in De Maistre's "Journey round my room." That vivacious and clever Frenchman, with spiteful jealousy of our nation and malicious prophecy as to our war, says in his last chapter but one: "How many men there are who, finding themselves clothed in uniform, firmly believe they are officers until the unexpected appearance of the enemy; and more than this, if it be the king's good pleasure to allow one of them to add to his coat a certain trimming, he straightway believes himself to be a general; and the whole army gives him the title without any notion of making fun of him. So great an influence has costume on the human imagination! (Voila l'effet de costume sur l'imagination!)" I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that the translation fails to give the exquisite aroma of the polite French original.

Besides, if I may be allowed other classic reference, all history concerning Africa and her sons and scenes is a record of enchantments and prodigies, and it is apt to be discredited. I do not speak to disparage, but partly from reading and partly from observation upon the northern part of that continent, when I recall the dangers of disbelief as to anything concerning Africa. There the lotus grew, whose fruit when strangers ate they forgot even their own race and native land; there was the palace of the Gorgons; there Strabo locates the seven-cubit leeches, a single one of which drained the blood of a dozen men. These were doubtless the antetype of the Freedmen's Bureau! Africa is full of legends of satyrs and other goat-footed genii, who greeted sunrise and sunset with yells; of one-eyed beings with a single leg, outrunning the ostrich; of basilisks, dragons, and all sorts of miscegenated monsters. Hence, these prodigies naturally beget incredulity where Africa is concerned; and we must anticipate this effect, à priori, by fixing this battle as a prodigy, as authentic, and having the enchantment of verity. This I have essayed.

But while the task is easy as to the details of the battle, it is more difficult when we approach the oath of the general; and here, lest any member should make a point of order that my remarks are irrelevant, I make my concatenation with the bill. If the oath be authentic, and the juror is that man of determination which his race for governor of Massachusetts illustrates, then mixed schools will be kept in the bill, and the public lands will be thus dedicated. To assume that the gentleman would fail of that oath, would add an illustration of that other prodigy, which Herodotus says belongs to Africa, where the cattle graze backward on account of their strange horns.

I will not now inflict upon the House a dissertation on oaths. Some sessions ago I urged the inutility of frequent and familiar oath-taking, with reference to the repeal of the iron-clad. My friend behind me [Mr. MAYNARD] answered me; but time has led him to my side; for it was he who brought in the bill to melt down the iron-clad! Oaths should be reverent and rare, to inspire respect. Not that I intimate any want of rarity on this occasion. But by many good people oaths are rejected entirely. "Whatever is more than this"—that is, the simple truth—"cometh of evil." The Golden Age had no oaths. When cozenage and deceit and lack of confidence began in our world, oaths arose. All the best writers agree that there is still a slippery uncertainty in an oath. There are various modes of swearing. Abraham's style was peculiar. In fact the binding nature depends sometimes on the mode of taking the oath. In this regard, we are ignorant of the precise ceremony of the gentleman. He only tells us he swore to himself. The Greeks swore by Apollo; the Saxons by the head of their king. Cyrus swore he would not eat till he did it. Other persons swear off that they will not drink. The Magi swore by the Ganges; Palinurus by the rough seas. Some Athenians swore by cabbages; Theseus by Mars the Red; Socrates by a dog. The King of Polonia in 1573 swore that if he failed in fealty to the Turk he would be apostate, oppose altar and priest, and slay swine upon the font, and worship them! Hamlet swore by Saint Patrick; for the whole Northern world had then their learning from Ireland. Shakespeare, who was a Celt, like the gentleman from Massachusetts, knew an oath was necessary for supernatural effect!

But it is the martial oath I would analyze. Swearing is a soldierly habit. The army swore in Flanders. Our armies, Federal and confederate, swore continually; they swore in recruits and swore in disloyalists; and swore them out. Even this oath of the gentleman which I have quoted, cannot be his only one. He must have sworn somewhat at the court-martial who sentenced a soldier to work ten years on his Dutch Gap canal; and he might be well excused if he swore

*In the charge on the enemy's works by the colored division of the Eighteenth Corps at Spring Hill, New Market, better men were never better led—better officers never led better men. With hardly an exception, officers of colored troops have justified the care with which they have been selected. A few more such gallant charges, and to command colored troops will be the post of honor in the American armies. The colored soldiers, by coolness, steadiness, and determined courage and dash, have silenced every cavil of the doubters of their soldierly capacity and drawn tokens of admiration from their enemies—have brought their late masters, even, to the consideration of the question whether they will not employ as soldiers the hitherto despised race. Be it so; this war is ended when a musket is in the hands of every able-bodied negro who wishes to use one.

when, contrary to the general belief, powder did not go off before Fort Fisher.*

The sublime oath, however, of all time, quoted by Longinus, is from Æschylus—where, upon a black, orbed shield, seven valiant chiefs slew a bull, and dipping their hands in his blood, went out to ravage and destroy! The gentleman's oath was by his hand and tongue; and as neither the one nor the other is impaired, my conclusion is that he will insist on perfect equality and confiscate our lands for mixed schools.

It is urged that most of these oaths are, like that of Hamlet to the ghost, only a fiction. I may admit it; it is but another illustration of a licentious press. Even this splendid oath of the founders of Swiss freedom has been called a myth: "We swear," exclaimed Walter Fürst, Werner Stauffacher, and Melchthal, extending their arms, "we swear in the presence of God, before whom kings and people are equal, to live or die for our fellow-countrymen; neither to suffer injustice nor to commit injury; to respect the rights and property of the Count of Hapsburg; to do no violence to the imperial bailiffs, but to put an end to their tyranny." Around this oath has gathered the haze of time. It is very beautiful. It has its conservative reservations as to certain rights of property and person, which the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts omitted in the hurry of his movement in the track of that black charging column. I would advise him to copy it next time. It is very effective, and lacks the diabolic energy which not only appeared in the oath of the gentleman, but in his speech. But alas! alas! for human asseverations. Oaths became so common in the war, and since. They became the sport of the privates and the joke of the officers. It is Congress only which listens to them with awe, while the galleries cheer in exultation. But the object of the oath and speech is gained, and then—O! fatal indecision, not unlike that of the Dane, who let "I dare not, wait upon I would"—the native hue of resolution became sickly, the oath failed, courage sank, and the bill, on the motion of the eloquent gentleman and soldier, was recommitted.

Thirdly. But will the bill remain thus? No. I ask the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ELLIOTT,] or his confrères: are you going to give up mixed schools? Not thus do I interpret the serenade remarks of that member. Not thus do I read these ringing sentences, which come to us (as did the words of the ghost to Hamlet, "Swear! swear!") from below, in the restaurant—from Mr. Downing and his thirty-nine men of nerve:†

> Having this regard, you will not consent to have the clause securing us from proscription in public schools in the several States stricken from the civil-rights bill now before you. It is to us the clause of primary import. Public schools inculcate ideas, teach the rising generation. If the rising generation is taught by the State to look on the color of a citizen, and (as the arrangement setting them apart implies) to despise them, to regard the class as inferior, one that may be outraged, they not only, in thus educating them, unfit the despised as well as the despising class to sit on the juries, but the arrangement wars with the Constitution, which forbids any State from making or enforcing any law abridging the right of citizens. * * * Rights should not be disregarded in deference either to prejudice or threats; the very threats are an argument that, without law, the parties are not likely to act equally and justly by us. * * * Why not act justly, fully? Let us and the country have rest. The material interest of a burdened country cries out for rest; for a rest it cannot hope for until our rights, like others, are fully secured and respected.
>
> We ask, as proud Americans, to be dismissed from your gates. We do not desire to stand in the position of suppliants. We want our rights, and no more than our rights. Nothing short of them will satisfy us. If driven to the wall, it must be by those who, having the strength, may, if they will, secure them.

I know what this means. Mr. Downing does not care so much for the hotel. It is not in his line. The privilege of five dollars a day at the Fifth Avenue or the Arlington is not to be greedily sought for. As to the rail-car too, "are we not," says the colored traveler, "treated like the whites, to separate cars? Was not a Massachusetts member [Mr. HOOPER] turned out of a colored car in North Carolina? Are we not equal in that?" And the theater; who cares to pay the price of a family's food for a week to see a blackamoor making love and finally smothering a weak young lady of Venice, then throwing himself away and finally committing suicide on account of a lot of "white trash?" Who would beg to pay the price of intrusion into a theater, where "Box and Cox" do nothing but bother each other and poor Mrs. Bouncer? As to the cemetery: I fancy I do not derogate from the spiritual elevation of the colored race when I say that, compared with the school question, it is no matter where they are buried. What matters, my colored brother, from what spot you or I put on the wings of an immortal flight; whether "way down upon the Suwanee River," or far off upon the banks of the Yang-tse-Kiang? There is more pensive thought in the little burial mounds I have seen in a Carolinian thicket than in the stupendous monument of Metella! The gentleman [Mr. ELLIOTT] has read Sir Thomas Browne's Urn-burial. I think I hear his rotund and serious voice rehearsing its quaint philosophy:

> To die, indeed, is to be again ourselves, and 'tis all one to lie in Saint Innocent's church-yard, as in the sands of Egypt, beneath the pyramids; ready to be everything in the ecstacy in being ever, and as content with six feet as the moles of Adrianus.

Not his the philosophy of Ulysses in Hecuba, who did not care how meanly he lived, so he might find a noble tomb in death; but rather that of Socrates, who was indifferent, so that his friends regarded his immortal part, whether his body was buried or burned. It is all one how we are buried or where we lie. Was not Pompey burned with a piece of an old boat; and did not Cæsar cast off his enmity with his body, and with accord accompany his enemy, Pompey, to a Latin hell? "Nay, after all," says our quaint friend, "has not water proved the smartest grave, which in forty days swallowed almost mankind and the creation, fishes not wholly escaping?" What of the dead past—save a few royal bones and priestly dust—remains? These are entombed in mounds and minsters! Of Adam, our earliest forefather and blood relative, no fixed site is pointed out as holding his loved remains; and yet his death "was only six thousand brief summers ago!" Even Mark Twain was not entirely certain of the precise locality. Hence, he wept!

So far as I am individually concerned, I quarrel not about being sepulchered with the black. I am not perhaps as certain as some of them as to the resurrection; but I rather believe with Joaquin Miller that it is hardly

> Worth while that we battle to humble
> Some poor fellow-soldier down in the dust.
> God pity us all! Time eftsoon will tumble
> All of us together like leaves in a gust—
> Humbled indeed down into the dust.

Therefore I feel authorized to say for the living fathers and mothers of Africa that all other reasons for the civil-rights bill may fail; but the chief cause remains, so long as their children are proscribed from the schools. They will have that boon as a part of their equality. In no other way do they feel that they can secure a victory over the whites. If that be not given, "not death, nor hell" can drive them to remain with the republican party.

So that, whether we like the mixed schools or not, ultimately, as I prophesy, this Congress will enact it. You cannot get rid of it. It is the Old Man of the Sea.

Gentlemen, therefore, will be wary in voting this bill. It is a bill to furnish the proceeds of the public lands for a policy which, if we are to believe many of them, will make the whole scheme of free education South, a failure. If we thus dedicate the lands, the trust will in the end go to prop up a failure.

Aside from that, coming to the bill itself, I should like to support it in a different shape, and under different circumstances, and as a State measure. If we could reconcile our best wishes toward the negro, with State action and public sentiment, we will do more for them than any party has hitherto done, where it has had the power.

The bill before us is what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] calls a compromise. In other words, it is a great advance on his former views. We have objected to previous bills from that quarter, as tending to enlarge Federal powers, to absorb those local functions which have been the life of the State systems, especially their school systems. I cannot yet divest myself of a certain caution in looking at this gift. Timeo Danaos. The bill does aggrandize, though insidiously, the function of the Federal Commissioner of Education. His certificate may give or withhold from the State its share of the fund. He is to judge whether the State has complied with the seventh section. If, for instance, he holds that a free-school system requires the admixture of the races, and so regards the "shrieks of locality," and the clamor of districts, counties, or States, as to withhold the ratio of a State, who is to question him? Congress? Not immediately; and perhaps never. So in regard to the misapplication of the funds. There is a severe penalty. How if "misapplication" may mean the application under a law of a State to white schools alone and not in accordance with the Commissioner's views? Is he to be punished for that?

There is another query, which as a legislator I am bound to make. There is a penalty in the eleventh section for the misapplication of the funds. A felony is declared. Fine or imprisonment is provided for the officer or person willfully misapplying the funds. What officer? Any one in any of the hundred thousand school districts of the United States. What person? Any one, banker, depositary, custodian, or messenger. The pursuit of such a felon is to be by the United States circuit court exclusively! Of this the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] remarked exhaustively.

---

* Fellow-citizens, I have lived with you, man and boy, for thirty years, and I am going to live with you, if you will have me, for thirty years longer. [Great applause.] I have stood before you many times, and I hope to stand before you many times more to advise with you upon that which is for the good of the country; but often as I have met you here no man can say that I ever misrepresented a fact, and when I now tell you that I never saw that powder-boat, that all I had to do with it was to order my ordnance officer to turn over to the Navy one hundred and fifty tons of powder, and that the whole thing was under the charge of the Navy, and was arranged exactly as the Navy desired, when they wished and how they wished, you can judge of the truth of the dispatch which states that I prepared the powder-boat.

Whoever states it, there is no truth in it. But the powder-boat it is said was a failure. Granted; as the powder in it was never wholly set on fire. It was intended that there should be then exploded more powder than ever was at once exploded before—powder enough, in my judgment, to have done very great damage—so much, in fact, that I have the written advice of Admiral Porter that I should stand out twenty-five miles, let off the steam, and draw the fire from the boiler of my boat before it went off, lest the explosion should blow me up even there. [Laughter and applause.] I am prepared to take the issue; and hereafter, fellow-citizens, when you bear me to that little inclosure on the other side of the river, which I hope for as my last resting-place, I pray you to put over me for my epitaph: "Here lies the general who saved the lives of his soldiers at Big Bethel and Fort Fisher, and who never commanded the Army of the Potomac." I ask for nothing else. [Great applause.]—General Butler's speech at Lowell, January 29, 1866.

† Ghost, (beneath.) Swar!
Hamlet. Ha! ha! Boy! says't thou so?
Art thou there, true penny?
Come on! you hear this fellow in the CELLARAGE—
Consent to swear.

When will we have done with penalties? When will there be such a system of education and polity as will remove the inducements to crime, so as to avoid the frequency of punishment? Especially, when will we cease to enact here laws whose harsh penalties are an assurance of their impotence?

These objections which I have mentioned might be obviated by judicious amendment. The amendment I propose is to strike the eleventh and twelfth sections out of the bill.

Let no one say that these objections spring from any opposition to an efficient system of education. No one can feel more deeply—especially since the new order of suffrage—the need of general and generous education. The South to-day would not be under the heel of Federal usurpation if the exceptional culture here shown by colored Congressmen were shared generally.

Education is the safety of society. "We must," said an English minister after suffrage had been enlarged in England, "educate our masters." One of the greatest objects of government is education. Education has been well described as a "companion which no misfortune can depress, no crime can destroy, no enemy can alienate, no despotism enslave. At home a friend, abroad an introduction, in solitude a solace, and in society an ornament. It chastens vice, it guides virtue, it gives at once grace and government to genius. Without it, what is man? A splendid slave, a reasoning savage!" No father, whether himself educated or not, cares to see his children grow up comfortless in body or dull in mind. This country has not been unmindful of this demand. It has answered it in most of the States, and will answer it in all, and best by local institution. We want no supervision of it from this Capitol. Indeed, there is much complaint among good men, even as to State and local supervision. Our experience with the eleemosynary bureaus and schools teaches us better. We want no new Federal police emanating hence, whose Fouchés or Vidocqs will be sharpened by party needs, or prompted by publishing greed, to interfere with the State systems. We have enough now to attend to in our indispensable Federal duties, and especially in connection with the misapplication or squandering of public funds.

Therefore, in conclusion, I oppose this bill as over-legislation. It will be barren of practical results. Many years of service have taught me some lessons of humility. I did not miscalculate at the beginning of the war, as to the way it would end, as some did of my party. I expected that slavery would be riddled to death by the bullet. I did not miscalculate as to the Freedmen's Bureau and its mischievous results; nor as to the consequences of universal suffrage, now seen in the radical States South compared with the conservative States—as to their taxes, peace, prosperity, and credit. But I did miscalculate as to the effect of enlisting the blacks as soldiers, and as to their reception and conduct here. Besides, I had thought that in time they would see the importance of dividing their vote between the parties, and thus, while avoiding collisions with the white race, command more care and respect.

It is hard to prescribe for the evils which have grown up since and out of our civil war; but there is a rule which is safe: Put not your faith in legislation to rectify social troubles and race divisions. The pendulum of the gentleman from Iowa is swinging just now in favor of laissez faire, and away from that "subtle form of fetichism"—the blind adoration through the centuries, of governmental omnipotence. We are admonished against this, by the size of our files, by the clogging of our business here, by the paralysis of our industries, by the flurry of our bourses, by the panic in our banks and marts, by the changes in our politics, by the expenses of our living, by the insecurity of our property, by the luxury of our millionaires, by the poverty of our poor, by the prodigality of our officials, and by the insecurity to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, which are the consequences of a bad administration even of the best form of government.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I now move that this bill be postponed till the third Tuesday in March, after the morning hour. I do not ask that it shall take precedence of other orders.

Mr. BURCHARD. I suggest to the gentleman to make the bill a special order after the morning hour and from day to day until disposed of.

Several MEMBERS. O, no.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. That would require unanimous consent.

Mr. BURCHARD. If there is objection, of course it cannot be done; but unless such an order be made the bill may never be reached.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Several MEMBERS objected.

Mr. HOLMAN. For the purpose of getting this matter fairly before the people, I move to amend the motion——

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I do not yield to the gentleman. I call the previous question on my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is of course aware that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] did not yield the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts simply made the motion to postpone; he did not call the previous question.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. My purpose was to call the previous question. I did not yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. The country has never had an opportunity to pass upon this measure; and I had intended to move to postpone it uutil next December, so that the judgment of the country may be taken upon it during the campaign next fall.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The judgment of the country has been very thoroughly expressed on the subject.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] on which he has demanded the previous question.

Mr. KILLINGER. If it be in order, I move that the bill be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 81, noes 71.

Mr. SENER and Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 110, nays 137, not voting 39; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Banning, Barber, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Cannon, John B. Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clements, Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Corwin, Cox, Crittenden, Crossland, Crounse, Danford, DeWitt, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Durham, Eden, Giddings, Glover, Hamilton, Henry R. Harris, Hatcher, Havens, Herndon, Holman, Houghton, Hunter, Hyde, Kasson, Kendall, Killinger, Knapp, Lamison, Lawson, Loughridge, Magee, Marshall, Martin, Mellish, Milliken, Mills, Mitchell, Moore, Morrison, Neal, Negley, Nesmith, Niblack, O'Brien, Orr, Orth, Packard, Isaac C. Parker, Perry, Phelps, Phillips, Pratt, Randall, Rawls, Ray, Read, Rice, Robbins, James W. Robinson, Henry B. Sayler, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Sessions, Sheats, Sloss, Smart, Southard, Stanard, Stone, Strait, Swann, Tyner, Waddell, Waldron, Jasper D. Ward, White, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Wilber, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, James Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—110.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Atkins, Averill, Barry, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bowen, Bradley, Bromberg, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Crooke, Crutchfield, Darrall, Davis, Dawes, Eames, Elliott, Farwell, Field, Fort, Foster, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hancock, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hereford, Hersey, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hooper, Howe, Hubbell, Hunton, Hurlbut, Hynes, Kelley, Lamport, Lansing, Lawrence, Leach, Lowe, Luttrell, Lynch, Maynard, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Merriam, Monroe, Morey, Myers, Nunn, O'Neill, Packer, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, Pierce, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Potter, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Scofield, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Shanks, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Small, A. Herr Smith, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Standeford, Starkweather, Stephens, Storm, Stowell, Sypher, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Vance, Wallace, Walls, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, Whitehead, Whiteley, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, and Woodford—137.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Barrere, Benjamin F. Butler, Cotton, Creamer, Crocker, Curtis, Eldredge, Freeman, Gunckel, John T. Harris, Hoskins, Jewett, Kellogg, Lamar, Lewis, Lofland, Lowndes, James W. McDill, McJunkin, McLean, Niles, Pike, Purman, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Henry J. Scudder, Sheldon, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, Speer, St. John, Strawbridge, Taylor, Thomas, Tremain, Wells, Charles G. Williams, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—39.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

During the vote,

Mr. CROSSLAND stated that his colleague, Mr. ADAMS, was detained at home by sickness.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on seconding the demand for the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until the third Tuesday of March, after the morning hour.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. KILLINGER asked and obtained unanimous consent to print remarks on the pending bill in the RECORD. [See Appendix.]

The previous question was seconded and the main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the further consideration of the bill was postponed until the third Tuesday of March next, after the morning hour.

Mr. G. F. HOAR moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REVISION OF THE LAWS.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I ask for unanimous consent to offer the following resolution; which I am sure the House will agree to as soon as they hear it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a copy of the Revision of the Laws, bound, be furnished to every member of the House as soon as possible.

Mr. HOLMAN. That resolution should go to some committee.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, does that resolution go to the Committee on Printing under the law? Members cannot get along without a bound copy of those revised laws.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that under the law the resolution goes to the Committee on Printing; and it will be so referred.

LOUISIANA CONTESTED ELECTION—LAWRENCE vs. SYPHER.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio, from the Committee on Elections, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That J. Hale Sypher, the sitting member from the first congressional district of Louisiana in the Forty-third Congress, be, and he is hereby, permitted to file his answer to the notice of contest served on him by E. Lawrence with the Clerk of the House within the time allowed by the resolution of the House for answer; and that such filing shall be deemed a full compliance with the law governing such matters; a copy of said answer to be forwarded by the Clerk at once to the contestant by mail.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THE WAR OF 1812.

Mr. SHOEMAKER, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, a communication has been sent to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812, from the Pension Office, giving valuable statistics in reference to the pensioners of that war; and I move that it be printed and recommitted to that committee.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

DRAWBACKS.

Mr. COOK. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish the House—
First, with the names of all persons and their place of residence, by States and internal-revenue districts, who have collected any claim or claims known as "drawbacks," or tare on raw cotton;
Second, the names of attorneys or agents collecting the said claims, and the amount collected in each revenue district of the State; and Third, the amount of such claims rejected and still pending.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I object to the adoption of that resolution. I have, however, no objection to its reference, and move that it be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. That is the proper committee to which the resolution should be referred; they can report it back.

The resolution was so referred.

YELLOW FEVER.

Mr. BROMBERG. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Surgeon-General of the Army be, and is hereby, requested to communicate such reports and parts of reports in his office on the epidemic of the yellow fever in the United States in 1873 as illustrate the question of national quarantine.

Mr. DAWES. The Surgeon-General's Office is not one of the Departments, and the resolution should be directed to the Secretary of War. The Surgeon-General is under the Secretary of War.

Mr. BROMBERG. They have the information I seek in the Surgeon-General's Office.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen should be careful in drawing up their resolutions not to call upon heads of Bureaus, but upon the heads of Departments to which the Bureaus belong.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that the resolution be amended to "direct" the Secretary of War, instead of that he be requested.

The SPEAKER. The language of the House to heads of the Departments, in resolutions calling for information, is directory. The amendment will be considered as agreed to.

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

JAMES M. NEELY.

Mr. ATKINS. On my motion yesterday a bill (H. R. No. 1189) granting a pension to James M. Neely, late first lieutenant Company C, Seventh Tennessee Cavalry, was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and I desire to have it withdrawn and laid upon the table.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the naval appropriation bill.

The question was taken, and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. E. H. ROBERTS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1013) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1875.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resumes the consideration of the special order, which is House bill No. 1013, a bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes. General debate is exhausted. The bill will now be read the first time.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I renew the proposition that I made last night, to which I hope there will be no objection; that is, that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine asks that, by unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the first reading of the bill ought not to be dispensed with. We have plenty of time, and I think the practice is a good one of reading the appropriation bills at length before proceeding to have them read for amendments. I hope the gentleman from Maine will not insist on dispensing with the first reading.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It is a matter which a single gentleman by his objection can prevent. I will only say that the reading of the bill at length by the Clerk will consume nearly an hour of our time.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman insists I will waive the objection.

Mr. BECK. I object. And I object for this reason: I went to the document-room again within the last five minutes, and found that neither the report of the Secretary nor the reports of any of the heads of the Bureaus are yet printed; and this House has no means of knowing anything about this bill except by the reading of it. I desire that the House shall hear the bill read.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Very well; let the Clerk go on.

Mr. WOOD. I desire the gentleman who has charge of the bill to say whether he has had corrected all the errors which occurred in the printing of it.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. When in the reading of the bill for amendments we reach any errors in the printing, I shall of course move, on behalf of the committee, that they be corrected.

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman from Maine tell us why it is that the report of the Secretary and the reports of all his subordinates have been withheld from the House and are now withheld?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. There is no force, and let me say no fairness, in the use of the word "withheld" by the gentleman from Kentucky. As to why documents long since in the printer's hands have not yet appeared here, I have no more knowledge than he has. But there has been no withholding. And I hope by this time the Committee of the Whole is satisfied that the Committee on Appropriations in its actions as to these bills is not inclined to withhold any information whatever.

Mr. BECK. The reports are withheld in some way. It is now the 12th day of January, and Congress met on the 1st of December, and we have not yet seen them.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. There are many documents I would like to have for my convenience that I have not got; but I accuse nobody of withholding them.

Mr. BECK. I ask the gentleman if it is possible for any member or this House, outside of the Committee on Appropriations, to know anything about any item of appropriation in this bill in the absence of the reports of the heads of Bureaus of the Navy Department?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have said to the gentleman before, and I repeat now, that the report of the Secretary and the reports of the Bureaus will throw little or no light upon the questions which are mainly involved in this bill, namely, the reductions which it embraces.

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman tell us where else we can get information?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Well, sir, the gentleman can get it if he chooses, by doing as I did—spending time at the Navy Department, going over figures, unearthing papers, making comparisons with the past, and consulting as to the needs of the future.

Mr. BECK. Why, sir, they would not allow me to do it.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have done all of that.

Mr. WOOD. I, for one, desire to express my confidence in the Committee on Appropriations. I am conscious of the embarrassment and difficulties which surround the discharge of the duties imposed on that committee; and I believe that they have discharged their duty with fidelity and ability, with this exception. They are precipitating upon this House the consideration of a measure, proposing to appropriate between sixteen and seventeen million dollars without giving us the facts and figures and the documents. Now I will say, in reply to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] that the fact that those documents are not here—I will not say withheld, because the gentleman is sensitive as to the expression—the fact that these documents are not to be reached by the members of this House, so as to give us the necessary information on which we may proceed to the consideration of this bill, is a reason why they should not thus hasten and precipitate its consideration. We want the documents. We want the information. We want to have the facts in our possession, so that we can fairly and honestly determine as to the amount of money we should appropriate for these expenditures. I think the gentleman should not force us to the consideration of this bill till we have those documents.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let me make a suggestion to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD.] When we take up any given item, if the gentleman will then put any question or point out any matter in regard to which he has not sufficient information from the Book of Estimates and from the committee, and show that further information is needed, he will then have a good ground why we should postpone action. But a general statement that we have not the documents now does not meet the point. I pledge the gentleman that so far as I am concerned, and I know I speak for all the members of the Committee on Appropriations, when he comes to a place in the bill, or puts his finger on a clause of it, of which an explanation is necessary, he shall have our help to obtain that information.

Mr. WOOD. In reply to the gentleman from Ohio, I will say that until the Secretary of the Navy has made a reply to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] and passed unanimously in this House, we are not, in fact, in a position to vote upon even the first item of the bill which relates to the pay of the Navy.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I presume this debate proceeds only by unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio one question, and it is this: if we are not to have the report of the Secretary of the Navy and the reports of the chiefs of the different Bureaus of the Department before the House at the time we are considering the naval appropriation bill, can he tell us when they are necessary to Congress, and when and how we can use them?

Mr. GARFIELD. What particular document does the gentleman want?

Mr. BECK. I want the reports of the heads of the different Bureaus showing the working of the Departments, as they all do or ought to do, and the necessity for all the appropriations. It is from these reports that the Secretary of the Treasury makes up his Book of Estimates. Without them we have nothing to guide us, except the statements of the Committee on Appropriations, in which I confess I have great confidence; still these are the reports upon which the Secretary of the Treasury makes up his estimates, and we ought to have them before us.

Mr. GARFIELD. Has not the gentleman seen the report of the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. BECK. I got a copy of it privately by going to the Department for it.

Mr. GARFIELD. So has every member who has applied for it.

Mr. HOLMAN. It has not been furnished to the House generally.

Mr. BECK. No, sir; and the reports of the heads of Bureaus have not been furnished, and I have been unable to obtain them.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committee on Appropriations have had the report of the Secretary before them since the first day of the session, and the obtaining of it was only a matter of diligence.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I object to further debate, and call for the first reading of the bill.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill at length and afterwards by clauses for amendment.

The first clause of the bill was read as follows:

That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the naval service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes:

For pay of commissioned and warrant officers at sea, on shore, on special service, and of those on the retired list and unemployed, and for mileage and transportation of officers traveling under orders, and for pay of the petty officers, seamen, ordinary seamen, landsmen, and boys, including men of the engineer's force, and for the Coast-Survey service, eighty-five hundred men, at an average pay of $300 each per annum, $6,250,000.

Mr. CLYMER. I move to strike out the word "dollars" in that clause, and I do it for the reason that I do not think this committee can act intelligently or intelligibly on this appropriation bill unless we are furnished with the reports from the various Bureaus on which the estimates are made up.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Here the committee rose informally, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the joint resolution (H. R. No. 35) filling existing vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed the following bills, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

The bill (H. R. No. 793) to establish the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates; and

The bill (H. R. No. 795) making an appropriation to pay the salaries of the Official Reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union then resumed its session.

Mr. CLYMER. It may be that the Committee on Appropriations understand the nature of the different clauses of this bill, and it may also be that the Committee on Naval Affairs understand them; but that a vast majority of the members of this committee have any adequate idea of any of the different appropriations asked for in this bill, I think it must be evident to us all is not true. I think, sir, that in fairness to those we represent, and probably in fairness to the Department itself, we should have this information.

The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. GARFIELD] says that if any questions be asked regarding any item of the bill, he will be glad to reply. I would suggest to him that it is impossible to ask questions unless we have the data on which questions may be founded. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. SCOFIELD] says we should vote blindly for all the appropriations in this bill because the general amount is reduced some $4,000,000 under the amount appropriated last year. While that may be true, it is nevertheless also true that it may be in the power of this committee to reduce the appropriations still further if they have a knowledge of the various items in the bill.

That being the case, I ask, is there now such urgent necessity for further progress in this bill that without information or data the committee should be asked to pass one of the most important appropriation bills of this Congress? Therefore, sir, in order that we may obtain further information, I beg to withdraw my informal motion to amend the first clause of the bill, and to substitute for it a motion that the committee do now rise, in order that I may make a motion in the House that some time be fixed for the further consideration of this bill, after such information has been obtained as will enable the Committee of the Whole to act intelligently upon it.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I trust the gentleman will not press the motion to rise, which is undebatable, until I can have a moment to reply.

Mr. CLYMER. I will withdraw the motion if the gentleman will renew it.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. A word right to the point of this motion—that the committee shall rise for the purpose indicated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER,] to postpone the further consideration of this bill. I ask the attention of members of both sides of the House to the fact that this is the first bill being considered in Committee of the Whole from the Committee on Appropriations, although it is now six weeks since the commencement of this session of Congress. The Committee on Appropriations has labored faithfully upon this bill—all of the members of the committee have so labored. Let me tell the gentleman from Pennsylvania that on yesterday a member of that committee—a fellow-democrat with him upon the same side of the House—stood here; and if he were here now he would bear me out in the statement that he said he, with others representing the minority of the committee, had carefully scrutinized this bill; that he believed it was a fair bill, and in the interest of economy. I can only reassert here, for the information of the House, that I know there are other gentlemen on that side of the House who look upon this bill as in the direction of economy, who feel that the reduction proposed is large.

Now it is easy, almost the easiest thing imaginable, for gentlemen on this floor—and I give them credit for good motives—to raise objections to an appropriation bill; to say that we have not got all the information which we desire; that we have not seen all the reports; that we want more time; that we want delay. Mr. Chairman, if the Committee on Appropriations waited, before it put in its bills, until every member of this House had examined all the reports and all the documents, and felt that he knew as much about it as he does of other subject-matters that have been submitted to his committee, no appropriation bill would ever be passed. Such would be the result of his objections.

Now, the Committee on Appropriations has matured this bill carefully, and has brought it forward here, and it is now being considered paragraph by paragraph. I am here, representing the committee, to explain in detail, if gentlemen have any difficulties about the details, so far as in my power, and my associates on the committee are also here. The Committee on Naval Affairs, which also has its attention called to matters affecting the Navy, is here. This bill is not prepared by that committee, of course; but still I do not know, it has not come to me that there is antagonism between the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Naval Affairs in reference to this bill.

I know that my five minutes are running out. I close by appealing to members here not to put off this bill, not to postpone it. We have been in session here for six weeks, and this is the first thing brought into the House in the direction of cutting down the estimates. Give us a fair chance.

Mr. CLYMER. I do not conceive that the remarks of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] have at all altered the position I assumed when up before. He still asserts that the bill is right, and that he knows it to be right, and that the other members of the Committee on Appropriations know it to be right. This may be so; but I say it is the common privilege of every member of this House to know for himself that it is right. While we do not wish to offer any factious opposition to any appropriation bill for the support of the Government, it is our right, as the representatives of the people, to know the data upon which these appropriations are based.

While I respect the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. SWANN,] who belongs to this side of the House, and upon ordinary subjects would receive his judgment with all the weight it deserves, yet it might not be that I and all the members here are to be governed by his ipse dixit. For the first time possibly in the history of the House a bill of so great importance as this has been presented for its consideration without a single iota of information upon which the House generally should act save the report of the Secretary of the Navy, and that report can only be obtained by applying to the Navy Department for it. I propose always in this House, if I am able to do so, to legislate understandingly. I say it is utterly impossible here and now to proceed understandingly with the consideration of this bill unless we have the reports of the various Bureaus, as I have indicated.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls the attention of the committee to the fact that no amendment is pending.

Mr. CLYMER. I was intending to renew my motion that the committee rise.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then to that motion I desire to say——

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not debatable.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will withdraw that motion——

Mr. CLYMER. I will, if the gentleman will renew it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will yield to him to renew it.

Mr. CLYMER. Then I withdraw my motion.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to strike out the word "dollars" for the purpose of replying to the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER.] He thinks the Committee of the Whole are without documents, without data sufficient to enable him to vote intelligently on this clause appropriating six and a quarter millions for the pay of the Navy. Permit me to refer him to a venerable document known as Statutes at Large of the United States.

If the gentleman will turn to page 334 of volume 16, and from the third to the seventeenth sections inclusive of the act approved July 5, 1870, a document that almost every lawyer in the country has had in his office for the last three years, he will see there laid down the exact number of enlisted sailors in the Navy authorized by law, the number of ensigns, the number of cadets at the Naval Academy, the number of masters, lieutenants, commodores, rear-admirals, admirals, and all that, and the pay per month that each one is authorized to receive. And if he will look into the Book of Estimates that has been before the House since its meeting he will find that we are asked for a little more than the amount fixed by law. But in this bill the Committee on Appropriations have cut down the estimates and given to the Department just exactly the amount the law requires for the full number of persons enlisted in the service, and no more—just what was given last year.

If he wants any better voucher than the actual statutes which point out both the number of officers and the rates of pay, then we are quite in competent to give him that intelligence. Such information is sufficient for me; and it has usually been sufficient for any member of the House of Representatives.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I rise to oppose the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] I am opposed to striking out the word "dollars." [Laughter.] If I recollect aright the action of this House the Army appropriation bill was made the special order for to-day, to be continued from day to day until disposed of; and I believe that if the motion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] should prevail and the committee should decide to rise, a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the Army appropriation bill would be in order. In regard to that bill we have from the War Department information as to estimates and appropriations for the military branch of the Government—such information as we do not possess in regard to the Navy Department. I ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] whether I am right in supposing that should the committee rise it would be in order to go into Committee of the Whole to consider the Army appropriation bill reported from the same committee?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I did not hear the gentleman's inquiry; my attention was diverted at the moment.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I desire to ask this: If the committee should now rise and the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill should be postponed, would it not be in order under the order of the House to make a motion to go into Committee of the Whole to consider the Army appropriation bill, which was made the special order for to-day, to be continued until disposed of?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have no doubt that it would suit the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PLATT] to take up the Army appropriation bill in preference to this; for there is a navy-yard in the gentleman's district, and there are no navy-yards cut down in the Army bill. [Laughter.] But the men on this floor who are not thoroughly "booked up" in reference to the Army bill are just as numerous as those who lack information concerning the naval bill; I venture to say they are more numerous.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I decline to yield to the gentleman further. [Laughter.] It is true I have a navy-yard in my district, and my constituents are deeply interested in this naval appropriation bill. It is for this reason I desire to possess all the information it is possible for me to obtain on this subject before I attempt to meet in Committee of the Whole the questions presented in this bill. I believe the committee will sustain me in saying that I would not be doing my duty to the constituents I represent if I did not insist that they should have the right to be heard, and that I should have the benefit of all attainable information before this matter is pressed to action in this House.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. What is the question before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to strike out the word "dollars."

Mr. CLYMER. I yielded the floor to the gentleman from Ohio on a condition.

Mr. GARFIELD. I intended to return the floor to the gentleman.

Mr. CLYMER. On the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio I beg leave to say a word.

The CHAIRMAN. On that proposition debate is exhausted.

Mr. CLYMER. Then I insist on my motion that the committee rise.

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw my amendment, and yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER.]

Mr. CLYMER. I insist on my motion that the committee rise.

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not debatable.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. CLYMER, there were—ayes 59, noes not counted.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I now move to amend the pending paragraph by striking out in lines 14 and 15 the words "at an average pay of $300 each per annum." This amendment is to correct a clerical error. It meets the point raised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] the other day. The language should not have been inserted, and the committee directed it to be struck out. as it might mislead, but it remained in the bill by an error of the clerk of the committee.

Mr. Chairman, as some question has been raised upon this matter of pay of the Navy, I want to say a few words upon it. As has been stated by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] the pay of everybody in the Navy, from admiral down to landsman, is fixed by law; and no Secretary of the Navy can vary that pay. All the payments must be according to the letter of the law.

While upon this matter, and directly in the same line, I wish to refer to a question raised yesterday by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.] Upon page 257 of the Estimates he discovered what he thought was an alarming fact—that while for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1873, the whole appropriations for the Navy were $6,250,000, yet in the first quarter there had been expended $5,035,818.90; and the gentleman urged that point with great vehemence. I said then I did not believe that the gentleman supposed the matter to have all the significance that he seemed to put upon it, although I am inclined to give him always credit for fairness in the treatment of facts coming before him. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman's point meant anything, it meant that during the first three months of the fiscal year the Secretary of the Navy had expended five-sixths of the appropriation for pay of the Navy; and that, as a result, he would come in with a deficiency of from fifteen to twenty million dollars. Why, sir, the pay of the Navy is a part of the subject-matter of the naval appropriation bill which is rigidly fixed by law; and a Secretary of the Navy who would make expenditures in that way, preparing for a deficiency to the extent that must have been indicated by the gentleman from Kentucky, would deserve the reprobation of the House, and worse than that.

Now, the fact in regard to it is this: at the beginning of each year, in the first quarter, the Treasury Department, in keeping its accounts, credits to the Navy Department under each head of appropriation. There is $6,250,000 credited entirely to the pay of the Navy. Now, in the first three months of each year—and every year shows it—the Secretary of the Navy draws a large proportion from the Treasury. Usually they charge it to him for pay. He does it for this purpose. The naval squadrons are all abroad. In time of peace we have nothing at home, and the money is disposed where the pay officers of the Navy can draw it. Therefore, when this large amount is drawn from the Treasury it is charged to the Navy Department against the pay item, and so appears upon the books. But so far from being expended by the Navy Department, this large amount drawn runs over nearly the whole year. The accounts of the fleets are not settled up until toward the end of the year. By that time it all comes in, and then the balance which is left in the Treasury is drawn. And the test of fairness, let me tell the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] the test of fairness and good judgment is, that at the end of the year the Secretary of the Navy never brings in a dollar of deficiency in the pay account. Is that explanation satisfactory to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. BECK. I desire to answer the gentleman in my own time. If the gentleman has concluded I will now go on to oppose the amendment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Has the gentleman any objection to this amendment being passed? It is only a verbal one.

Mr. BECK. Let me go on. I will oppose it pro forma. I wish to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. Chairman, I said yesterday that the Book of Estimates of the Treasury Department showed the fact that the pay of the Navy for the whole year was $6,250,000; and showed the further fact, in the language of the Secretary of the Treasury himself, that there had been expended during the first quarter of the fiscal year $5,038,000, leaving an available balance for the remaining three-fourths of the fiscal year of $1,214,000. That is the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury himself. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] thought he had discovered there was a mistake in the figures, and made a speech showing they had been transposed; that $1,214,000 had been drawn during the first quarter, leaving $5,000,000 for the remaining three quarters, and should have been included in the third column. That is now admitted to be a mistake on his part, and the fact remains as I stated it, that the $5,000,000 has gone out of the Treasury; beyond that we know nothing, except that over $5,000,000 have been taken out of the Treasury within the first three months of the fiscal year. That is not denied. Now the apology is that the Secretary of the Navy has to draw a large amount in order to get in hand money to pay for seamen during the three-fourths of the year. Why not allow it to remain in the Treasury of the United States until the Navy paymasters want it?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is mistaken. It is not drawn for the purpose of paying them for three months, but to pay them along for nearly the whole year.

Mr. BECK. Why draw three-fourths of the amount and put it into the pockets of paymasters of the Navy, instead of allowing it to remain in the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It is not put into the pockets of anybody.

Mr. BECK. It has gone out of the Treasury; that is certain. It has gone beyond the control of the Government into the hands of private officers. It is somewhere; it is beyond our control. Hence it was, seeing that this large sum of money had been drawn out of the Treasury, I called upon the Secretary of the Navy, or the House did at my motion, to tell us not only when he enlisted the men, but the amount of money he had expended prior to the 1st day of January, 1874; and to tell us how he expended the four millions of dollars we gave him this session. Why does he not answer that resolution of the House? He has had it since last Friday morning.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Let me tell the gentleman that the Secretary does not refuse to answer the resolution, and the only reason why he does not answer it at once is because there are some branches of the inquiry presented by the gentleman from Kentucky in reference to which information has to be obtained by sending out of the city, and as soon as he receives that information he will answer the gentleman's resolution. I am authorized by him to say that the answer will be full.

Mr. BECK. That shows the importance of the motion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER,] and is the reason why we should not pass this bill until we receive information in answer to the resolution of the House. The questions were simple. "How many of the fifteen hundred men have you enlisted?" The law does not allow any to be enlisted. "How much of the money given for the last fiscal year has been expended up to the 1st of January?" These questions he could answer in an hour. How much of the four millions of dollars given at this session has been expended, and for what purpose? Let him tell us that, and when that is done we can understand what our duty is.

Now we are told, when it appears that five millions out of the six have been drawn out of the Treasury within three months and gone somewhere, that we have to take the word of the gentleman managing the bill that it is in good hands, scattered about among the officers of the Navy, to pay men for three-quarters of the year. I want to know what was the necessity for drawing it; and, if it has been in their hands, how much of it has been paid out. When an extraordinary draft of that kind is made—for it is now admitted that it has gone from the Treasury; I was not in error; the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] is mistaken in that supposition; the Secretary of the Treasury can surely tell us how much was expended; and I say we are entitled to that information from the Secretary of the Navy before we vote $6,250,000 more.

The gentleman from Maine seems to think I am reflecting on the Secretary of the Navy. I never have reflected on him as regards his individual conduct. I am criticising his official conduct. I am requiring accountability of public officers strictly in accordance with law. That is all. If they have acted in accordance with law, it is all right; if they have not, we must try to make them. That is our duty.

The question being put on the amendment of Mr. HALE, of Maine, it was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 7 add the following:

And any person holding any office or appointment under the authority of the United States who shall contract for, authorize, or consent to any expenditure, within any fiscal year, over and beyond the appropriations for such year, for a purpose for which such appropriation may not have been specifically made, or who shall at any time contract for, authorize, or consent to any expenditure over and above appropriations made before such time, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $1,000 and not more than $10,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I freely admit that it is always desirable that we should have the fullest information possible. But I also agree with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] that it is utterly impossible, in reference to most appropriation bills, to furnish all the information that everybody wants. Now, I have much confidence in this committee. I find that in answer to an inquiry the Secretary of the Navy stated that $2,000,000, of the estimates could be safely cut down, but that he would not go further. I find that the Committee on Appropriations has gone further and has reduced the appropriations four millions below the estimates. I mean to give credit for sincerity to the Committee on Appropriations, and I mean to follow them in every reduction which they propose. And if any gentleman here will show by a statement of facts that there is any overwhelming reason, or any reason, why a further reduction still should be made, then I will vote for a further reduction. But I do not mean in any manner to factiously interfere with or obstruct any of these appropriation bills. And what I have said in regard to this bill will be, so far as my individual vote is concerned, my course as to all the appropriation bills. I have not introduced that amendment invidiously here, but I have introduced it simply because this is the first appropriation bill that has been offered in the House for action.

And now, as to the Secretary of the Navy, I have only to say in this connection that, so far as his conduct was concerned relative to the Cuban affair, it met with my highest approbation, and I feel now warranted in saying, knowing my own mind, that if he had pursued any other course, if he had shown the slightest lack of pluck in that matter, I should have condemned him with tenfold the vehemence with which I now say a word in favor of his conduct on that occasion.

I desire, without being invidious, that that amendment shall go into this bill, being the first appropriation bill brought before this House, and that we shall put an end, so far as the law can put an end, to the executive officers of the various Departments spending one dollar, or contracting for or looking in the future to the payment of one dollar, of indebtedness on the part of the Government beyond the appropriation that is made. If this had in the past been the law, many millions of dollars would have been saved; and it is my judgment that if we adopt it now many millions will be saved in the future.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Let me make a suggestion to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.] I do not raise the point of order on his amendment to shut it out because it is new legislation, for I think there is merit in the amendment; but it is an important matter, and, as having charge of the bill, I should desire to have an opportunity of examining it.

Mr. RANDALL. I am perfectly willing to have the amendment postponed for a little to allow gentlemen time to examine it.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I ask the gentleman to withdraw it for the present, and he can bring it up at some future stage of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to do so.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If my colleague withdraws his amendment, perhaps he will not be able to bring it up again.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I wish to make a remark upon it.

Mr. RANDALL. I should like to hear what the gentleman from Vermont has to suggest.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. For the purpose of putting myself in order I move to strike out the last word.

Whether this proposed amendment, or this proposed provision of law, is the best provision that can be put in such a bill as this to accomplish the purpose that is looked for or desired by the amendment, is a proper matter to be considered, as suggested by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] But that the purpose which this amendment seeks to accomplish is the proper one seems to me beyond all question.

Now what has been the experience of all gentlemen who have paid any attention to appropriations here in past Congresses?

I remember, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] who was at that time chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, will remember very well, that when the first proposition came in here to make an appropriation for the post-office in New York City, the gentleman who brought in that proposition did it with the limitation, express and particular, that the whole expense of that structure should not exceed a certain sum—$3,000,000 I believe—and not only that it should not exceed that sum, but that no dollar of the expenditure provided for should be paid out until the estimates and contracts had been made, which would make it possible to complete the structure within the estimate made at that time. Now we all know that that estimate has already been largely exceeded, and we know also that the structure is not completed; in fact I am not certain but that all the money then appropriated was expended before the structure got above the level of the streets in New York.

Sir, that is only one example of the way in which the Departments act in these matters. I do not speak now of any particular office or Government official. We start here by making an appropriation, with a limitation that the whole expense contemplated by that appropriation shall not exceed a certain amount; and the official who has it in charge seems really to snap his fingers in our faces. The Supervising Architect of the Treasury goes on and changes his plans and estimates and contracts, and draws money by millions out of the Treasury, which Congress, so far as it can do except by a penal statute, has prohibited him from doing.

Now, unless we enact, as this proposition does, that the officials of the Government shall not expend, nor contract for, nor consent to any expenditure, within any fiscal year, beyond the sum appropriated by Congress for that specific purpose, we shall never put a stop to these excessive expenditures of money and to the deficiency bills which come in here year after year, and in the middle of the year, calling on us to make large appropriations to meet the unauthorized contracts and expenditures of Government officials.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont. I agree that if his premises were correct, it should not only be made a case of fine and imprisonment for doing what he has stated has been done, but I should say it was a case for capital execution. But I desire to call his attention to one or two facts which are incorrect in his statement. In the cases of these great buildings like the New York post-office, the Cincinnati post-office, the Boston post-office, and other buildings of that class, we appropriate here every year only so much as will be expected to be spent during that year. For instance, if a building is to cost $3,000,000, we do not make a direct appropriation of $3,000,000, because, if we did, the building could not be completed within a year, and a portion of the appropriation would be covered into the Treasury. We therefore appropriate year by year what is necessary to be spent in that year. The consequence is that the building costs very much more than the money you intend to appropriate, and that is the case with the New York post-office. It was estimated that it would cost something like $3,000,000. We appropriated one million and a half, if I remember right, the first year, and we have been appropriating for it since.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will remember we have increased the number of stories in that building.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, Mr. Chairman, in view of the increased business of the city, requiring increased accommodations, Congress voted to put on another story to that post-office, and we increased the expense about one-quarter; so that the architect has of course exceeded his former estimate. I say that in justice to the officer, and I know that if my friend from Vermont had known the fact he would not have done that officer the injustice which his remarks contain. I agree that it is the habit of officials not to bring the cost of public buildings and other Government works within the original estimates. Now, if my friend from Vermont will get an architect to estimate for that new house he is going to build, I think he will find it necessary after he has had the estimate made to add at least 33 per cent. to it before his house is finished. That has been my experience. I never found an architect who would, could, or did estimate for a building for me that it did not cost from 25 to 33 per cent. more than the original estimate; and especially when, after I got his plans, I changed my mind, adding a little here and taking a little off there.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The gentleman will allow me to say that he can change his mind about such a matter in the morning without altering the law of the land, but when these officials change their minds they actually repeal the law of the land.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. In my case but one man changes his mind, but when Congress alters its mind two hundred and eighty men alter their minds two hundred and eighty times. [Laughter.] The officials have to obey the law of Congress, for no money can be drawn from the Treasury now, and no valid contract made, except in accordance with an appropriation by Congress. I am willing that any man shall be punished who violates that law; and I do not mean to oppose the amendment at all. I always like to have a bullet in my gun when I shoot. I like to have a penalty in the law for its violation.

But I rose now only in order to disabuse the minds of the Committee of the Whole in regard to the architect, who I look upon to be an honest, energetic, and very expensive man, [laughter;] but within the law, I think. He has been expensive in this, that he gives us very splendid structures, and gives us our money's worth, but he wants good structures all the time.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. DAWES. I renew the amendment merely to state that what my colleague [Mr. BUTLER] says is true—that we change the law. But that does not cure the evil. The evil is often brought upon us by the very determination of those having the administration of our law, to put things in such a condition that we are obliged to change the law.

Take, for instance, the case of the New York post-office. Just as soon as the limitation was put upon that building, we were informed by the architect that it would be impossible for him to build it for $3,000,000; in other words, he could not put up the building unless he had more than $3,000,000. We had so fixed the law that he could not make his contracts except he made them within the $3,000,000; and he went to work and put the thing in such a position that he convinced Congress that it was better to amend that law so as to spend $4,500,000.

Then Boston came in here and induced Congress to serve Boston as well as we had served New York. And when we put $1,500,000 into the Boston post-office, then Saint Louis, which had come here and said that they would build their public building for $300,000, and when we had made that appropriation, limiting the building to that amount, Saint Louis came to Congress, and said they were entitled to as good a building as Boston; that they were as important a city; and they induced Congress to turn around and make an appropriation of $1,500,000 for Saint Louis for a public building, when Saint Louis had offered to put it up for $300,000, and we had made the appropriation with that limitation.

No sooner had Saint Louis got $1,500,000 for that purpose, than Cincinnati came here and said that she was just as important a city as Saint Louis; and she got a public building with a limitation of $1,500,000. Then Chicago followed with a building limited to $4,000,000.

That is the way it came about. It is not a technical violation of the law on the part of the architect. I agree with my colleague [Mr. BUTLER] that he is the most accomplished architect in the United States; and so far as I know he is an honest architect. But he is the most extravagant man I ever had anything to do with in the way of furnishing money to. He believes in building his monuments all over the country. He is erecting monuments which will last, if they are ever finished, and will be an honor to the United States. But the effect of this policy is seen in the condition of the Treasury at this time.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BECK. I rise to oppose the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. A single word before the gentleman proceeds. I want to say only that my colleague [Mr. DAWES] has convinced me that our architect is a very smart one, and has great influence over members of Congress; that he is superior as an architect to members of Congress as members.

Mr. DAWES. I am glad my colleague is convinced of what everybody else knew all the time.

Mr. BECK. As I am so often charged with attacking somebody when I have no idea of doing so, I hope nobody will charge me with attacking the Supervising Architect of the Treasury in what I am about to say. I want to show the importance of passing the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] by showing how Congress has acted in regard to the works in charge of the Supervising Architect.

I am glad the cases of the New York and Boston post-offices have come up here. We passed a law for the erection of the New York post-office, and appropriated sums of money from time to time for its erection. In nearly every law we inserted and reaffirmed the following limitation:

Provided, That the building shall not begin until contracts have been entered into with the lowest responsible bidder for a sum not exceeding $3,000,000; and the expenditure of any sum in violation of this proviso shall be unlawful.

We made the same provision for Boston, and limited the expenditure on that post-office building to $1,500,000. We continued making appropriations for these different post-offices. I have here the exact data, the laws passed and the limitations fixed. We said that the New York post-office should not cost over $3,000,000, and the Boston post-office should not cost over $1,500,000. We gave to New York, besides the ground site, first $200,000, next $1,000,000, then $500,000, then $1,394,000, then $500,000, then $500,000 more, and then $1,900,000. We continued to make appropriations until the New York post-office has cost $5,994,897, independent of the ground, as I understand it.

We appropriated for the Boston post-office, first $500,000, then $250,000, then $942,000, then $76,278.75, then $800,000, and then $200,000; until Boston has now obtained $2,768,852. And all the time this Congress has been pretending to the country that the cost of the New York post-office was not to exeeed $3,000,000, and of the Boston post-office $1,500,000, and asserting and reasserting these limitations in the law.

The laws are violated in this way: Buildings are begun which cannot be completed for the amount fixed, and these pretended limitations are put in sometimes to deceive the country. The fact is, in these cases New York has received for her post-office nearly $6,000,000 and Boston nearly $3,000,000; and commissioners were sent the other day to Boston to see, I suppose, how much more we should give her. Nothing can be more obvious than that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] should prevail, (though I rose to oppose it formally,) and that we should prevent any man from going on and making the appropriations necessary by commencing the erection of buildings upon a scale that renders it absolutely necessary for Congress either to abandon the work or give him all the money he asks.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I hope that we shall now dispose of the pending amendment suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, not by withdrawing it, because thereby it might be liable to a point of order when renewed, but let it be regarded as pending, and be ordered to be printed. The proposition is in the direction in which I am desirous of legislating.

Mr. RANDALL. In the introduction of this proposition I did not dream of striking at any particular individual. It is a general proposition, and a safe one for us to adopt. As the debate may seem to have given the amendment some personal significance, I disavow any intention of reflecting on the Supervising Architect or anybody else. But if Congress wishes to legislate intelligently in the appropriation of the public money we must impose restrictions which will prevent any officers of the Government from going beyond the limits we prescribe.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Let the amendment be passed over for the present and be printed.

Mr. RANDALL. I will consent to that, if it be considered as pending.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let it be pending, and we can go back to it hereafter. We want a chance to look at it—to examine its verbiage.

Mr. RANDALL. During all this debate I have not heard a word of objection to my amendment. Still I am perfectly willing to accede to the proposition that it shall lie over.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts, as the Chair understands, withdraws his formal amendment.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I renew the amendment. I am sorry to occupy one moment of the time of the committee in the discussion of a question that I consider entirely foreign to the bill before us. I am surprised, and I regret, that a discussion upon public buildings should have been interjected here, when the subject for consideration should be confined to the bill before the committee.

In the outset of my remarks, I desire to say that so far as I have been able to catch the tenor and scope of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I am in favor of it. But I wish to meet here, at the same time and place that they have been made, some statements in regard to the public buildings of the country and the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department.

It has been stated here that the post-office building in New York City has cost nearly $6,000,000, though Congress in passing the original act for its erection provided that the expenditure should never exceed $3,000,000. That statement is true; and knowing full well the responsibility that I assume in what I am about to say, I declare to this Congress and to the people of the country that, costing as it has, nearly $6,000,000, that building is the cheapest public building we have ever had erected; the people of the country have obtained more for their money in this instance than in any other in this country. I will go further and say that the people of no country on earth have ever received more for an expenditure of this kind than our Government has received in this case.

The gentleman from Kentucky charges that the building of the New York post-office is an illustration of republican extravagance; that the republican party, while professing a desire for economy, have shown the insincerity of their professions by spending nearly $3,000,000 in the construction of this building at New York City. Sir, fortunately for us there is an opportunity to compare right here the manner in which a republican administration has expended money with the manner in which the party to which the gentleman belongs managed the expenditure of public money. I ask the people of this country to contrast the cost of erecting the New York post-office under a republican administration with the expenditure made in the erection of the court-house for the county of New York, which stands side by side with our post-office, and which was built under a democratic administration, by a commission appointed under democratic authority.

Mr. BECK. Those fellows have been put in the penitentiary. [Laughter.]

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Sir, I ask gentlemen to contrast the cost of the erection of public buildings constructed by the State of New York with the cost of public buildings erected in that State by the Government of the United States. Gentlemen who may make such an examination will get valuable information on this subject. Let them compare the cost of erecting the new State capitol at Albany, the construction of which has been done under the supervision of a commission, with the cost of erecting the New York post-office. Such has been the expense attending the erection of the New York State capitol that the governor of New York, in his last message, recommends that the direction of the work be taken out of the hands of the commission under whose charge the work has thus far proceeded, and that, together with the direction of other buildings, it shall be placed under the charge of a supervising architect.

In reply to the allegation that the present Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department is a very expensive and extravagant man, I wish to say that he gets more work done for the amount of money expended than any other architect I have ever known in this country. If any of the expenditures entering into the construction of our public buildings be compared with expenditures for similar purposes made by private individuals or corporations anywhere in this country, the comparison will be largely to the advantage of the Government in every instance. The economy in Government expenditures for public buildings is very manifest as compared with private expenditures for similar purposes.

Hurrying on in this discussion, as I must necessarily do, I will refer to but one other point. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that all the great public buildings which we shall require for many years to come are already erected or in process of erection. There are only a few in the very large cities of this Union that Congress can be called upon to erect in order to meet the wants of the Government or the people. The necessity may arise very soon for erecting new appraisers' stores and a custom-house at New York City—a work that must be done some time or other; and there are also some public buildings needed in the city of San Francisco. Apart from these two cases I do not now recollect any large city of the Union where for a long time to come the exigencies of the public service will demand the incurring of expenses such as have been necessary in these other cities.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Chairman, it would seem that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PLATT] and the Committee of the Whole have gone to sea on this Navy bill on the subject of public buildings. Let me bring the committee back to the subject before it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to all men, from every part of our common country, who are interested in the glory and honor of our flag, the protection of American commerce, and the ability of our gallant little Navy to cope with foreign powers that may be grander in the number of their war-ships, but not braver in the hearts of the men who man them, this bill is of peculiar importance and significance. The Committee on Appropriations, through the honorable gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] have reported to this House a bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1875. The aggregate appropriations asked for may seem large and uselessly prodigal to the uninitiated portion of our countrymen who have not had the requisite data to make up an intelligent or a correct opinion. But, sir, to those who are cognizant of the doings of the Navy Department, who are aware of its silent, unostentatious, but nevertheless active, preparations, it is a matter of astonishment and congratulation that the committee have been able to agree upon a bill cutting down so largely from former expenditures, and at the same time covering the legitimate needs of that Department for the current year.

Three million dollars reduction of expenses in one single Department of the Government is no mean item of retrenchment, and calls for commendation of the economy and watchfulness of the committee as well as the distinguished Secretary who has given his concurrence in this matter of reform.

For one, sir, I vote most cheerfully for this appropriation, and if needs be I should vote for additional appropriations. The Navy of the United States should be the boast of our American people. Stout arms and gallant hearts are enrolled to-day in the ranks of our Navy, but the rotten hulks and pigmy ships on which they are compelled to float and fight are a disgrace to this vast country, and a standing monument of the false economy of an American Congress.

Great Britain has a navy-yard greater than all our navy-yards combined. Every hammer and anvil in foreign yards may be ringing to-day with the strokes of laborers employed in fabricating ships and machinery to defend their flags; but we, threatened with war and with an inadequate navy, stand idly by, hugging the delusive phantom that arbitration, and protocols, and compromises can always avert war and strife.

The committee having this bill in charge have not appropriated an amount, in my opinion, adequate to carry on the works of building and improvement that I feel are necessary. But I suppose something must be yielded to the popular demand for cutting down the expenses of the Government. The probabilities are that it will be a false measure of economy; for, build as we may the castles of peace in our minds, there seems to be an unerring star of destiny slowly rising in the Gulf Stream sky and pointing with the relentless finger of fate to that little gem of an island that nature has made to hug our southern shores, and which sooner or later must be ours. If gentlemen are disposed to shut their eyes to impending facts, be it so; but for one, with an eye to economy, to future need, and to pressing present emergency, I shall support this bill.

Mr. HALE, of Maine, obtained the floor.

Mr. BECK. I ask the gentleman from Maine to give me a few minutes longer; I will not speak any more to-day, and I think I am making a pretty fair bargain for the gentleman.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. How much does the gentleman want?

Mr. BECK. Three minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. By all means let the gentleman from Kentucky go on.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the formal amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. BECK. What I wish to say is just this, and it is in reply to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. PLATT,] who thinks $6,000,000 for a post-office is no great thing. Let me direct his attention and that of the House to a fact which will be found in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, pages 14 and 15, that from the year 1791 to 1811, both years inclusive, the net ordinary expenses of the Government in the Army, Navy, for Indians, pensions, legislative, executive, and judicial departments—indeed all the net ordinary expenses of the Government—averaged $4,800,000 a year. We give, then, New York City $1,210,000 more for a post-office than the average expenses of the Government for the first twenty-one years of its existence, and yet it is said that is nothing. I believe we had democrats in New York who did expend money in all sorts of ways which I could never quite understand, but I also know this, that they are now in the penitentiary, [laughter,] and if you will send your fellows there perhaps we will get on a great deal better. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The discussion on this bill has run off into a discussion of public buildings, and I did not wish to interrupt it, because the gentlemen seemed to be very desirous of having their say on the subject. I would move, as this bill is not making any very great progress, and as there are other matters of importance to attend to, that the committee rise. And if in order, pending that, I will ask that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] be printed.

Mr. RANDALL. I agree to that.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let it be pending, but you cannot order the printing of an amendment in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDALL. I am perfectly willing to have it printed.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I ask for a vote on my motion that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. E. H. ROBERTS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the naval appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I now ask that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] which was moved to the naval appropriation bill in the Committee of the Whole, be ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HURLBUT. I now move that the House proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table, in order that we may take up and act on the amendment of the Senate to the salary bill.

The motion was agreed to.

OFFICIAL SALARIES.

The SPEAKER. The first bill upon the Speaker's table is a bill (H. R. No. 793) to establish the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates, returned from the Senate with the amendment which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert in lieu thereof, as follows:

That so much of the act of March 3, 1873, entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1874," as provides for the increase of the compensation of public officers and employés, whether members of Congress, Delegates, or others, (except the President of the United States and the justices of the Supreme Court,) be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and the salaries, compensation, and allowances of all of said persons, (except as aforesaid,) shall be as fixed by the laws in force at the time of the passage of said act: Provided, That mileage shall not be allowed for the first session of the Forty-third Congress; that all moneys appropriated as compensation to the members of the Forty-second Congress in excess of the mileage and allowances fixed by law at the commencement of said Congress, and which shall not have been drawn by the members of said Congress respectively, or which, having been drawn, have been returned in any form to the United States, are hereby covered into the Treasury of the United States, and are declared to be the moneys of the United States absolutely, the same as if they had never been appropriated as aforesaid.

Mr. HURLBUT. It was my fortune, sir, to introduce the bill which comes back amended by the Senate. I believe the bill which I introduced was just and fair as a measure of future compensation. I believed then, and believe now, that mileage was injudicious, discriminating, and unfair. But, sir, the Senate of the United States has sent back to us practically a new bill, restoring the status not only of the members of the House and of the Senate, but of all other officers and employés of the Government whose salaries were increased by the act of March 3, 1873, with the exception of the President of the United States and the judges of the Supreme Court, who are covered and protected by a constitutional provision. I propose to accept that measure as a measure looking to economy, and as a settlement, so far as I am concerned, of this vexed question. And, sir, I do not intend to stand here to lead in this measure, nor to stand at all upon the accidental position which I obtained in the House; because when this House has appointed a committee specially charged with the matter, the duties of which have not as yet been completed, I hold it to be decorous and proper that the committee, through its chairman, should take charge of this measure. I therefore yield the conduct of this measure on the floor, not as a matter of favor but as a matter of right, to my friend the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] as the chairman of that select committee.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] for his courtesy in the matter. I have no ambition, as he has shown none, to lead in the subject; certainly not to take up further time of the House. And as the best indication of the sincerity of this statement, and without comment—for I believe that not needed—and to bring a vote upon the bill itself as it reaches us from the Senate without further complication—and gentlemen know from the history of this session for the first month how dangerous such complications are—for these reasons I move, Mr. Speaker, that the House concur in the Senate amendment; and upon that I call the previous question.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to offer an amendment?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have said that I wished to avoid all complications, and therefore I cannot yield for an amendment, but call the previous question upon the Senate bill. If we begin to amend, if we begin to change what we have now before us, we will drift away, nobody knows where, and open the whole subject again. The bill is so nearly a clean, thorough, substantial repeal, that I believe we cannot do better than to take it.

Mr. DAWES. I would like the gentleman from Maine to permit me to offer an amendment which I will indicate. I desire to amend by inserting——

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I decline to yield.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman allow my amendment to be read?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I cannot. Two gentlemen, acting on this question in different directions, have already indicated a desire to offer amendments. If I once yield, I cannot resist the vast sea of amendments that will come in.

Mr. COX. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order to move a disagreement to the Senate amendment?

The SPEAKER. No such motion is ever made. To non-concur is to disagree. If the House wishes to non-concur it has simply to vote no. The Chair will explain the effect of the vote now to be taken. If the previous question is sustained the House comes directly to a vote on the question, will it concur in the Senate amendment? If it concur, that ends the matter.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to know whether, if the previous question is voted down, it will then be in order to move to concur with an amendment?

The SPEAKER. Of course; that will be in order if the previous question is not sustained.

Mr. COX. I desire to ask the Chair to explain what will next be the order of procedure if the House should non-concur in the Senate amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is impossible for the Chair to tell. That action of the House would leave the question quite open, and the Chair does not know what might occur then.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called, the House will come to a vote on the question of sustaining the call for the previous question. The Chair will indicate the gentleman from Maine, Mr. HALE, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. COX, as tellers.

Mr. COX. I do not wish to be put in the predicament, by acting as a teller, of being considered as being in favor of the House bill or the Senate bill. I want a better bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair only indicates the gentleman from New York so far as he believes the gentleman will make a good count.

Mr. COX. I will do that.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I desire to ask if the seconding the demand for the previous question will not cut off all amendments?

The SPEAKER. Of course.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 126, noes 57.

So the previous question was seconded and the main question was ordered, which was on concurring in the Senate amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the yeas and nays on the question of concurrence.

Mr. NEGLEY. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. At what time can the title of the bill be altered?

The SPEAKER. There is an amendment from the Senate to alter the title of the bill. That will be voted on last.

Mr. NEGLEY. The title should be, "A bill to restore the inequalities of the salary system."

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. NIBLACK. I ask that the amendment of the Senate be again read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair takes the liberty of remarking that it appears in full in print on the sixteenth page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD this morning. The Clerk will again read the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HAYS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to; there being—ayes 12, noes not counted.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on concurring in the Senate amendment, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CLYMER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Many members like myself, doubtless, are in favor of the reduction of the salaries to $5,000 who are opposed to the restoration of the mileage system. I ask if the question be divisible? If not, I shall be compelled to vote against the whole bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is not divisible.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 225, nays 25, not voting 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barber, Barnum, Bass, Beck, Begole, Bell, Berry, Biery, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Comingo, Conger, Cook, Corwin, Cotton, Crittenden, Crooke, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Danford, Davis, Dawes, DeWitt, Dobbins, Donnan, Dunnell, Durham, Eames, Eden, Elliott, Farwell, Field, Fort, Foster, Frye, Garfield, Giddings, Glover, Gooch, Gunckel, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Henry R. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Hathorn, Havens, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hereford, Herndon, Hersey, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Holman, Hoskins, Houghton, Howe, Hubbell, Hunter, Hunton, Hurlbut, Hyde, Kasson, Killinger, Knapp, Lamport, Lansing, Lawrence, Lawson, Leach, Lewis, Loughridge, Lowe, Luttrell, Lynch, Magee, Marshall, Martin, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Mellish, Merriam, Milliken, Mills, Mitchell, Monroe, Moore, Morrison, Myers, Neal, Nesmith, Niblack, Niles, Nunn, O'Brien, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, Perry, Phelps, Pierce, Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Potter, Pratt, Purman, Rainey, Rapier, Rawls, Read, Rice, Richmond, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Sessions, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, William A. Smith, Southard, Sprague, Stanard, Starkweather, Stone, Strait, Strawbridge, Swann, Thornburgh, Townsend, Tyner, Vance, Waldron, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, Wells, Wheeler, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William B. Williams, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, James Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, Woodford, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—225.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Averill, Barry, Clymer, Cox, Crossland, Hays, Hynes, Kelley, Kendall, Lamison, Morey, Negley, James H. Platt, jr., Randall, Shanks, Sloss, Standeford, Storm, Stowell, Todd, Waddell, White, Whiteley, and William Williams—25.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Barrere, Freeman Clarke, Creamer, Crocker, Darrall, Duell, Eldredge, Freeman, John T. Harris, Hooper, Jewett, Kellogg, Lamar, Lofland, Lowndes, Maynard, McJunkin, McLean, Phillips, Pike, Ransier, Ray, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Henry J. Scudder, George L. Smith, Snyder, Speer, Stephens, St. John, Sypher, Taylor, Thomas, Tremain, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—36.

So the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. SMALL. My colleague, Mr. PIKE, is detained at his home in New Hampshire by sickness. If he were present he would vote "ay."

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. My colleague, Mr. TREMAIN, is confined to his room by ill health.

Mr. TYNER. My colleague, Mr. WILSON, is absent by order of the House. If present he would vote "ay."

Mr. G. F. HOAR. My colleague, Mr. CROCKER, is absent on important business, and was not aware that this question would come up to-day.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. My colleague, Mr. KELLOGG, is absent on account of sickness in his family; if present he would vote "ay."

Mr. RANDALL. My colleague, Mr. SPEER, is necessarily absent from the House, but I think he will probably be here to-morrow morning.

Mr. FORT. My colleague, Mr. RAY, is absent; if present he would vote "ay."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. My colleague, Mr. CROCKER, is absent; I have no doubt that if here he would vote "ay," as we are all doing.

Mr. LOWE. My colleague, Mr. PHILLIPS, is absent, I presume on account of illness; if present he would vote "ay."

Mr. BURCHARD. My colleague, Mr. BARRERE, is absent on account of illness; if present he would vote "ay."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to reconsider.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in, and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in, and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir; I do not. I simply move to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must recognize the gentleman from Maine who has charge of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to move a reconsideration for the purpose of making a single inquiry of the chairman of the committee that had the original charge of this bill; and it is this: Whether the amendment of the Senate does not cut off the actual expenses of members in coming here?

Mr. GARFIELD. No, sir.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It does, for I have examined it carefully, and that is the disadvantage of legislating hastily.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. There was no haste in this case; we were ready for the question. I insist on my motion.

The question was taken upon Mr. HALE'S motion, and it was agreed to.

So the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

The question recurred upon the following amendment of the Senate to the title of the bill:

Amend the title so as to read: "An act repealing the increase of salaries of members of Congress and other officers."

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HALE, of Maine, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution H. R. No. 35, filling existing vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution; when the Speaker signed the same.

INDIAN DEPREDATIONS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in compliance with the act of May 29, 1872, transmitting sundry claims for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

OFFICIAL REPORTERS OF CONGRESS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. No. 795) making an appropriation to pay the salaries of the Official Reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House of Representatives, returned from the Senate with amendments.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that that bill, with the amendments of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am instructed by the Committee on the Rules to report to the House the resolution I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. RANDALL. That is so important that I suggest to the gentleman to bring it in in the morning, when it will be better understood.

Mr. GARFIELD. It can be understood now; let it be read.

Mr. RANDALL. It is the most important rule that has been introduced for twenty years.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Rule 112 be amended so as to read as follows:

All bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriations to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, shall be first considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARFIELD. The substance of this rule was introduced by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] It was considered by the Committee on Rules, and has been reported back in a somewhat modified form, but retaining, I believe, the substance of all originally embraced in it. Before drafting this rule we considered the old rule, in order to add to the old rule what would accomplish the desire of the gentleman.

I believe it will be a great help, in controlling the appropriation of money and other property, to adopt this proposed amendment. Now if we have a bill pending to appropriate land or any piece of property, it is not open to the point of order that it makes an appropriation, and therefore must be first considered in Committee of the Whole. For instance, a bill that does not in terms appropriate money, but which authorizes money to be used out of some appropriation for a general purpose, would not be liable to the rule as it now stands. As we propose to make the rule, all these cases would be included, I think.

Mr. DAWES. The present rule does not cover bills directing the payment of money out of appropriations to be made.

Mr. GARFIELD. It does not. It has been the habit, very much on the increase, to seek to evade the rule requiring appropriation bills to be considered in Committee of the Whole, by providing in the bill that the money shall be paid out of some appropriation already made or hereafter to be made for some general purpose. Under the rules as they have been administered it has been held that such a bill does not contain an appropriation. We now propose that even such a case as that shall come under the rule, and a point of order can send it always to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOLMAN. This original proposition came before the House from the Committee on War Claims. I simply brought the question to the attention of the House at the request of that committee.

Mr. CONGER. Will this proposed rule cover cases of bills coming back from the Senate with appropriations added?

Mr. GARFIELD. I suppose so. Of course all the regular appropriation bills must now go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. Suppose the Senate puts an appropriation on some other bill?

Mr. GARFIELD. It does not affect the ordinary custom of general appropriation bills, for they must all go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. I think the rule should include the class of cases to which I have referred.

Mr. MAYNARD. Allow me to call the attention of my colleague upon the committee [Mr. GARFIELD] to the word "consider," which he has substituted in place of the word "discussed." The word "discussed" is the word in the original rule, and it has received such a construction for many years past.

Mr. GARFIELD. It should have been "discussed."

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct that word to be changed.

Mr. RANDALL. You recollect, Mr. Speaker, that we agreed to that in committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. "Discussed" is the proper word.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will also suggest to the gentleman from Ohio to amend by saying that Rule 112 be amended by adding thereto what is here proposed. The old rule reads as follows:

All proceedings touching appropriations of money shall be first discussed in Committee of the Whole.

The proposed rule goes somewhat into elaborate detail as to the nature of the appropriation. It is not in conflict with the old rule of 1794, and by adding it we will preserve that rule.

Mr. NIBLACK. Will not this new rule require that all bills for the payment of claims shall be first considered in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. GARFIELD. This will carry all bills—pension bills, claim bills, all kinds of private bills that grant money or property in any form to individuals—into the Committee of the Whole House.

I called the attention of the Committee on the Rules, and I may say it here without any impropriety, to the fact of the growing disuse during the past few years of the Committee of the Whole House. Up to eight or ten years ago, certainly fifteen years ago, a very large share of all the business of the House of Representatives was done in Committee of the Whole. I am sure that the Speaker is right in saying that that is the safest way to legislate; where, under the five-minute rule, we debate item by item, considering carefully the clauses and phrases used in the bill, then reporting the bill back to the House with all this careful sifting, and then having the House act upon it. That is a much safer method of legislation than the method where everything is done in the House either by unanimous consent or under the previous question.

The rule now proposed to be adopted will throw a very large share of work upon the Committee of the Whole which is now being done in the open House. In that respect we will be returning, as has been suggested, to what is the older and better practice of the House of Representatives.

I call the attention of the House to that as one of the effects which I think likely to result from the adoption of this proposed rule.

Mr. DAWES. With the consent of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] I wish to illustrate the consequences which have resulted from the disposition to avoid the rule by charging new appropriations upon general appropriations already made. A few years ago, during the last hours of a session, there came in here a bill to pay the expenses of detecting those who had been engaged in the assassination of President Lincoln and the attempt upon the life of Secretary Seward. In order to avoid the reference of the bill to the Committee of the Whole, that appropriation was charged to the contingent expenses of the State Department. Thus the contingent fund of that Department was charged with the expense of hunting up those who attempted the murder of the Secretary of State himself! In that way, without the knowledge of the Department, the contingent fund was appropriated; so that after Congress adjourned that fund was found to have been absorbed in that manner.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR.]

Mr. G. F. HOAR. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this proposed amendment to the rules is one of the most important measures that can be devised toward the restoration of the House of Representatives to its rightful place of dignity and power under the Constitution of the United States. When the First Congress was about to meet, Mr. Madison, having his choice between the Senate and House as his field of public service, declined to enter the Senate, preferring to take a place in the House. Of the two statesmen from Connecticut, whose eminent connection with the revolutionary period of that State has just been recognized by placing their statues in the hall formerly occupied by this House, both, although at the time advanced in political life, selected a seat in this House in the First Congress in preference to a seat in the Senate. Many other instances could be given showing how this body was regarded in the early history of the Government. The change which has occurred in this particular is owing, not wholly, not chiefly, to the increase of the number of members in this body, but much more largely to the deprivation of the right of debate under the rules of the House.

The House of Representatives is to-day a sort of presbytery. Its business on all important subjects is controlled by a few of its senior members, who, holding places on leading committees, have the power practically to determine what measures of legislation shall be presented for the consideration of the House; who shall speak upon those measures; how long they shall speak; and what amendments shall be admitted. The House, it is true, may control this right by a refusal of the previous question when it is called; but this is a control rarely exercised. The result is that individual members, apart from their position as committeemen, have no opportunity to shape legislation, to offer amendments, or to defend their opinions or votes before their fellow-members or before the people of the country.

The power thus exercised by a few is not accompanied, as it should be, by a proper measure of responsibility. In the English House of Commons the executive officer who represents the government in matters of finance or of law, or with respect to the army and navy, is upon the floor; and although the leaders of the House of Commons control legislation and debate even more than the leading men in this body control our proceedings, yet, as the general of an army is held responsible for its direction, so the English nation holds the individual leader responsible for any measure which he may carry through. This House presents the anomaly of a body composed of equals in the eye of the Constitution, yet having certain leaders, the responsibility for whose action rests, not on themselves, but on the House.

Now, as the Speaker has justly observed, (if he be correctly reported,) the tendency in recent years has been more and more to take the business of the House out of the Committee of the Whole, where the right of debate is equal, where the opportunity for offering amendments is equal, and to put it in the morning hour, where the committees are crowding one another, where the committee having charge of any bill determines who shall speak, and for how long; what amendments shall be considered by the House, and in fact exercises complete control over the measure. The tendency of the rule now proposed will be to restore the House to its rightful place; to reinvest it with dignity, power, responsibility, capacity for independent action under the Constitution—in a word, to place it again in its true position of equality with the Senate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield three minutes to my colleague, [Mr. LAWRENCE.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. I desire to say only a word on this subject. The original proposition for this rule, as referred to the Committee on the Rules, came from the Committee on War Claims. My friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is entitled exclusively to the credit of suggesting the rule to that committee; but when it was suggested, it was very fully and carefully considered by the committee and they decided to recommend it to the House. I trust it will be adopted, as I have no doubt it will be.

I wish to call attention to the scope of the rule. It applies not only to bills which call for and require appropriations, but to all bills which may result in appropriations. If a bill shall require, after its passage, an appropriation to carry it into effect, such a bill will, under this rule, be required to go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is probably giving the proposed rule too wide a latitude.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I understand that to be the effect of it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires that the rule shall not be misunderstood.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I wish to put a question to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE.] I understand him to hold that, according to the scope of this rule, any bill which may involve, however remotely, the possibility of an appropriation will necessarily be required to go to the Committee of the Whole. Now, suppose the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds should report a bill providing for the construction of a public building, but making no appropriation for the purpose, (leaving it to the Committee on Appropriations to report the necessary appropriation,) must that bill, according to the gentleman's view, be first discussed in Committee of the Whole before coming under consideration in the House?

Mr. LAWRENCE. The construction which I understood the Speaker to give the amended rule is, I believe, the correct one.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to give his construction of the scope the rule will have as it is proposed to be amended; but he does not desire to interrupt the gentleman from Ohio who is upon the floor.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I am sure the House will be glad to hear the Speaker. Undoubtedly the construction which the Chair gives to the rule is correct. I supposed the rule, as I heard it read at the Clerk's desk, would go to the extent I have stated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will announce what construction he would give to the rule, and what he understands it to be, if amended as proposed.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The rule would not go as far as I stated. It is an important one, and will, I think, furnish safeguards to prevent hereafter any improper appropriation. It will give to the Committee of the Whole a dignity and an importance which it has not heretofore had. It will prevent money bills from going through which ought not to go through. It will get information to the House which could not be obtained by any other means.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now ask the Chair, if he please, to give to the House the construction which he places upon this rule as it is proposed to be amended.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has given considerable attention to the subject embraced in this rule, and will be glad to communicate to the House his understanding of the scope of the proposed amendment, because it is proper he should take part in the discussion in regard to the rules.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope we may have order, so we can hear the Chair's remarks.

The SPEAKER. The rule which this proposes to amend bears date November 13, 1794, and in its language is very broad and comprehensive: "All proceedings touching appropriations of money shall be first discussed in a Committee of the Whole House." Now it is the belief of the Chair, if that rule were to-day before the House without having received the constructions which it has from previous Presiding Officers, that it embraces everything proposed by the amendment. "All proceedings touching appropriations of money." That language makes the rule very wide, and was undoubtedly intended to embrace everything involving an expenditure from the public Treasury. But, as gentlemen of the House are well aware, it has received a series of constructions within the last thirty years, so that its construction has now been determined. We are familiar with bills brought in here involving "an appropriation to be hereafter made." That is a very common phrase. Then another form is, "to be paid out of some appropriation already made." Both of these, in the judgment of the Chair, are very clear and palpable evasions of the spirit of that rule of 1794. The scope of the present rule is to cure those defects. Whenever a gentleman has a proposition which involves payment from the public funds it shall, and of right ought to be discussed in the Committee of the Whole, unless the House by unanimous consent shall otherwise direct. That is the scope of the rule.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] whom the Chair took the liberty to interrupt gave this a construction which the Chair probably would not enforce. There might be, for instance, a bill for the establishment of an educational system, like that the further consideration of which has been postponed until the third Tuesday of March next, and there may be various other measures which in their ultimate effect would require the expenditure of money, but which do not involve a direct appropriation. Indeed, you can scarcely bring in any legislation which, directly or indirectly, will not involve somehow or other expenditure of money. The Chair would not give the rule in reference to those propositions such construction, for that would take from the House everything which belongs to the open House. The rule is intended to cure the defect of construction of bills which do directly involve the appropriation of money; and to that extent the Chair has no hesitation in saying he regards the rule as a most valuable improvement upon the present practice.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It will of course refer to claims.

The SPEAKER. Of course, and to all pension bills.

Mr. LAWRENCE. And appropriations of property?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir; and everything of that kind.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask the Chair to allow me a single question as to the effect of this rule. Suppose a bill is brought in here to take some fund which does not come from appropriation of money. I have in my mind the Japanese fund, for instance, which is now in the State Department.

The SPEAKER. It is not in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Or the Geneva award?

The SPEAKER. Nor is that in the Treasury of the United States. The Chair would not hold the Geneva award should, under the rule, go to the Committee of the Whole, because it does not lie in the Treasury of the United States in the sense intended by the rule.

Mr. CONGER. Let me ask the Chair what would be the construction of the rule in reference to the appropriation of lands, which are not in the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it does include lands, because the language is, "all bills making appropriations of money or property belonging to the United States."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is land.

The SPEAKER. Of course—property belonging to the United States; but in the case put by the gentleman from Massachusetts where there is a separate fund under the law, belonging, not to the United States, but to somebody else, which is in the custody of the United States, it would not, in the judgment of the Chair, come within the operation of the rule.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I should like to hear the answer of the Chair to the question of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] as to the public lands.

The SPEAKER. Any proposition to donate or appropriate public lands the Chair would hold would, under this rule, necessarily go to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to ask the Chair this further question. Suppose a bill came back from the Senate with an appropriation grafted upon it, not originally put there by the House, whether there had been or had not been an appropriation made in the House, and the question came up here on concurrence, would such a case as that come under this rule?

The SPEAKER. Of course. It has always been the rule that if the Senate put on an amendment which, if an original proposition, would require to be discussed in Committee of the Whole, an objection carries the whole bill to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. Does that hold if the change is merely an increase?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir; the effect is the same.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Does the Chair say that a fund which is the legal property of the United States, which can be disposed of solely by its authority, part of which is absolutely claimed by the United States as its own, such as the Geneva fund, is not the property of the United States under this rule?

The SPEAKER. In regard to that particular matter, the case of the Geneva award, the Chair takes it that that fund is not money in the Treasury of the United States. It is property, but not property belonging to the United States in that sense; and it is specifically certified by the Treasury not to be so. The Chair, however, begs to remark that cases of that kind are necessarily very rare, and are not likely to come up to interfere with legislation under this rule.

Mr. GARFIELD. Of course, as the cases arise, the Chair will hear discussion as to their coming or not coming under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would further remark that he does not support the action of the Committee on the Rules in this matter with any desire of avoiding labor on his part in this House. And he would seek to enforce the remark of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the amount of business done in the House now, compared with former years, is a growing evil. The Chair does think that the great bulk of the business of this House ought primarily to be done in the Committee of the Whole as it was for fifty years after the organization of the Government.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield for a minute to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. PLATT.]

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. From the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] who reported this resolution, and of his colleague, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] the chairman of the Committee on War Claims, I would infer that this is one of the most important measures that has been presented to Congress, certainly since the commencement of this session, and one, therefore, that ought to be very carefully considered. I am in favor of the adoption of the proposed rule as I now understand it; but it is so important in its possible results that I think the House ought to have a full opportunity of very carefully examining it before acting upon it.

I understood the Speaker to say that he would give, under certain circumstances, certain constructions to this rule. Those are perfectly satisfactory to me. But what security have we that the gentleman who might happen to occupy the chair in the absence of the present incumbent, or who might succeed the present incumbent, might not give an entirely different ruling, and give the rule all the scope and all the importance ascribed to it by the chairman of the Committee on War Claims, which considered and first reported this matter? I wish to have the subject carefully considered, and desire to have action on it postponed until, at least, it can be printed and members have an opportunity of fully considering the question. I therefore move that the present resolution be postponed and the resolution printed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not yield to the gentleman for the purpose of making a motion.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. The gentleman yielded to me without any condition.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yielded to the gentleman one minute for debate only.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I am willing to abide by the decision of the Chair. I understood that the gentleman yielded to me unconditionally.

The SPEAKER. It is the uniform practice of the House that a gentleman entitled to the floor for one hour, if he yields his time to other members, has himself the right to announce the conditions on which he yields. And of course in the first hour another gentleman to whom he yields could not move an amendment or make any motion unless the floor was yielded to him for that purpose.

Mr. GARFIELD. The rule has been so very fully debated and so clearly expounded that it seems to me it must be as well understood as a rule can be understood. As now drafted, at the suggestion of the Speaker, it incorporates both the old rule and the new in one. I must now call the previous question on its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the proposed rule as it now stands, incorporating the rule of 1794 with the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Rule 112 to read as follows:

All proceedings touching appropriations of money, and all bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriations to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, shall be first discussed in Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will make one single remark, that the House may clearly understand the effect of the rule. It is a matter of great importance upon the point brought up by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] that notice should be taken of the effective significance of the word "requiring." The construction which the gentleman from Ohio was giving it would imply that the word was "involving." The Committee on Rules made a distinction between the two. A bill that might ultimately involve an appropriation is not a bill requiring an appropriation, and there is the distinction between the words. The Committee on Rules purposely put in the word "requiring."

Mr. LAWRENCE. I think that was right.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask consent to say a single word. This rule is substantially in its terms what Rule 112 was during the period of my first service in the House. Then all pension bills and all bills for private relief went to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and that calendar became frequently quite voluminous, so much so that a great many of the cases upon it never were reached. The effect of the adoption of this rule—and gentlemen may possibly have suggested it with that view—will be to prevent the passage of a very large percentage of the private bills reported from the Committee on Pensions and the other committees having charge of private claims. I have no doubt that that will be the result, and gentlemen, no doubt, will vote upon the question with that view, and to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment to the rules was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DUELL] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAY] desire to make some explanations in reference to their votes on the salary bill.

Mr. DUELL. I desire to inquire how my name is recorded on the Senate amendment to the salary bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not recorded as voting.

Mr. DUELL. I voted when my name was called, and voted in the affirmative, but I was not present when the roll-call was read. My colleague, [Mr. LAWSON,] who sits by me, heard me vote on the question.

Mr. RAY. I desire to say that I was absent at the time the vote was taken, being over at the asylum to see an inmate there. If present I should have voted "ay."

The SPEAKER. These statements will go into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but the Chair does not feel authorized to have the names placed on the roll.

Mr. DUELL. I ask unanimous consent that, under the circumstances, my name be placed upon the list.

Mr. DAWES. I suppose that when the Journal is read to-morrow these gentlemen can correct it if it is not done to-night, and that the gentleman from New York can insist upon his name going upon the record.

Mr. DUELL. I ask unanimous consent to have it done now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs to call the attention of the House to this fact, that this involves the question whether a gentleman's name may be entered on the list after the vote has been recorded and announced and the result carried by one vote. If it becomes a matter of right, it may afterwards be used to the great inconvenience of the House.

Mr. DAWES. I suppose the object of reading the roll-call is to see if the record is made correctly, and that a member has a right to have it corrected in case it is incorrect?

The SPEAKER. He has a right to have his name recorded if he gives attention when the names are read over. That is the very purpose for which the names are read; but there evidently the right ceases. It is because the gentleman from New York probably did not give attention to the reading of the roll-call at the Clerk's desk that this error occurred. The right must end somewhere, and the Chair thinks that it ends there.

Mr. DUELL. I was called out by a person who wished to see me outside.

The SPEAKER. That is the gentleman's misfortune. The rule cannot be altered to meet a case of that kind.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Before the Journal is made up, is it not in the power of the House to direct it to be made up according to the facts, and the fact is that the gentleman voted?

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Massachusetts will observe that the rules have prescribed the mode of ascertaining and recording the facts.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. But I understand the fact is certified to both by the gentleman himself and by a colleague who heard him vote. My claim is, that until the Journal is finally made up and read to-morrow morning, it is in the power of the House to correct it, and have it made up according to the facts; and that although the reading of the roll-call was for the purpose of ascertaining that the names had been correctly recorded, still, if the placing the gentleman's name on the list does not alter the result, the House in its discretion may correct the Journal.

The SPEAKER. If the amendment of the Senate had been concurred in by one majority, how would the gentleman uphold that right?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Undoubtedly, if the amendment had been concurred in by one majority, it would be in the power of the House, the fact being ascertained, to amend the Journal, and have all its subsequent proceedings set right. But if it changed the result, the House would undoubtedly exercise great caution in the use of that discretion.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman does not place it on the ground of the absolute right of the member; because if it be the absolute right of the member to have that change made, it could not be in the discretion of the House.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I put it upon the ground of the right of the House at any time before the Journal is made up and closed to-morrow morning to direct it to be made up according to the fact. That is the right which exists in every court and in every body under the sun which records its proceedings. It is a universal law.

Mr. DAWES. It is not a Jnaourl of any particular member; it is a Journal of the House; and the House has authority over its own Journal.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to ask a parliamentary question. It is, whether a member, having lost his right under the rule, as stated by the Chair, is it in the power of the House to reclothe him with such right even by unanimous consent?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Will the Chair entertain a motion directing that in making up the Journal the vote of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUELL] shall be recorded in the affirmative?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would rather have that motion submitted when the Journal shall be read, to let the question go over until to-morrow morning. The Chair cannot help warning the House that upon a proposition which was concurred in with great unanimity, a very grave precedent may be set in regard to changing the record of votes.

Mr. RANDALL. I would ask the Chair to rule upon the point of order which I raised. It is, whether the right of a member under the rule having ceased, as stated by the Chair, can he be reclothed with that right even by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The roll having been called, those not answering on the first call are afterward allowed an opportunity to vote by rising and requesting it. Then, for the purpose of certification of the record, the roll is read aloud at the Clerk's desk to see whether gentlemen have voted, and, if so, have been recorded properly. The vote is then announced, and then, so far as any correction is involved, it is accomplished.

Mr. MELLISH. Will the Chair state what are the precedents on this subject?

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows no precedent to contradict that.

Mr. MELLISH. Would it not be dangerous to establish such a precedent now?

The SPEAKER. It would be dangerous to allow a vote to be recorded by the understanding of a member himself, or of those who happen to sit where he was.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the Chair decide my point of order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided it; the Chair agrees with the gentleman.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I ask the Chair to have read the last sentence of Barclay's Digest, on page 226.

The SPEAKER. That relates to an erroneous record.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Let it be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read it.

A member has a right to have an erroneous record of his voting corrected after the announcement of the result of a vote.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Is it not the same whether the record records him erroneously as not voting, or as voting the wrong way?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Then if the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUELL] was recorded as having voted "no," he would have the right now to have the record changed; but being recorded as not voting at all he has not the right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to have the matter go over until to-morrow morning, to be settled when the Journal is read.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the Chair look into the question I have raised?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BANNING: Resolutions of the Cincinnati Board of Trade, against the repeal of the bankrupt law.

By Mr. CHAFFEE: Ten petitions from citizens of Colorado, asking the passage of an act to enable the people to form a State government, and for admission as a State.

Also, petitions asking that the branch mint at Denver be put upon a coinage basis.

By Mr. CROSSLAND: A petition of the mayor of Columbus, Kentucky, and sundry other citizens, for the relief of the Southern Methodist publishing house at Nashville, Tennessee.

By Mr. DOBBINS: The memorial of Robert Sinnickson, of New Jersey, praying for a disposition of the public lands in the interest of labor.

By Mr. DUELL: The petition of Sewall B. Corbett, asking payment for property used and occupied during the war of the rebellion.

Also, the petition of William B. Lacy, for the same.

Also, the petition of Lott W. Crocker, for the same.

By Mr. ELKINS: A petition of citizens, asking for the establishment of a post-route from Las Vegas, New Mexico, to Center Station, Texas; and also a bill to establish the same.

By Mr. MELLISH: The memorial of Mrs. Matilda Leipsker, of the city of New York, widow of Joseph B. Leipsker, for redress for the wrongs sustained at the hands of the authorities of Peru, and claiming a restoration of her late husband's property; the facts alleged being that on the 4th of November, 1870, the said Joseph B. Leipsker was robbed and assassinated on the road from Paita to Puira in the republic of Peru, South America, by Joseph Varea, chief of the police of Paita; that at the time said Leipsker was peacefully engaged in his ordinary business and under the apparent protection of the armed police of Paita.

By Mr. MONROE: The petition of M. Spahu and others, representatives of the Bricklayers' Association of the District of Columbia, asking for relief.

By Mr. E. H. ROBERTS: The petition of Mary Costello and minor children for pension.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 14, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in obedience to a resolution of the Senate, the number of officers and employés in or connected with the Department of the Interior who have been furnished with official postage-stamps; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WEST presented the petition of Mary C. Haile, widow of Captain C. M. Haile, late of Company C, Fourteenth United States Infantry, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WADLEIGH presented the petition of James H. Hall and others, citizens of Brookline, New Hampshire, praying the establishment of a new post-route from Brookline, New Hampshire, to Townsend, Massachusetts; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented the petition of Almus Fairfield and others, citizens of New Hampshire, praying the establishment of a new post-route from Antrim to North Branch, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of citizens of Oregon, praying Congress for a grant of alternate sections of public land to the extent of six sections in width, to aid in the construction of a military wagon-road from the terminus of the military road from Roseburgh to Coos Bay to the California line, along the coast, by the most available route, via Port Orford and Ellensburgh; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of Elisha E. Rice, formerly commercial agent for the United States at Hakodadi, Japan, praying remuneration for certain real estate, with improvements thereon, in in Hakodadi conveyed to the United States Government by request of the Department of State, but for which he has not been paid; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, presented the memorial and petition of A. J. Cotten and M. S. Cotten, sole heirs of the late John Smith, Washington, North Carolina, praying indemnity for the spoliations committed by the French prior to the year 1801; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, asking the attention of Congress to the inefficiency of the merchant marine of the United States, calling attention to the fact that the city of New York is about to establish a nautical school, expressing the belief that several sea-board States will do the like if properly encouraged, and praying, first, that the Secretary of the Navy may be authorized in his discretion to supply for such nautical schools vessels of the Navy, which can be conveniently spared therefor, and to detail or permit officers of the Navy to act as presidents, superintendents, or instructors thereof; and second, that the system of government and discipline of American merchant vessels may be carefully revised, with a view to elevate the character of the service, and to correct the disorders and demoralization that now prevail, and to guard the responsibilities of command of such vessels by proper examination and enrollment of masters and mates, and by prompt and full reports upon and accountability for disasters to life and property at sea. I move the reference of this memorial to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask to state, because the paper which has been sent to me and which I hold in my hand, is not, I believe, under the rules of the Senate, in order as a petition, that the Buffalo Board of Trade wish to make a correction in a memorial recently sent here and presented by me, touching the enrollment of canal-boats. I move that this paper which I now submit, although not a petition, but a part of a petition, may be referred to the Committee on Commerce, to go with the petition to which it relates.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT. I present the memorial of the Indianapolis Woman Suffrage Association. Though a memorial, it is in the nature of a remonstrance. They protest against the passage of a bill which has been offered in the Senate, limiting suffrage in the Territories to male citizens. I do not know to what committee that bill was referred, but I presume to the Committee on Territories. I move, therefore, the reference of this remonstrance to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. PRATT, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Samuel S. Potter be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. RAMSEY. A few days since, inadvertently no doubt, a memorial of the Legislature of Kansas, asking for an increase of mail service in that State, was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. I am authorized to report it back and to ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be transmitted to the Postmaster-General, to whose Department it more properly belongs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee will be discharged, if there be no objection.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, to whom was referred the petition of citizens of Omaha, Nebraska, praying the establishment of a branch mint at that place, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 16) supplemental to the act entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 177) relating to the public lands in the State of California, reported it with amendments, and moved that the amendments be printed, and the bill re-referred to the committee; which was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. The Committee on Claims have directed me to report back the petition of Julius Frank, praying compensation for sutler's supplies seized by order of General Thomas in 1864, with a written report that the claim ought not to be allowed. I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered if there be no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. I would ask, instead of being indefinitely postponed, that the report that the claim ought not to be allowed be adopted, and the committee discharged from its further consideration. I do so for the reason that it is a case in which there was a former adverse report, and the desire of the committee, in which I know the Senator from West Virginia concurs, is that the withdrawal of these papers for the purpose of referring them again after there has been an adverse report should be stopped; and the language of the forty-ninth rule requires that the report of the committee shall be adopted in order to accomplish that result. I hope the Senator will withdraw the motion to postpone indefinitely.

Mr. DAVIS. The chairman of the Committee on Claims is undoubtedly correct; but my idea was that an indefinite postponement would carry it over this Congress at least. I accept the suggestion of the chairman of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee.

The report was adopted.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 68) for the relief of Hiram Prather, late lieutenant-colonel of the Sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 69) for the relief of William H. Vesey, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOUTWELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Caroline L. Hoey, of Carrollton, Louisiana, praying compensation for property taken and destroyed by the United States Army in 1862, 1863, and 1864, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of W. C. Williams, of Brooklyn, New York, respecting money paid by him for a substitute in the Army when he was deaf and not liable to service, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of M. C. Mordecai & Co., praying compensation for mail service between Charleston, South Carolina and Havana, Cuba, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Elijah Fuller, Alfred Spates, and others of Alleghany County, Maryland, praying for compensation to George Herring for property taken for the Army during the late civil war, reported adversely thereon.

The reports were adopted.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Dr. Edward Jarvis, praying compensation for services rendered by him in the preparation of the United States census for 1850, reported a bill (S. No. 302) for the relief of Dr. Edward Jarvis.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCOTT. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims to report back the petition of A. J. Sypher, of Louisiana, praying compensation for certain lumber which he alleges was taken by the United States and used, and to ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, on the ground that there is no evidence accompanying it whatever to support it.

The report was adopted.

Mr. SCOTT. I am also instructed by the same committee to report back the petition of Thomas F. Bowler, praying indemnification for losses and damages sustained by the annulment of his contract for carrying the mails from Neosho, Missouri, to Albuquerque, New Mexico, in 1859, with the report that the claim ought not to be allowed; and I ask that this report be adopted.

Mr. SARGENT. I trust that there will not be hasty action on that matter. I know something about the case. It is one of the very few claims which I have ever taken any interest in, and I should like to have an opportunity to be heard before the committee in regard to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator object to the present consideration of the motion to concur in the report of the committee?

Mr. SARGENT. I do; but I would like to have the Senator withdraw the report for the present. The case was only referred a day or two ago, and I had not any notice that the committee intended to take it up. It was referred on my motion. It is very seldom that I speak in support of a claim of any character.

Mr. SCOTT. Let me state to the Senate the reasons why this report is made, and I trust what I say will not be taken unkindly by the Senator from California or by any other Senator. This case was submitted in the last Congress, and in January, 1873, a written report was made by the then chairman of the committee, the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] giving the reasons why the claim ought not to be allowed. Under the forty-ninth rule of the Senate, where there is an adverse report, it is provided that the papers in such case shall not be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and again referred unless the claimant present a petition stating that there is new evidence to sustain the claim, and stating what that new evidence is. A habit has grown up of withdrawing nearly all papers from the files of the Senate upon which there have been adverse reports, and sending them again to the same committees for consideration; and in the Committee on Claims we have adopted the rule, as a matter of self-protection as well as for the vindication of the rule of the Senate, that we will report all cases back adversely that come within the spirit of that rule, so that the committee shall be protected against a flood of claims that have already been examined coming back upon them, unless there is something new to command their attention.

Mr. SARGENT. I was not aware of the report made at the last session; on inquiry, I was informed that there had been no adverse report, but, on the contrary, that there was a very strong favorable report made in the House of Representatives. The report to which the Senator refers I have not seen; and if he has no objection, I ask that this report lie on the table for the present until I can examine into the matter.

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly; I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is any objection, the report must lie over one day. The Senator from California objects to present action on this report.

GILBERT & GERRISH.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on Claims have instructed me to report back a bill; and before I make the report I wish to make a statement, and I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] to it. At the last session of Congress a bill was passed, precisely such as I report back now, by both Houses, for the relief of the administrators of Gilbert & Gerrish, but for some reason it failed to get into the hands of the President, so that there was no action upon it. A report was made by the House committee and also by the Committee on Claims of the Senate, the two committees substantially concurring that this bill ought to pass. The bill was again introduced into the House at this session, with all the papers, and the committee there has reported in favor of the same allowance—a unanimous report, and setting forth the same facts. The Committee on Claims of the Senate has had the same subject under consideration again, and instructed me to report the bill, and recommend that it shall pass at this time. I am requested by the Senator from Missouri and also by the Senator from Maine to ask that the bill be put on its passage at once. It is a bill for the relief of the estates of Abel Gilbert and William Gerrish, late copartners in business under the style of Gilbert & Gerrish.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1038) for the relief of the estates of Abel Gilbert and William Gerrish, late copartners in business under the style of Gilbert & Gerrish.

The bill is a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to pay $26,250 to Benjamin W. Gilbert, administrator of the estate of Abel Gilbert, and Isaac Watts, administrator of the estate of William Gerrish, in full accord and satisfaction for damages for violation of a grain contract, entered into the 21st day of May, 1859, between Colonel G. H. Crosman, deputy quartermaster-general of the United States Army, in behalf of the United States, and Abel Gilbert, in his own name, but in behalf of Gilbert & Gerrish.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HAMLIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 303) for the relief of Elisha E. Rice; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 304) relative to the metropolitan police of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 305) for the relief of Albert Von Steinhousen, late major Sixty-eighth Regiment New York Infantry Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 306) for the relief of George F. Heidemann; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 307) granting a pension to Henry Oglesby; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 308) for the relief of John Logan, late marshal of the southern district of Illinois; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 309) to extend the time for proof and payments on pre-emption claims upon the public lands; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM STEELE.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (S. No. 202) to remove the legal and political disabilities of William Steele, of Bexar County, Texas. It is the last case in Texas, I believe. They are very importunate there, and I should like to have the bill passed this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to hear it read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (S. No. 202) to remove the legal and political disabilities of William Steele, of Bexar County, Texas.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed by a two-thirds vote.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. RAMSEY. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to be allowed to call up the post-route bill for action, as there is great anxiety that bids may be invited and the service ordered. To gratify that anxiety I ask to be allowed to call it up now. It will lead to no debate.

There being no objection the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 798) to establish certain post-routes.

Mr. INGALLS. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill on page 8, after line 155.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let it first be read.

Mr. HOWE. Has the bill got to be read at length?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless the reading is waived by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOWE. I hope it will be unanimously dispensed with. I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, from whom this bill comes, what possible objection there is to making every highway a post-route?

Mr. RAMSEY. That matter has been spoken of frequently; but there is this objection on the part of the Post-Office Department, that then they would be importuned to a larger degree than they are now to put service on every conceivable road in the country. This is a little protection to them.

Mr. HOWE. It is just this protection, that they are not permitted to put service on any road until it is declared a post-route; but how little protection that is you may discover from one circumstance, that you have only got to breathe a wish to have any particular highway made a post-route, and it is made a post-route.

Mr. RAMSEY. Still there are ten thousand outside of your list.

Mr. HOWE. I do not know how many there are outside; but if there is any one in the United States, it is simply because nobody has ever thought to ask to have it made a post-route. You swell the cost of printing every winter, you make your statutes bulky, by naming and describing every one of your post-routes. It seems to me a great point would be gained by making a general declaration to cover the whole subject, and it would not embarrass the Department.

Mr. RAMSEY. The objection I have mentioned is the only one I know of to making every highway, every road in the country, a post-route. Every railroad now is—every boatable river, every boatable lake is—a post-route by general law. If all highways were made post-routes the Department would be importuned at once for service on every road in the country. This is a protection to them. This is the reason why this practice is continued. However, that point is not up now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the reading of the bill at length will be dispensed with.

Mr. CONKLING. As I suppose it will take no time, I wish the Senator from Minnesota would be kind enough to let me know the provision in the bill of which he has been speaking, which protects the Department from these applications.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Department cannot place service on any route unless it has been made a post-route by Congress.

Mr. CONKLING. I misunderstood the Senator. I thought he said he had put some provision in the bill on that subject.

Mr. RAMSEY. Not at all.

Mr. COOPER. I desire to amend the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question is on the amendments reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. INGALLS. I first offered an amendment, which I believe is pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Tennessee is first in order if it is an amendment to the amendments of the committee. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment of the Senator from Tennessee is, under the head of "Tennessee," on page 15, to insert:

From Purdy, in McNairy County, Tennessee, to Stantonville, in the same county.
From McKenzie, in Carroll County, via Como, Cottage Grove, Tennessee, and Crossland, Kentucky, to Murray, Kentucky.

The amendment to the amendments was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. On page 8, after line 175, I move to insert the following:

From Coffeyville, via Osage agency, Sac and Fox agency, Wa-pa-la-tha, Isabelle, to Cherokee Town, in the Chickasaw Nation, there to connect with route from Atoka to Fort Sill, Indian Territory.

The amendment to the amendments was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 6, after line 130, I move to insert the following:

From Pella, via Peoria, to New Sharon, in the State of Iowa.

Mr. RAMSEY. I suggest to the Senator to strike out the words "in the State of Iowa," as they are unnecessary. The caption shows the State in which the routes are located.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; I modify my amendment accordingly.

The amendment to the amendments was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON. On page 4, line 69, I move to strike out the word "and" before "Magnolia" and insert the word "to;" and also to strike out all after the word "Magnolia;" so that the clause will read:

From Hope Station, via Clayton, Falcon, Lamartine, to Magnolia.

The amendment to the amendments was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to ask the attention of the chairman of the committee to page 4 of the bill, where I observe certain post-routes for California are stricken out. I should like to know the reason why they are stricken out.

Mr. RAMSEY. Well, sir, the bill after it came from the House of Representatives was submitted to the Post-Office Department for its correction so far as it could modify it, especially so as to prevent the repetition of routes already made such by law, and it is their suggestion that these are already routes by law, and hence they are stricken out in this bill.

Mr. SARGENT. They are already provided for?

Mr. RAMSEY. They are already provided for, and there is no occasion to re-enact them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendments reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The amendments as amended were agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. On page 14, after line 332, I move to insert the following:

From Newton Hamilton, Mifflin County, via Vineyard Mills and Germany Valley, to Shirleysburgh, Huntingdon County.

Mr. RAMSEY. I suggest to the Senator to strike out the names of the counties. It is unnecessary to insert them.

Mr. SCOTT. Very well; I will so modify the amendment.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. There is a very fundamental defect in this bill to which I wish to call the attention of the committee. It is in line 397.

Mr. RAMSEY. I have already been furnished a memoranda by one of the Senator's colleagues in the House on that subject. The name "Gravewood" should be "Greenwood."

Mr. HOWE. I move that correction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin moves to amend the bill in line 397, by changing the name of "Gravewood" to "Greenwood."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move to add the following proviso at the end of the bill:

Provided, That postal service on mail-routes where the aggregate receipts shall not amount to one-half of the expenditures thereof shall be discontinued on and after June 30, 1874.

I desire to relieve the Postmaster-General from the importunity to put on mail service where there are no people. I remember some years ago of a mail-route being established that would cost $250,000. It was admitted that there were no people there; but the gentleman moving the amendment claimed that there would be if we established mail service there. I know that this is a difficult subject for the Postmaster-General to regulate; but here is a basis upon which the vast expenditures of the Department may be curtailed, and I see nothing unjust, improper, or impolitic in adopting the amendment which I propose; that is, that where the receipts of a mail-route shall not be at least one-half of all the expenditures, the mail-route shall be discontinued.

Mr. CLAYTON. That might be very well for the country from which my friend from Vermont hails—a thickly-settled country; but it certainly would work a great hardship upon that portion of the country which is not thickly settled. I hold that it is the duty of the Government to afford mail facilities to the people of this country. If it is their misfortune to live upon the frontiers, at points difficult of access, they ought not to be deprived of mail facilities. If we should adopt a rule of this kind it would affect very unfavorably a portion at least of the people of my State; and I presume the same is true of other Western and Southern States that are sparsely settled. I should certainly object to the adoption of such a rule.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask the Senator if he thinks that applying it only to those routes the receipts of which do not amount to one-half the expenditures would affect any considerable portion of his people?

Mr. CLAYTON. I do, in some instances.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Then I will reduce it to one-fourth.

Mr. CLAYTON. I shall object to it in any shape.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Allow me to ask the Senator from Vermont why we should trammel the Postmaster-General in this regard? The discretion rests with him. If we establish a post-route, it lies with him to put service on that route or not; and certainly, having in his charge the postal relations of the country, he, above all others, is the proper person to determine whether service is needed. I indorse what has been said by the Senator from Arkansas on this subject. He represents one of the Southwestern States. I represent a Northwestern State, where we are not so favorably situated as the constituency represented by the Senator from Vermont; and we have in our State many pioneers who are carving out the fortunes of the country. The Senator represents a constituency who are provided for, living on large routes, where of course they enjoy all the postal facilities. The people in various portions of the West are deprived of these advantages, and they need intelligence as much as the people of the East—and, in fact, they emigrate from the East; and it is for the constituency of the Senator that I am pleading, as well as my own.

Mr. TIPTON. I think it would be very improper this morning hastily to pass any such proposition as this. I think it should go to the committee, if it must be considered, for their calm and dispassionate consideration. We know that in the Territories and in the new States the postal system cannot be self-supporting for a long time; and yet we know, in regard to those expenditures, that it has always been considered proper and necessary that they should be made, in order that the people who go there and endure the hardships of pioneer life may have the benefits and blessings which are enjoyed from the postal system in the old States, without let or hinderance. If any action is to be taken on this subject at all, I would move that the proposition be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads for future consideration and report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make that motion?

Mr. TIPTON. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska moves to recommit the bill with the amendment.

Mr. RAMSEY. I imagine that the Senator from Nebraska does not wish to recommit the bill, but simply the proposition of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. TIPTON. I do not desire to embarrass the bill at all. I would simply move to refer the proposition of the Senator from Vermont, if possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion would not be in order.

Mr. TIPTON. Then I do not make the motion.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will relieve Senators from any embarrassment on this subject. I admit that it is a subject which it is proper to have considered by a committee. Only a few years since the Post-Office Department was a self-supporting Department. It now costs many millions beyond its receipts. I have no doubt the Postmaster-General would be glad to economize. But when post-routes are established by law members of the House and of the Senate importune the Postmaster-General to put service upon them, and he can hardly resist those importunities. I only desire to establish some rule, just and equitable in itself, by which the Postmaster-General might be able to economize. I have no disposition to curtail the frontier settlements of any just and proper accommodations. I imagine that there are many mail-routes in the older States which do not begin to pay one-half of what they cost. But I will withdraw the amendment and ask to have it referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. I presume there will be no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be necessary for the Senator to reduce his proposition to the form of a resolution or in some other shape.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will merely place that amendment in the form of a resolution.

Mr. HAMLIN. You can do that after this bill is out of the way.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont withdraws his amendment to the bill.

Mr. BOREMAN. I offer an amendment, to insert after line 378, on page 16, under the head of "West Virginia," the following:

The post-route from Parkersburgh to Lubeck, in Wood County, West Virginia, is hereby extended from Lubeck to New England post-office in the same county; and also from Lubeck to Wadesville, in the same county.

Mr. RAMSEY. Allow me to suggest to the Senator an amendment to that. Let him simply say "from" one point "to" another.

Mr. WEST. While the Senators from Minnesota and West Virginia are conferring, I wish to notify the Senate that there are certain inaccuracies in spelling names in the State of Louisiana. I ask permission to have the Clerk correct those without taking up the time of the Senate.

Mr. RAMSEY. These proper names are very apt to be misspelled, they are usually so incorrectly or indistinctly written.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, an order will be entered allowing the spelling of names to be corrected. The Chair hears no objection to that. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. BOREMAN.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads if he can inform the Senate of the extent of service provided for by this bill.

Mr. RAMSEY. I imagine that some hundreds of miles have been added this morning, within five or ten minutes. It is impossible for me to keep the calculation so close as I know the Senator would like to have it. It would take me some time to make the calculation of the additional routes which have been placed on here in ten minutes.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Can the Senator give the Senate information as to the number of miles reported by the committee?

Mr. RAMSEY. I cannot.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Can the Senator give the Senate an approximate estimate?

Mr. RAMSEY. Well, sir, I should judge it is considerably exceeding five thousand miles.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Twice five thousand, for instance.

Mr. RAMSEY. No; exceeding five thousand, I should say.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am told when I inquire about this bill that it—the annual installment—does not amount to much; that it should not create much concern in the minds of Senators; that it is the annual installment which we are likely to have and which we do have constantly, and that it is a matter of course. The honorable Senator who is chairman of this committee made the remark that it did not contain any legislation, and therefore it was not worth while to be particular about a bill that did not contain any legislation, and did not seem in his judgment to involve any consequences.

Now, Mr. President, the postal service of the United States has got to be a matter of very large concern in many ways, beneficent as an institution, if I may so say, and very important in its relations to the community in many respects; but, nevertheless, it has come to very large proportions, and it is swelling and increasing with great rapidity. Going on at this rate, where it will end it would be difficult to predict.

Now, the inaccuracy with which this thing is being done is shown by the fact that the honorable chairman of this committee, so accurate as he can be when he desires to be, when he takes pains to be, cannot tell, even as to thousands of miles, the amount of public service provided for by this bill. Can any Senator here on this floor tell us what the mail service of the United States is at the present time? Have we not, all of us, legislated on this subject with a very vague idea of what we were about?

Mr. RAMSEY. I would say to the Senator that the report of the Postmaster-General gives the length of the various routes in the United States annually, those by rail, by steamboat, and those by the ordinary conveyances of the country, the total aggregate being about two hundred and fifty thousand miles.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is very well for my honorable friend to say; but if there is the accurate information, he ought to be pretty well imformed about it, and ought to be able to give us some sort of an approximate idea on the subject. Now, here are five thousand miles and more, he says, added to the public service. I hear it remarked that it is only to permit the Postmaster-General to put upon these routes just so much mail-carriage as in his judgment the public service requires. Sir, it should never be left to the Postmaster-General to execise that discretion. I will not vote for this bill or any other bill on any such supposition as that. If any Senator upon his own information desires a route here, I am willing to vote for it; but I am not willing to vote five or ten thousand miles to the public service, involving an expenditure which none of us here can tell anything about, and leave it to the discretion of any Department of the Government; nor do I believe in times like these, when we are endeavoring to curtail the expenditures of the Government, that it is a safe thing to do at all.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Will the Senator allow me a question? If I understand the Senator from Maine, he says that upon the statement of any Senator that a post-route was necessary he would be willing, as one of this body, to grant the route, to establish that specific route as a post-route. Now, suppose, upon a long line, the Senators representing the States through which the line passes should recommend its establishment as a post-route, what would be the action of the Senator from Maine who now addresses the Chair?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not know that I comprehend the inquiry of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I will endeavor to make myself clearer. The Senator, if I understood him, said that upon the statement of any Senator upon this floor that a route was necessary he would be disposed to vote in favor of establishing that route. Now, as I understand, he objects to routes through different States, in other words, in distant territory. Suppose every Senator representing the States through which these long proposed lines pass should recommend the establishment of those routes, what would be the action of the Senate then, in the judgment of the Senator from Maine?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should think it would not be very difficult for the Senator to infer what my action would be from the statement I have made. I have said, and I repeat, that upon the statement of a Senator that such a route, in his judgment and belief, upon his information, was necessary, I should not combat it; but I was replying to a remark of the Senator himself, who said there was no difficulty at all in allowing these routes to be established, leaving it to the discretion of the Post-Office Department whether service should be put upon them or not. That I do not agree to. Sir, the postal service should be established upon the information of Congress and none other. That is what I maintain; and whoever examines the postal service of this country will see that it has grown to enormous proportions, and in my judgment—I say it here upon the floor of the Senate after some considerable examination—there are fundamental defects in that system which need to be corrected. Why, sir, the cost of this service has grown up within the last seven years from fifteen million to a fraction short of thirty million dollars, and is still going on.

Mr. BAYARD. Thirty-three millions.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Thirty-three millions, I am informed. The chairman of the committee charged with the supervision of this service I suppose knows the facts, and if I am in error in any of these particulars he will correct me; but it has had this growth. And in what direction has it grown? It has grown in this direction, and none of us know or have the slightest idea; and we are legislating here constantly under such circumstances that we do not know what is being imposed upon us. I do not use the word "imposed" in any offensive sense; I mean what is being enacted. We do not know to what extent, nor can anybody guess, expenditures will be imposed upon the Treasury of the country by what is being enacted here as a matter of course. It may be all right; it may be all well; it may be that somebody does know; but I doubt it.

Now, Mr. President, if you look at the postal service, it has grown up to these proportions, as I have already remarked, within the last seven or eight years—doubled in its expenditures. We have taken from this service what it is said was a very great embarrassment to it, and what was attributed to it as one of its chief expenditures—the franking privilege. I will not stop to comment upon that now. My expectations are now what they were before that privilege was repealed, to wit, that we should see no reduction in the expenditures on that account, and that is the truth of it. The expense of the service goes on all the time increasing and magnifying; and, sir, to-day the prominent feature in this service is this, that carrying the mail proper, carrying letters—postal service as it was understood by this system, and as it ought in my judgment to be practiced—is subjected to the carrying of dead weight, freight. The postal service of the country has become an express system, and the carrying of freight is 300 per cent. cheaper than the carrying of intelligence. Can the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads tell us how much is paid for dead weight and how much for intelligence? Somebody ought to know. How much of this expense of $30,000,000 is paid for carrying dead weight, for carrying express matter, and how much of it is for intelligence, how much for letter postage, and how much for newspaper and for printed matter, which is legitimate and only legitimate in my judgment under any system of carrying the mails? My own belief about it is—I cannot be accurate, because it is impossible to get the information; the information was sent for early in the session but has not come—my belief is that this whole system is so embarrassed by express business, merchandise, and all that sort of thing, that there the great difficulty comes. At any rate it is an incongruity that ought to be eliminated. I will give you an instance, sir, in my own knowledge.

Since the abolition of the franking privilege postage has to be paid upon all communications with the several Departments. There happens to be in my city a pension agent. He is required to make his returns through the post. The quarterly returns of that office, made to the Interior Department, cost thirty-three dollars for transmission through the mail. They could be sent by express for $2.50. Two dollars and a half would bring them by the ordinary expresses of the country established by private enterprise, while thirty-three dollars is required to carry them by mail. I mention that as an illustration.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask whether the real cost to the Government of that thirty-three dollars expense was not simply the nominal cost of printing the stamps, while in the case of the $2.50 paid the express company the whole amount comes out of the Treasury?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Well, sir, the thirty dollars goes in to swell the revenues of the Post-Office Department at any rate. It does not make any difference whether it is real or imaginary, so far as the expenditures of the Government are concerned; that is the estimate on which it is based.

I am only speaking on this subject to illustrate the principle. It is impossible for anybody on earth, from any information we are in possession of, to tell how much of it is dead weight and how much of it is for carrying the mail proper. But what I am undertaking to assert and maintain, and can maintain, is, that there is this incongruity in this branch of the public service, that carrying the mail proper is subjected to carrying dead weight.

Mr. RAMSEY. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine whether the post-office is in the habit of carrying through the mails anything else than that authorized by law and directed by law to be carried?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly not. That is what I am talking about. The honorable Senator knows that he has been chiefly instrumental in that action. I am not after the post-office so much as I am after the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. [Laughter.] This whole thing has grown up under his administration and all without any legislation; and when we inquire into this, "Why," says he, "do not be critical; this is only a little bill about post-routes; there is no legislation in it." [Laughter.] I tell you there is legislation in it, and there is legislation of the character I am speaking of, and the postal service of the country is subjected to express business——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, which is the resolution reported from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That cuts me off, I suppose. I will renew my remarks when this bill comes up again.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 793) to establish the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 945) to change the times of holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the western district of Michigan; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 35) filling existing vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, and it was thereupon signed by the President of the Senate pro tempore.

THE CURRENCY—SPECIE PAYMENTS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by Mr. SHERMAN from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President, I would ask the Secretary to report once more to the Senate the resolution and amendment now under discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the resolution pending before the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That it is the duty of Congress, during its present session, to adopt definite measures to redeem the pledge made in the act approved March 18, 1869, entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," as follows: "And the United States also pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin;" and the Committee on Finance is directed to report to the Senate, at as early a day as practicable, such measures as will not only redeem this pledge of the public faith, but will also furnish a currency of uniform value, always redeemable in gold or its equivalent, and so adjusted as to meet the changing wants of trade and commerce.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] proposes to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting:

That the Committee on Finance is directed to report to the Senate, at as early a day as practicable, such measures as will restore commercial confidence and give stability and elasticity to the circulating medium through a moderate increase of currency.

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President, it is scarcely possible to over-estimate the importance of the subject under discussion. It touches not only our national prosperity, but our political as well as social morals in the broadest sense of the term. I approach it with a painful diffidence in my own ability to do it justice; but the Senators being called upon to express their opinions, I feel it my duty to lay before you the results of such conscientious study as I have been able to devote to it.

The object of the resolution before us is evidently to call out the opinion of the Senate upon the general subject. We are not to discuss a specific method of resumption; but we are to declare whether we are in favor of a resumption of specie payments at as early a day as practicable at all. To this resolution an amendment has been offered by the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] looking not toward specie payments, but an expansion of the currency as I understand him, to the amount of at least one hundred millions. Thus the plain issue between resumption and what I call inflation is before us.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator——

Mr. SCHURZ. I yield.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The Senator doubtless wishes to place me right. I suggested the increase of the currency $100,000,000, inclusive of the legal-tender reserve of $44,000,000.

Mr. SCHURZ. I understand that, but it does not alter the case. There are two questions involved—one of legal and moral obligation and one of financial policy. As to the first, I had fondly hoped that it would be absolutely unnecessary to say one word to the Senate about it. I had hoped so until I listened to the very remarkable debate which we had on this point on Friday last; a debate in which the startling doctrine was announced, that as to the redemption of its promises to pay the Government of the United States had to consult nothing but its sovereign pleasure and convenience.

The Senate must pardon me if I add a few words to what has been already said on this point by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN.] He called the emission of legal-tender notes "a forced loan." This expression, "a forced loan," has been called a mere empty figure of speech; but in my opinion it is something better than that.

The Government issued legal-tender notes to buy commodities in a great variety of forms, including labor and service. It gave for those commodities not money, but its promises to pay money; and of those who for such promises to pay sold anything of value to the Government, the latter thus borrowed the value of the things so sold to it. This virtually constituted a loan. The seller was obliged to take the legal-tender notes for what he had to sell, because he could not get anything else in payment. He had to sell for what he could get or keep his goods. And thus the issue of legal-tender notes constituted a forced loan; and the Government promise to pay, bearing no interest, it constituted a forced loan without interest. Soon these Government promises to pay, made a legal tender in the payment of debts, went from hand to hand, and became the only current medium of exchange in all business transactions, and the whole American people stepped into the places of the original lenders to the Government. Thus the issue of legal-tender notes became a forced loan, without interest, levied upon the American people. This, I think, is clear. It carries with it, therefore, all the obligations of a forced loan, such obligations being aggravated by the fact that not only the loan did not bear any interest to the creditor, but it imposed further loss on the creditors by the depreciation of the Government promises to pay in the market.

Now, what is that obligation, prima facie? The inscription of the legal-tender note is, "The United States will pay to the bearer one dollar." We all agree that it means one dollar in the gold coin of the United States. That one dollar in the gold coin of the United States the Government promises to pay; when? It has very well been said, and not denied, that the form of the legal-tender note is the same which in private transactions would be considered that of a due-bill, payable on the demand of the creditor; and that such demand, as between private parties, can be enforced by legal process. It has been argued in reply that such a demand may, indeed, be enforced by process of law as against private parties, but that it cannot be enforced against the Government; and that, therefore, the Government is not under any legal obligation to pay its promise to pay on demand. Now, assuming the Government to be under the moral obligation to pay on demand, the argument will amount to this: that the Government will safely and rightfully repudiate such moral obligation, because nobody has any means to enforce the demand by process of law. I will let the argument stand there in its nakedness. But did the Government morally bind itself to redeem the legal-tender notes in gold at par on demand?

We are told that when the legal-tender notes were issued it was generally understood that the Government would not redeem them on demand at the time. Why was it so understood? Because it was known that the Government was not able to do so at the time, pressed as it was by the necessities of the war; but I affirm (and I trust nobody will undertake to deny it) that it was also generally understood and confidently expected, that the legal-tender notes would be redeemed in gold, as promised, as soon as the Government, relieved of the pressing necessities of the war, should become able to do so. The gravity of that general obligation was so well understood and appreciated by Congress, when the first issue of legal-tender notes was resolved upon, that while no immediate redemption on demand at the time could be provided for, the holders were at least authorized by law to convert, at their option, their notes into five-twenty bonds, payable in gold within a stated time, and bearing interest, in gold, at the rate of 6 per cent., which provision was afterward repealed.

But we heard on Friday last, from the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] that the Government is not only not bound to pay its legal-tender due-bills on demand, nor even when it may be able—that is, when by its own action it may enable itself to pay—but that it is bound only by its own pleasure as to when and even as to whether it will discharge its obligations; and all this upon the sole ground that on the legal-tender notes no specific time is expressly stated at which they shall be redeemed in gold. I am not going too far, I think, when I call this an alarming, a dangerous doctrine; a doctrine which if applied to transactions in private life would, according to all standards of honesty, be called dishonorable. If Congress should adopt it, in what attitude would the Government of the United States be placed before the world? In the attitude of a trickster who passes off upon the people a due-bill with the fair inscription, "The United States will pay to bearer one dollar," and then interprets that promise as meaning that the Government will pay when and if it pleases, or not pay at all if it does not please at all. It would be a notice to this and all other nations that a due-bill given by a private citizen may be taken with confidence; for if the honesty of the debtor should fail, then, at least, every court would enforce the payment of the due-bill at the pleasure of the creditor; but when you deal with this great Government of the United States you must, before accepting a promise to pay from it, look sharply whether the time of payment is expressly and distinctly stated on it, for you may be told that a due-bill of the Government is not to be paid on the demand of the creditor, nor even when the Government is able to pay, but when the Government may please and if the Government please at all; that is, entirely at the pleasure and discretion of the debtor. Now, I would ask Senators whether, proud as they are of their country, that is the attitude in which they want to place the Government of this great Republic in the eyes of the world?

The Senator from Massachusetts said on Friday that he had—and I quote his words—"yet to learn how the public credit is improved, and the character of the country increased by the statement that it is living in constant financial dishonor." I would tell the Senator from Massachusetts that I have not yet to learn, but that I know that the public credit will certainly not be improved, but most seriously impaired; that the character of the country will certainly not be raised, but most deplorably lowered, when, in contempt of its moral obligation, the Government adopts his doctrine that it is bound to redeem its promises to pay only when and if it pleases to do so. No, sir; the question of redeeming the legal-tender notes is and must be, according to all rules of ethics, not a question of mere pleasure, but simply a question of ability, and nothing else. To say that it is a question of mere pleasure is, calling things by their right name, putting in a plea for contingent repudiation, nay, a plea for the right of repudiation on the part of the Government pure and simple; and in the name of the honor of the country I protest against it.

When the legal-tender notes were issued, and down to the end of the war, everybody thought that the Government ought to, and everybody expected that the Government would, make it its first care to take the redemption of its promises to pay in hand immediately after its utter inability, under the necessities of the war, had ceased. When our inability ceased, there our immediate duty began; and with it, if that duty remained unfulfilled, there began our financial dishonor, and it will remain financial dishonor as long as that duty remains unperformed. It will help the Senator from Massachusetts little to say, as he did say, that a process of development is going on which will ultimately make the legal-tender notes of the value of coin; it will help his moral position especially still less when he adds that "the Government is"—mark his words—"under no obligation to bring that process to an ultimate and favorable result at a particular time." I confess myself painfully astonished at the looseness of principle underlying that language. It would have been less surprising had it come from some one of those who, a few years ago, advocated the paying off in our depreciated currency of the bonded debt of the United States, which we had solemnly promised to pay off in gold; but I did not expect the Senator from Massachusetts to turn up so late a convert to something akin to that doctrine. I say "something akin to that doctrine," for the Senator must know, first, that a government under a solemn obligation to pay a gold dollar for a dollar note has no right, without an effort of its own in that direction, to rely on an uncertain contingency that the debt will pay itself, which contingency I will not now discuss. But the Senator must know, secondly, that at this very moment the process upon which he depends is being most seriously counteracted, and its ultimate result postponed and jeopardized, by the Government itself, which, during the last few months, has been adding $25,000,000 to our dishonored promises to pay, thus making their redemption still more difficult.

No, sir; if we mean to uphold the honest name of this Republic we absolutely must recognize the binding force of the duty of the Government to pay a dollar in gold for a dollar in its paper under its solemn promise, not at its arbitrary pleasure, but as soon as it is able to pay—that is, as soon as, by its own action, it may render itself able to pay. Every other doctrine is repudiation in a thin disguise, if disguise at all, and I trust the American people will repel it as it deserves to be repelled.

I shall now approach the question of financial policy. Is there any one among us who, under ordinary circumstances, when we had a metallic currency in the country would have thought of substituting for that metallic currency an irredeemable Government paper money? If there is any one I have not heard of him. We all know that there was a time when the great leaders of public opinion in the United States—a large majority of them at least—considered it unconstitutional to make anything a legal tender save the precious metals. I might quote for hours from the sayings of the great men of the past, whose names are mentioned only with respect. I state this not for the purpose of reviving a discussion on the constitutional point, which would now be too late, as it has been otherwise decided, but to give a specimen of the old-fashioned way of thinking which quite generally prevailed before the war, and which was disturbed only by its extreme necessities. Leaving the constitutional question entirely aside, certainly no consideration of financial policy was then advanced to urge the substitution of irredeemable legal-tender paper currency for gold dollars. Nobody thought of such a thing.

The reasons why the precious metals were considered the most reliable measure of value and the best available tool of exchange were so generally accepted then, and are in fact so little called in question now, in this debate at least, that I do not feel called upon to go into an elaborate defense of a position which is virtually not attacked. Even the opponents of the resolution under debate on this floor seem to recognize them as valid, for they admit that only actual distress has forced us to give up the specie basis, and that at some time we must return to it. I think even the honorable Senator from Indiana on my left, [Mr. MORTON,] and the honorable Senator from Michigan on my right, [Mr. FERRY,] want to be considered hard-money men in a certain sense.

I am well aware that in the country all sorts of schemes are broached by which an irredeemable paper currency is to be made a perpetual institution. Every one of us is fairly flooded with pamphlets from all sides, setting forth the wildest conceptions, which pretend to be new discoveries, but in fact, wittingly or unwittingly, are only repetitions of schemes which have always appeared in the same way in every country when an irredeemable currency had entangled a nation in great embarrassments which it was difficult to overcome. Most of them only show that a disturbed condition of things is apt to throw the minds of men out of balance; and that while an irredeemable currency was but recently looked upon as a disease, patients may sometimes become so afraid of a cure that they positively fall in love with their ailment. I will not spend any time in discussing any of these schemes now, but shall take them up when they come before us. I merely mention them to point out to the inflationists on this floor in what direction they are tending.

Now, sir, have we any inflationists on this floor? Those who oppose the resolution repel the name. They do not like it. There is a certain odious flavor about it. They say that they are not opposed to resumption, but want to put it off to a better time. But what do they propose now? There is the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] who proposes an increase of our currency at least to the amount of $44,000,000. There is the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] proposing an increase of our irredeemable currency to the amount of at least $100,000,000. Now, gentlemen, I call this by its right name—inflation. Whatever circumlocution they may use to disguise the fact, it remains after all what it is.

Thus we have the alternative plainly before us—resumption or inflation. The inflationists all speak of our business embarrassments as the reason why resumption should be put off and inflation resorted to. In discussing their arguments I shall have occasion to expose what I consider their fallacies, and to state what I believe to be the correct principles upon which we should proceed.

We are at the present moment surrounded by the embarrassing circumstances of a crisis in our economic affairs. What was the cause of that crisis? The Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] in a speech he made at an early stage of this debate, called it a "panic caused by mere accident." There are, in my opinion, two great errors in that single expression. It was neither a mere panic, nor was it caused by mere accident. Let us for a moment try to be precise. In Patterson's Science of Finance I find the following definition:

> A commercial crisis is a partial breakdown of mercantile credit. A financial crisis is a collapse of speculative enterprise. A panic is a partial breakdown of bank credit, producing a run upon the banks for payment of their deposits.

Accepting that definition as correct, a panic will in this sense be in most cases a mere symptom or incident of a commercial or financial crisis, or both combined, as they frequently are, unless it be the sudden giving way of the solvency of an individual bank unconnected with general circumstances. But such crises, of which panics are mere symptoms or incidents, are not caused by mere accidents. Let the Senator from Indiana run down the history of crises from the commercial crisis in Lubeck at the beginning of the seventeenth century and the tulip mania in Holland to the present time, and he will find there is not one of them that was caused by mere accident. You might just as well say that delirium tremens is a mere accident after a period of hard drinking. A candid study of all those events will discover the operation of certain causes common to them all. As a German writer on political economy says:

> Crises occur only in nations which enjoy an advanced state of civilization. Where there is no division of labor, where everybody produces what he needs, crises in production and commerce are impossible. Home trade is less subject to them than foreign commerce, and the greater the development of the credit system the greater the danger of crises.

This is substantially true. Crises may spring from a variety of causes. Great wars or civic disturbances attended with extensive destruction of wealth, or failing crops and destructive epidemics, or sudden and far-reaching revolutions in the condition of production and consumption, such as spring from important inventions and discoveries, or great changes in the channels of trade, &c., may produce them; but crises are also produced without the occurrence of such distinctive occurrences by a process which in our day seems to repeat itself almost periodically.

The President in his message says that the present crisis surprises us in a state of extraordinary prosperity. That is true in a certain sense; but it is nothing new. It is a very common, I might say almost natural, occurrence. In times of prosperity capital is rapidly produced, and it accumulates. As capital accumulates it will not find as profitable a field of employment within the same limits within which a smaller amount of capital operated with profit before. In other words, when a certain business has been carried on with a sufficient capital and yielded a certain percentage of profit, a larger capital employed in the same business without an enlargement of the field of operation will yield a smaller percentage of profit. Profits in that case decline in proportion to the increase of capital employed. Capitalists are, of course, dissatisfied with that decline of profits, and seek for other and larger fields of employment. If this is done in harmony with the public want, that is, if the accumulated capital is employed in production to satisfy existing demand, or such demand as may be created by the progress of civilization, without discounting too much the future, all will go well. But when capitalists, carried away by the greed of rapid gain, seek a field of employment for their capital beyond the limits of existing demand, a sort of speculation ensues which works for great profit at the risk of great loss. Enterprises are undertaken which, not being called for by existing demand, can yield no immediate returns, but will create fictitious values, and which therefore cannot be set on foot nor sustained except by an immoderate strain on the system of credit. Credit is a chain of many links running between the producer and the consumer. When that chain is strained beyond a certain point it snaps. Then the true nature of the fictitious values created by the employment of capital beyond the limits of present demand becomes suddenly apparent; confidence is lost; distrust becomes general; speculation breaks down; and the crisis is there.

It turns out, also, that the fictitious values produced by such an employment of capital are no values at all, at least not as far as the present demand is concerned, and that therefore the capital employed in their production, at least for the time being, has been unproductively consumed or wasted. This unproductive consumption or waste of capital may be assigned as the principal cause of most commercial and financial crises in our day. It appears in a variety of forms; and in this respect the history of commercial and financial crises is most instructive. At one time it was speculation in things which had only an imagined value; then again over-trading in foreign commerce beyond possible demand; then again the getting up of Mississippi schemes and South Sea bubbles; then again the overproduction of certain products of industry; then over-speculation in wild lands or in mines; then the premature building of railroads, or public improvements, and the like. And all these things accompanied by a reckless dealing in accommodation paper, by the wildest sort of stock-gambling, and by a general overstraining of the credit system, until the bubbles burst.

The same German economist to whom I have alluded gives the following as among the symptoms of an approaching crisis:

> An uncommonly excited spirit of enterprise; an extraordinary boldness of speculation; an epidemic desire to get rich quickly by speculation instead of relying upon the slow and sure profit of honest labor; a remarkable, almost insane, credulity of the public as to the safety and profitableness of enterprises which the least careful consideration would show to be mere bubbles; a prevalence of the spirit of gambling in an endless variety of forms; a rapid and alarming development of luxury and extravagance in private life, &c.

The same writer remarks that—

> The very agencies which ultimately produce commercial and financial crises are very apt to develop themselves most strongly when great national or civic dangers have been successfully overcome, and when such success has confirmed the self-reliance, and strengthened the trust in the favors of good fortune, and stimulated the spirit of enterprise of a people.

Now, sir, if the Senator from Indiana will compare this picture with recent events in this country and the circumstances now surrounding us, the striking similarity may induce him to suspect that the present crisis was, after all, caused by something more than mere accident. He will find that this has been a period of mad speculation; that visionary schemes "to develop the resources of the country" were started and partly executed at enormous expense, without being called for by present demand; that many of our most important banks and institutions of credit, instead of ministering to the wants of legitimate business, became mere tenders to windy schemes, wild speculation, and reckless stock-gambling, especially since the sale of the stock and bonds of American companies abroad was stopped by failing confidence in Europe; that many of our large merchants and manufacturers, instead of confining themselves to their legitimate business, spent their capital and risked their credit in all sorts of heterogeneous enterprises; that the morbid desire to get rich without honest labor pervaded all classes of society to a most alarming extent; that luxury and extravagance in public and private expenditure were carried to a point almost without precedent; that the productive forces of the country were thus largely diverted from the channels of immediate usefulness; and that a considerable portion of our capital has been unproductively consumed or wasted, either absolutely or in such a way that it will yield no return for many a day. The disasters, the embarrassments, which have grown out of such a condition of things cannot, therefore, be dealt with as a mere accident which happened on some day in September last, like the stumbling of a horse over a stone. It is a crisis in our economic affairs, and as such it has to be treated.

Now, sir, what has this crisis to do with the currency, and what has the currency to do with it? The Senators from Indiana and from Michigan assert, first, that it was not caused by any defect in the currency; and, secondly, that to cure the difficulty an addition to the currency is necessary and will be effective.

Let us see whether our irredeemable and depreciated currency had nothing to do with the causes of this crisis. I affirm that the influence which is always exercised by an irredeemable and depreciated currency has very seriously aggravated the causes which produced this crisis. I ask you, sir, where was it that the spirit of speculation, of gambling, which has so disastrously swept over this land, held its first orgies? It was in the Gold Room in New York. It was there that in that period of our economic history which commenced with our recovery from the crash of 1857, mad speculation, gambling on a large scale, I might almost say as a national occupation, first began. It was incited by our irredeemable currency. Was it surprising that it should have been so? An irredeemable currency, whose value is uncertain from day to day, will always develop and excite the spirit of gambling. When a man does not know what his money will be worth to-morrow he will naturally be more inclined to risk it on the fortune of a card or any other venturous chance. Thus the very origin of the Gold Room stimulated at once the spirit of speculation in every direction, for that spirit is contagious as soon as it appears.

But men were not only seduced, they were forced to become speculators by the same agency. The fluctuations of our irredeemable currency obliged all our merchants and manufacturers whose business was in any way connected with foreign commerce and depended, therefore, largely upon the relative value of greenbacks and gold—I say forced them to become gold speculators in spite of themselves, whether they would or not; and this is the case to-day, and it will continue to be the case as long as we have an irredeemable and necessarily fluctuating paper currency. It will continue to be the case not only with relation to gold, but with relation to all commodities, for that currency makes all that we possess, all that we buy, and all that we sell, uncertain in value from day to day. Speculation and gambling in one direction are sure to beget and stimulate speculation and gambling in others; and it would not be difficult to go through almost all branches of business showing the demoralizing influence our irredeemable and fluctuating currency has exercised upon all of them; but it is not necessary, for the facts are too patent to require further exposition. Therefore, while I certainly do not pretend that the character of our currency was the sole cause of our present crisis, I do insist that it mischievously stimulated the agencies by which the crisis has been brought forth. Senators will discover the same thing in almost every instance in the history of similar events; and our currency will naturally continue to exercise the same influence as long as its character remains the same.

Now we come to the second question, the remedy to be applied to the difficulties surrounding us. At an early stage in this debate the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Michigan were ready with their answer. The Senator from Indiana says, not resumption, but suspension of specie payments has always with good effect been used as a cure for panics. When listening to him I wondered how the panic could have occurred at all here at this time, since we were already in a decidedly suspended condition, and since the remedy had been applied for eleven years constantly before the disease broke out. Now, what does the Senator from Indiana want? Does he want to cure this crisis by suspending us still more? He may by his advice suspend us more, but certainly he will not cure the crisis.

To prove the correctness of his assertion the Senator went into a long historical disquisition. In many instances I decidedly disagree with him as to the facts, especially where he seemed to confound the suspension of the bank act of 1844 in England with a suspension of specie payment; but I let that go. What the Senator wanted to say is, that sudden panics were allayed by an addition to the circulating medium to facilitate loans and discounts.

Well, sir, supposing a sudden fright, a run on the banks, can be stopped, and the immediate disasters it might bring on lessened by an addition to the currency in circulation, is not the Senator from Indiana aware that in our case we passed that stage of the business long ago? The sudden fright, the run on the banks, has been over for months.

The Senator must also be aware that the remedy vaunted by him as a certain cure has been amply applied. It has been applied in a greater measure than it was done in England in most, if not all—yes, I say in all—the instances that he quoted. The Secretary of the Treasury in September bought bonds to the amount of fourteen millions, and threw that amount of currency into the market. Since then the forty-four million reserve has been drawn upon to the amount of twenty-five millions, and those twenty-five millions have again been added to the currency. But not only that, all the other reserves of the Treasury Department have been exhausted, and that currency also is in the hands of the people.

The Senator from Indiana says he only wants a small addition to the currency to relieve the panic. Why, sir, he has had that. He has had more than that. He has had vastly more than was ever used in England for such purposes; and what is the result? The run on the banks, the first scare, was over, before the bulk of the addition was issued. The first scare is, in fact, almost forgotten. There seems to be now an abundance of money in the banks. Discounts and loans are not difficult to obtain on good mercantile paper and good securities; but, in a certain sense and in a very important sense, the crisis is not over. Why is this? Because the liquidations are going on which were made necessary by the unsound transactions of the past. In consequence failures are still occurring here and there, revealing still more unsoundness, and furnishing good reason why confidence should not again degenerate into credulity. Speculation is crippled. Fancy stocks and fictitious values are at a more or less low ebb. Business men are cautious in their operations. Capitalists are circumspect in investments; and the business community is slowly and timidly feeling its way to a new and safe basis upon which to start on a new career of prosperity. In other words, the crisis is working itself out. And under such circumstances, not to head off a sudden panic, for there is no sudden panic now, the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Michigan urge forthwith an addition to our irredeemable and depreciated currency, the one of at least forty-four millions, and the other of at least one hundred millions.

Let us see, sir, what that means. The matter has two aspects—one of State policy, and the other of financial expediency.

As to the first, I have already shown, and I suppose nobody will question it, that the use of inconvertible legal-tender paper money was resorted to at the beginning of the war under the pressure of extreme danger and necessity. The very life of the Republic was in jeopardy; and, overruling our scruples, that extremity forced us to use what expedients we had at our disposal. That was the only justification we had before our own consciences and before the world for the issue of an inconvertible paper currency. To-day neither a foreign war nor a domestic rebellion is at our gates. We are in profound peace. Nor is there any other necessity of similar import pressing upon us. To be sure our revenues are falling short of our expenditures; but there are several honest means by which such a difficulty can be provided for—rigorous retrenchment, or a new loan in the ordinary way, or taxation. In all these respects there is absolutely not what you could call unavoidable necessity for the issue of an addition to our irredeemable currency; and yet without such necessity we are urged to resort to a measure so extreme that only the direst necessity can justify it—the levying another forced loan, without interest, upon the people.

What are the reasons given in favor of such extraordinary advice? Not even that a sudden and general financial thunder-storm must be neutralized; for, I repeat, that stage of the business, as much as there was of it, lies far behind us in our case. No; the distinct purpose is, as Senators say, to make money easy; to give a new impulse to enterprise; to revive prosperity. Now, I would ask gentlemen, have they considered what that means? It means the inauguration of a system by which the Government of the United States is to exercise the power at its discretion, in order to produce a certain effect upon the business of the country, to issue any amount of irredeemable legal-tender paper money it pleases, which paper money by additional issues may—nay, certainly will—further depreciate, thus changing all current values in the country; in other words, a system which virtually will place all the private fortunes of the country at the sovereign mercy of the Federal Government. Do not say that the Executive alone will not be permitted to exercise such a tremendous and dangerous power. We will suppose Congress reserves it all to itself—is the danger less? Do you think that the American people, calmly considering the matter, ever will or ever safely can intrust any branch of the Federal Government with so awful a discretion? And such a system is inaugurated as soon as we admit that Congress may, without the most overwhelming necessity springing from immediate and extreme public danger, at its discretion, merely to exercise a certain influence upon the business of the country, issue whatever amount of legal-tender currency it pleases. None but despotic governments have ever claimed such a power—virtually the power of debasing the coin of the realm, and even worse. It has never been resorted to without the most sweeping ruin and disaster; and I hope Congress will pause and consider well before raising so monstrous a policy to the dignity of a system.

Now, as to the economic aspect of that matter; let us first clearly determine in our own minds what we are driving at before taking action. Senators say that more irredeemable paper money is to be issued to revive prosperity. I admit that you can, by an increase of our irredeemable currency, produce certain effects. Issue it freely and abundantly, and you can and will, perhaps beyond your own expectations, for a little while give a new impulse to that business which by the crisis has in part come to a stand-still; but you will do more in effect; you will get more than you bargained for. You can and you will by this measure revive and endow with new and greater strength all those pernicious influences which our inconvertible currency has exercised for the last eleven years upon the business of the country. You can and you will put the Gold Room in New York in full blast again. You can and you will make the whole menagerie of bulls and bears jolly once more. You can and you will prop up some of those rotten concerns which the longer they stand the more innocent people they will involve in their downfall. You can and you will reanimate that spirit of reckless speculation, and set up again some of those windy enterprises which have drawn away so much of the capital of the country from productive business, and wasted it. You can and will make our banks and institutions of credit once more the mere tenders of wild speculation and dealers in fictitious values. You can and will seduce our merchants and manufacturers once more to spread their capital and their credit all over creation. You can and will make trade lively for a while by driving up prices to an unnatural height. You can and will stop that economy which has now commenced, and incite reckless extravagance in our social life once more, even beyond any point which it had reached before. You can and will encourage the importation of luxuries even beyond the figures of 1872. You can and will make people believe once more that they can get rich by gambling in its various forms much more easily and much more rapidly than by honest work, and thus deter them from that honest work. In one word, you can and will fill that balloon once more with the gas of a redundant, irredeemable currency, and thus prepare for a near future a crash, a collapse, attended with even more bankruptcy, ruin, and misery than we are now beholding around us.

Why will all the evil influences of an irredeemable currency be even more active than before if in this case you revive them? Because by the very act of issuing additional currency at this time Congress will give the schemers, the speculators, and the gamblers of the country reason to expect that whenever their wild operations produce another crisis, Congress will again step in "to revive the business of the country and give prosperity a new start," so as to secure to them a double chance of gain, or at least impunity in their operations.

All this can and will most surely be accomplished by inflation. An inflation of $44,000,000 will go very far toward doing it, and an inflation of $100,000,000, as proposed by the Senator from Michigan, will most certainly do it; for you may be sure the more of an addition you give now, the more imperative will soon be a demand for still more. And for exactly the same reasons which move you now to propose an addition to the currency you will have to grant still more. Why will this be so? Let us see.

The Senator from Michigan says that the crisis was caused by the circumstance that the volume of currency was insufficient for the business wants of the country. Now, sir, leaving aside the in my opinion utterly untenable assertion that the crisis was owing to such an insufficiency, I ask is it really true that the volume of the currency was insufficient for the business of the country? Consulting the best authorities that I can command, I find that in 1860 we had a currency circulation, specie and bank notes, of about $14.50 per capita, while to-day we have a per capita circulation of $18.75; that is to say, we had that before the $44,000,000 reserve was drawn upon so largely. With the additions so recently made it will be $19 and over. It appears, then, that according to that circulation the currency of the country has not only been very largely increased in the aggregate, but that even the ratio per head has been increased about 28 per cent. since 1860.

I know it is said that our general business has grown so immensely that not only not the same aggregate amount of currency, but not the same ratio per head, would be sufficient. I ask, sir, would an increase of business transactions at the same or even a greater rate render necessary a corresponding increase of the volume of the currency? I answer that it would not. It is a fact very well known to every one who has given the least study to this subject that the amount of currency actually handled in the transactions of business is exceedingly small in proportion to the values passing from hand to hand in the shape of mercantile and banking paper, bills, checks, &c. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] yesterday called attention to this fact; and in order to illustrate I will make a quotation from one of the standard works. To show approximately the proportion of banking transactions which are settled through the clearing-house in London, Sir John Lubbock, in a paper laid before the Statistical Society in June, 1865, made the following analysis of £23,000,000 sterling which passed through his bank in a few days:

Amount settled through the clearing-house, £16,346,000, or 70 per cent.; checks and bills not passed through the clearing-house, £5,394,000, or 24 per cent.; bank notes, £1,216,000; coin, £139,000; in all (bank notes and currency) 6 per cent.

From this statement it appears that 70 per cent. of the banking transactions are settled through the clearing-house, and consequently without the use of money. Of the remainder, also, 24 per cent. are settled without the use of money, by means of checks and bills; nearly 5 per cent. are settled in bank notes; and little more than 1 per cent. is settled in coin. So it appears that only 6 per cent. of money was used in the transactions here stated. I refer to these matters not as if they were anything new, for I know they are not, but because, after what we have heard on this floor, it is not entirely inappropriate now and then to refer to the elementary text-books.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to ask the Senator a question, if he will yield.

Mr. SCHURZ. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to ask the Senator a question in connection with that authority. I ask if he is prepared to state to the Senate what is the actual volume of the currency of England, including paper money and coin?

Mr. SCHURZ. I had not intended to speak of that; but I am prepared to satisfy the Senator.

Mr. MORTON. Any other time will do.

Mr. SCHURZ. I can state it now. I think it will fit in my argument very well here.

A recent and intelligent writer on finance and banking estimates—

The gold and silver in circulation in Great Britain at £70,000,000, or $339,500,000.

The circulation of the Bank of England, October 16, 1872, was £34,328,708, or $166,500,000.

The notes in circulation in the United Kingdom, other than those of the Bank of England, September, 1872, were as follows:

England	£5,057,910
Scotland	5,313,560
Ireland	7,242,081
	17,613,551

Or $85,425,000.

That was the state of the case in 1872; the total circulation in England amounted to $591,425,000, but the bank-note circulation at the present moment is less than that. According to a statement that I have seen the aggregate is about £42,000,000 at present. It appears from this statement that our circulation in the United States is vastly larger than that of England.

Mr. MORTON. I did not exactly understand that statement—whether the coin statement applies to England or the United Kingdom.

Mr. SCHURZ. The gold and silver in circulation in Great Britain is estimated at £70,000,000. That includes Scotland and Ireland of course.

The purposes for which this currency is mainly used are daily expenses, are wages, are balances, and so on; and the proportion of business transactions in which the whole value of the commodity passing from one person to another and is settled in currency is very small, as I have shown. It is also a well-known fact that it is the progress of civilization, in its various forms, which gradually diminishes the proportion of currency necessary for the transaction of trade, by the extension of railroads and telegraphs facilitating the rapidity of circulation, by further developments of the clearing-house system, and so on. So that as we progress we may rely upon it that a less volume of currency will be needed as compared with the business transactions going on.

It is of course very difficult, if not impossible, to state exactly in figures how much currency is needed by the business of the country; but there is a test by which the sufficiency or excess of an irredeemable currency for the wants of the country can be estimated. I hold in my hand a very valuable treatise on currency by Bonamy Price, in which this question is treated as follows——

Mr. MORTON. Would it interrupt my friend if I asked him a question, for I am seeking for information?

Mr. SCHURZ. Not at all.

Mr. MORTON. I ask him this question: whether, according to the showing he has just made, that the aggregate currency of England, coin and paper, is about $550,000,000——

Mr. SCHURZ. So it is stated.

Mr. MORTON. I ask him now if that is not a larger currency, all things considered, than ours at this time, for these reasons: In the first place, we have over forty millions of people, and they have about thirty-two millions. In the next place, their territory is comparatively small, and ours is vastly extended. In the next place, they have many more banking facilities than we have; they are close together, and the facility of bank credits is much greater than it is or can be in this country. Therefore, all these things considered, their facilities for bank credits being more than double ours, taking our great area, I ask my friend if the currency of England is not proportionally larger than that of this country?

Mr. SCHURZ. Yankee fashion, I will answer the question of the Senator by another question. Can he tell me whether, in the aggregate, the business transactions and the values involved in the business transactions in England are not much larger than the number of business transactions and the values involved in them here? Can he tell me? He does not answer; and if he cannot, then he confesses his inability to answer his own question.

I said that there was a test by which the sufficiency or excess of an irredeemable currency for the wants of business can be ascertained; and I am going to quote now from the treatise of Bonamy Price:

It remains for me now to speak of inconvertible paper money.

* * * * * * *

It is very important here to have a clear understanding of the events which occur under such a system of currency. In the first place, how are such notes born into the world?

* * * * * * *

A government finds itself in want of resources; it seeks the means of buying, of procuring the articles which it wants. To obtain, like a banker, the funds of other people without giving anything in return but a mere acknowledgment of debt, a mere promise to pay, is a temptation to which many states have shown themselves to be accessible. The government pays its debts, and makes purchases with these promises to pay, and then passes two enactments respecting them: first, that these promises to pay shall not be liable to be paid on demand; and, secondly, that they shall be a legal tender in the discharge of all debts and contracts throughout the land. And thus the question instantly arises, what effect does this exemption from immediate payment produce on the value of these inconvertible notes? Will a debt pledged to be repaid at twenty shillings pass from hand to hand when no longer capable of claiming the twenty shillings on demand, or will it and must it suffer depreciation? Experience has proved that it need not of necessity suffer any depreciation of value; that it may still circulate at twenty shillings, in spite of being no longer a warrant which can be immediately converted into coin. For years after the passing of the bank-restriction act the notes of the Bank of England suffered no discount; at a later period a guinea was worth twenty-seven shillings in notes.

How is this difference of effect to be explained? The general principles of currency, if you have fairly grasped them, will soon enable you to understand what occurs. You have seen that the public has a certain definite want for notes to use in the daily operations of buying and selling; there is a specific work to be done, and for that work it needs and will buy tools, precisely as a carpenter procures a basket of tools for the house that he is employed to build. For some portions of this work the public purchases sovereigns; for other portions it uses notes. Up to the full extent of this want, of this demand, of this capacity, to use notes, the public will not send them in for payment, but retain them, although it knows, when they are convertible, that it can at any time obtain sovereigns for them in exchange. This being so, it is plain that the prohibition to pay the notes can make no difference in the extent of the use which exists for the notes; so far as this reaches, it is immaterial whether the notes will or will not be paid on demand. The only fact which could stop their circulation would be their intrinsic worthlessness, for then they would be altogether incapable of doing the work of money; they would be unable to give security to the man who gave his goods for them, that he would be able by their means to buy other articles of equal value with those he had sold. This destructive feeling the law always takes care to guard against by enacting that these inconvertible notes shall be a legal tender and effectual discharge of all debts. They become good and serviceable notes then, in a measure; but in what measure, to what extent? In the first place, they are efficient tools, as good money, as convertible notes, provided that they are not issued in greater numbers than the quantity of convertible notes which would have been used; that is, provided that their numbers are not larger than the public can find employment for and hold. And remember always carefully the meaning of the phrase, that the use and demand for notes are those exchanges, that buying and selling, in which notes are actually handled. In the early years, under the bank-restriction act, the bank did not put more notes into circulation than were required for this specific use. Accordingly the notes suffered no depreciation, for there was no cause at work to depreciate them. It was understood all along that the bank recognized the notes as debts due by her to the public, though not to be paid for a while; and so long as the public really needed them, and would not have sent them in for payment had they been convertible, it did not matter a straw whether the day of payment was the day of their use or a day a hundred years later.

But circumstances were radically altered when the bank transgressed the limits of the real demand for notes, of the quantity which was actually needed for daily use. The difference of action between convertible and inconvertible notes then became instantly manifest. A convertible paper money encounters a most solid and objective obstacle to excess. The test, and a most real one it is, is instantly applied to superfluity; the notes issued beyond the public wants are immediately sent back to the banker for payment. The vessel is full, and every additional note makes it to overflow.

* * * * * * *

But inconvertible notes once placed with the public cannot be driven back. The issuing valve opens in one way only; the excess remains amongst the public. What are the consequences of this fact, and by what rule are they measured? The notes which surpass the demand become an article, of which the supply exceeds the demand; they fetch a lower price, as every other commodity does under similar circumstances.

* * * * * * *

In other words, the notes fall to a discount, as when twenty-seven shillings of notes had to be given for a guinea of gold; or, which is the same thing, gold rises to a premium compared with the paper currency, as we now see happening in America. The American premium on gold does not indicate that gold, as such, has acquired a larger purchasing power; it is only another name for the discount attached to the greenbacks.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Will the Senator allow me to put a question to him?

Mr. SCHURZ. Yes, sir.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I am not disposed to interrupt the Senator out of curiosity, but my object is to arrive at the truth, as we all are desirous of arriving at it. The Senator has elaborately read the theory of some writer. I would like to ask him if he can explain the experience of France at this day, where it has seven hundred millions of coin, and but six hundred millions of currency, and is yet under suspension?

Mr. SCHURZ. Whenever we come to discuss the affairs of France I shall take up the facts and figures concerning that country, which I have not now before me; but the Senator will understand that if I permit myself to be led away from my subject into an explanation of all the financial systems and phenomena of Europe, I shall never get through with the discussion now in hand. I suggest to the Senator that we take up extraneous matters at another time. In the meanwhile I shall proceed to show the Senator in the course of my remarks that it will not be easy to controvert the theory laid down in the passage just quoted.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I am not disposed to controvert it any more than to put experience against theory.

Mr. SCHURZ. The principle laid down here that an inconvertible currency may remain at par as long as it does not exceed the amount of money actually required by the business of the country, and that its continued depreciation is a sure indication of excess in issue, is verified by the history of all countries in which an irredeemable currency has existed. It is a thing in which, so far as I know, all political economists are perfectly agreed. And here again I could multiply quotations for hours to substantiate that assertion.

The Senator from Michigan, when he spoke last, affirmed that the volume of the currency had nothing to do with its depreciation, and he produced a table showing that in our case the premium on gold did not always correspond with the expansion or contraction of the currency, but that it indulged in singular freaks sometimes. This has undoubtedly been so. The amount of depreciation which an inconvertible currency suffers, the extent of its fluctuations in value from time to time, do certainly not depend upon its volume alone. They depend in a great measure upon public opinion, upon the hopes and fears entertained by the people, especially in times of great public danger and political commotion. Unfortunate events, gloomy prospects, will increase the depreciation, and vice versa. Popular confidence or distrust in the Government will do the same. The financial operations of the Government, the combined action of speculators, the temporary currents of business will occasionally affect it; and thus it happens that the amount of the depreciation of the currency is not always an exact measure of the amount of its excess in volume over the natural wants of general business. But such occurrences do not refute the general principle, that the issue of an inconvertible currency, in excess of the natural wants of the business of the country, results at once in its depreciation, and that such depreciation, when it steadily continues in comparatively quiet times, undisturbed by extraordinary events, as it has here during the last four years, is a sure sign of its excess as to the wants of the country. The Senator from Michigan himself, when he considers the matter without prejudice, will, by every process of reasoning and every method of observation, be led to the inevitable conclusion that had the existing volume of the circulating medium been really insufficient for the necessities of the legitimate business of the country, it would have been absolutely impossible for the prices of commodities to maintain themselves at the high inflation point at which they have stood for years; and the unavoidable demand for currency would have undoubtedly raised its current value to a par with gold. Nay more than that, had the vacuum caused by the insufficiency of the circulating medium been so great as seriously to impede the exchange of commodities, the very force of necessity would have driven the gold coin which is still attainable out of its hiding-places, to fill that vacuum and to circulate by the side of the paper currency.

When now, in the face of all these facts and economic laws, the Senator from Michigan still undertakes to assert that the volume of an irredeemable currency has nothing to do with its depreciation, he performs a feat of courage which, down to this time, no political economist has ever been capable of. And I venture to assert that no sooner will Congress, adopting his proposition, declare in favor of inflating the currency instead of making preparation for resumption, than the mere fact will at once increase the depreciation of the currency once more. The issue of these $100,000,000 will probably depreciate it beyond any point at which it has stood since 1869; and possibly then the Senator from Michigan will also recognize the relation between cause and effect.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. If I have understood the Senator correctly, he has stated that the gradual decline of the premium on gold has been caused mainly by the peaceful, quiet condition of the financial affairs of the country, and that in no regard, as his argument tends, does the volume of currency affect the premium on coin.

Mr. SCHURZ. Did I say that? No, I beg your pardon. I said that the fluctuation of the depreciation of the currency is not regulated alone by its volume in excess of the wants of business, but that there are other agencies which now and then affect it, and I have mentioned those agencies.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I understood the Senator to say that the nearer we approached par, the greater the prospect of gold taking the place of the deficiency in the volume of currency.

Mr. SCHURZ. No, sir; I did not say anything of the kind. I did not speak of any approach to par at all; but I said that when in comparatively quiet times, when none of the disturbing agencies which I had mentioned as possibly affecting the depreciation of the currency were acting, and when the currency remained steadily depreciated, it was a sure sign that the currency was in excess of the real wants of the business of the country.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Just let me ask one question, and I will not interrupt the Senator further. I ask the Senator how he accounts for the fact that in the midst of the panic coin was at its lowest ebb, or at least the premium was the lowest. I think gold stood 106 in the market then, and that was the lowest point since the war. That was in the midst of the panic, when the whole country was disturbed.

Mr. SCHURZ. What does the Senator mean by that question? What point is he driving at?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. As I understand the Senator, he said that the relation between currency and coin was affected very much by the disturbed condition of the financial or business interests of the country.

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senator is undoubtedly aware that during panics there are moral agencies at play which are not active in ordinary times; we notice these extraordinary phenomena. I will not, however, attribute to this general fact the low rate of the discount on our currency during the panic. The immediate cause was the circumstance that very large amounts of the currency were hoarded, and thus withdrawn from circulation—a circumstance which naturally had the same effect that contraction would have had. In what way does this fact discredit the theory I have just been stating? Can the Senator tell me?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. All I have to say is, that the Senator has attempted to refute the position I have taken, verified by the table which I submitted to the Senate. I did not state that the volume of currency had not somewhat controlled, but that the volume of currency had not regulated, the price of gold; and in support of that I submitted a statement of the semi-annual relation between currency and coin since the currency was issued up to last fall. In that table is shown the fact that during the panic gold stood the lowest, coming down to a premium of 6 per cent. And now I answer the question put directly by the Senator to me. When he states that the relation between the two is governed largely by the attitude of the country and the attitude of the financial and industrial relations of the country—in other words, that when it is peacefully controlled the gradual decline of the premium is assured, I state to him that in the midst of a panic, when the country was never so disturbed as it was last September, the price of gold was the lowest that it has been since the war.

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senator must be aware that although the premium on gold did go down to about 6 per cent. during the panic, it has been down to almost that premium several times within the last three years. It was down to 107 in 1871; it was down to 107⅛ in 1872; and then went up again.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. That is not so.

Mr. SCHURZ. It is certainly so. The record shows it. I conclude that in this light the fluctuations of the currency do not disprove the theory I have stated; and the decline of the premium on gold during the panic does not alter the case.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If the Senator will permit me, I think he admits too much. The price of gold did not go down to 6 per cent.; it went down to 9 or a fraction under, and bills were locked up so that 3 per cent. premium was paid for bills; and that made a difference as between bills and specie of 6 per cent.

Mr. SCHURZ. But the particular effect which the Senator from Michigan mentioned during the panic has, as I have stated, and as I now repeat, been in a natural way brought about by the withdrawal of large quantities of currency from circulation, many people hoarding it.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. In answer to the Senator from Vermont I will say that my table was made up from the quotations in Wall street; and if the daily quotations there have been wrongfully submitted to the country, I am not responsible for it. But the quotations during the panic were 106. If the Senator from Vermont has authority that overrides this, then, certainly, I will surrender the argument; but so long as that was the quotable rate of the premium on coin, being at the lowest ebb in the midst of convulsion, I take it that it refutes the position taken by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SCHURZ. I think the Senator will stand alone in that assertion; but he will have an opportunity to explain his theory on that point when I am through. I merely desire to repeat a third time that the main cause of the fall of the premium on gold during the panic was that a large amount of currency was hoarded and thus withdrawn from circulation.

In one sense, however, the assertion of the Senator from Michigan appears more plausible, and it would remain so if we should expand the currency to the amount of ten thousand millions. Even then many people would complain, and have certain reason to complain, of the insufficiency of the currency, just as they are now doing, if not more. Why will this be so? It is a universally known fact, and I believe not doubted by any well-informed person, that an excessive issue of currency at once effects a general rise in the prices of commodities. It has always been so, and naturally must be so. When this is the case with a currency which to the vice of redundancy adds the vice of inconvertibility, as it depreciates its purchasing power becomes less, and the rise in prices continues; and this being so, the efficiency of the currency as a means of exchange has, in spite of its expansion, virtually not increased, but in consequence of this process rather diminished. For this reason a continually progressive increase of the currency is demanded. I may quote here the language of a political economist of note on this point. It is Amasa Walker. He says:

> A credit currency—
>
> Meaning an irredeemable currency—
>
> never has been regulated in such a manner as to keep it on a par with specie, and probably never will be. The necessities of government are so pressing that the temptation to increase the amount becomes too great for resistance. As prices rise in consequence, the currency becomes of less and less value—that is, has a decreasing power in exchange, so that the inducement to issue becomes continually stronger as the volume expands. Unless this course can be arrested, final bankruptcy is sure.—Walker's Science of Wealth, page 135.

And in another place, speaking of a redundant currency generally, he says:

> The more that is issued of a mixed currency, the more will be wanted. The supply does not satisfy the demand; it excites it. Like an unnatural stimulus taken into the human system, it creates an increasing desire for more; and the more it is gratified the more insatiable are its cravings.
>
> There are two reasons for this: one, that, as the currency is expanded, prices are raised correspondingly, and more currency is demanded to effect the same exchanges; the other, that the speculation inevitably following the rise of prices leads to an enormous extension and repetition of indebtedness, which requires for its discharge a greatly increased amount of the circulating medium. Thus, by the action and interaction of these causes, the demand for the issue of this kind of currency is certain to be greatest when it is already redundant.

The least reflection will convince us that it is so. This is one of the causes of our apparent insufficiency which does not exist in reality, and of a continual demand for more. But there is still another. It is not that there are not enough greenbacks and bank notes as tools of exchange in the hands of the public generally to supply the natural wants of business, but because some people who want to use them in legitimate business have not got them, while others who do not use them in legitimate business contrive to control them. It is a universally recognized fact that a redundant currency, and especially an irredeemable one, always begets and stimulates speculative enterprises, that such speculation diverts capital from legitimate business, that especially when carried on by powerful combinations it presses currency into its service, and that the currency is thus concentrated at the centers of speculation, while it is drawn away from where it is needed by legitimate business. Legitimate business is thus sometimes cramped, while of course the speculators themselves can never get enough for their operations. Hence a continual and insatiable demand for more; and if you want the proof of this assertion examine only the transactions of the New York banks in our days.

Now this cannot be remedied by an expansion of our irredeemable currency. The more the currency is expanded and speculation stimulated, the greater will this evil become and the more strenuous the demand for more. For this reason, also, I do not believe that the remedy suggested by my colleague [Mr. BOGY] the other day will be effective. He proposed that the national banking currency should be so redistributed as to give to the West a greater amount. In many respects, I should see good reasons to approve of this proposition, but I do not think that if in the West new national banks were created or the issues of those that exist already were increased, the money would stay there. It would not remain near its point of issue, and for this reason it is impossible for national banks whose issue has been out for some time to gather up any considerable amount of their circulation. It will go where it is attracted by the business of the country, and especially by speculation. The operation is as if you emptied a vessel of water on the top of a hill; it will not stay there but find its way down.

Thus it becomes certain that as some people complain of the insufficiency of the currency now, they will complain still more loudly after a new inflation of the currency shall have had its effects, and if we should follow the cries for more and more, I candidly ask the Senators from Indiana and Michigan where we shall land? We shall land where the assignats landed France; and where the continental money landed the United States at the commencement of our national career—in overwhelming bankruptcy.

Equal to the remarkable delusion that an expansion of our irredeemable currency will increase its efficiency as a means of exchange is the kindred hallucination that such an expansion will reduce the current rate of interest. Just the reverse is true; and why? Let me read a few words from John Stuart Mill's Principles of Political Economy, which will set this question in the clearest possible light:

> Suppose money to be in process of depreciation by means of an inconvertible currency, issued by a government in payment of its expenses. This fact will in no way diminish the demand for real capital on loan; but it will diminish the real capital loanable, because, this existing only in the form of money, the increase of quantity depreciates it. Estimated in capital the amount offered is less, while the amount required is the same as before. Estimated in currency, the amount offered is only the same as before, while the amount required, owing to the rise of prices, is greater. Either way the rate of interest must rise. So that in this case increase of currency really affects the rate of interest, but in the contrary way to that which is generally supposed, by raising, not by lowering it.
>
> The reverse will happen as the effect of calling in or diminishing in quantity a depreciated currency. The money in the hands of lenders, in common with all other money, will be enhanced in value; that is, there will be a greater amount of real capital seeking borrowers; while the real capital wanted by borrowers will be only the same as before, and the money amount less. The rate of interest, therefore, will tend to fall.
>
> We thus see that depreciation, merely as such, while in process of taking place, tends to raise the rate of interest; and the expectation of further depreciation adds to this effect; because lenders who expect that their interest will be paid, and the principal perhaps redeemed in a less valuable currency than they lent, of course require a rate of interest sufficient to cover this contingent loss.—Principles of Political Economy, page 391.

Nothing in the world could be clearer; and it is a spectacle appealing to our pity, as well as exciting our indignation, when we see men who ought to know better go about the country peddling the atrocious nonsense that if we only issue five or six hundred millions more of irredeemable currency the rate of interest will go down to 3 per cent.

Thus the relief sought by an inflation of our currency turns out to be a mere delusion, as anybody who had given any attention to the subject always knew it must. But there are people who seem to be clinging with a child-like faith to the ridiculously absurd notion that by printing and issuing more Government promises to pay we shall increase the wealth of the country. We might call it a ludicrous form of superstition, if not insanity, were it not so serious and sad. Now, suppose for a moment we could, by some sort of witchery, wipe out all existing engagements in which money is involved, such as debts, contracts, and so on, and then multiply all the greenbacks and national-bank notes in the possession of the people by ten, so that, waking up some beautiful morning, every individual in the United States would find ten greenback dollars in his pocket, or safe, where the day before he had only one. What a jubilee there would be among fools. But what a disappointment as soon as the true state of the case became generally understood. Does any sane man think that by such multiplication the wealth of the country would be increased one farthing? It is evident that it would not. Does any sane man think that any individual in these United States would have become richer by the multiplication? Not a cent's worth; for, going to market the next morning, he would find that he would have to pay just ten dollars for what cost one dollar the day before. Does any sane man think that the currency, so multiplied, would have received an increased power of exchange? Not the least, for every transaction would require the use of ten dollars which the day before had required the use of only one. What would be the effect, then? No benefit at all to anybody; but the Government of the United States, still promising to pay one dollar in gold for one dollar in greenbacks, and being obliged to buy all it needs at ten times the former price, would soon find its debts increased beyond its power to bear it, its Treasury utterly bankrupt, and absolutely forced into repudiation. Then the greenbacks so multiplied would not be worth anything to anybody, and the people would find themselves forced, through universal confusion and ruin, to struggle slowly back to a specie basis in order to be able to do business at all.

You may say that this is supposing an extreme case, but I tell the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Indiana that every step we take in the direction of inflation is a step in the direction of just that result. I repeat, not only will expansion not bring in any sense the relief sought, but it will grievously aggravate the evils from which we are now suffering; and it will do that in two ways—first, by stimulating anew the evil tendencies which have already brought such disaster upon us, as I have shown; and secondly, by incalculably increasing the difficulties which stand in the way of a return to a sound and safe basis for our monetary system.

It is absolutely in vain for the Senator from Indiana to say that as soon as times grow more prosperous we may retire the greenbacks which we now issue in addition to the present volume. The very same class of reasons which urge him now to advocate an expansion of the currency will then be used against contraction. As in troublous times we are told that the currency must be increased to revive business, so in times of revived business, especially that kind of business which a new inflation of the currency is apt to revive, the cry will be, "Let well enough alone;" or, rather, "For Heaven's sake do not touch the bubble lest it burst at once;" and I shall wonder whether the Senator from Indiana will be the one to touch it. No illusion about that; the more we expand our irredeemable currency the farther we slide down the slope at the bottom of which is, not resumption, but repudiation; and every descending movement makes it more difficult to arrest the dangerous course.

It is equally in vain for the advocates of inflation to indulge in poetic eulogies on the beauties and virtues of our present currency. What do they mean when they tell us that our irredeemable legal-tender notes are the best currency this country ever saw, and that the people are so extremely fond of it? Do they not themselves know better? Can a currency be the best which fluctuates in value from day to day, thus unsettling all exchangeable values in the country?

But I will put the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Michigan to another test. If I should buy a house of either of them for $10,000, and now step before my honorable friends with $10,000 in gold in one hand and $10,000 in greenbacks in the other, and give them the choice as to which to take in payment, which would they choose? With both hands they would reach for the gold. Why? Because they know that $10,000 in gold are worth to-day at least $11,000 in greenbacks; $10,000 in the old currency worth at least $11,000 in the new. They would prefer 10,000 pieces of substance to 11,000 pieces of promise, would they not? I take it that the people of the United States are just as sharp as my honorable friends from Indiana and Michigan. There is not a person in the land who, if offered the choice, would not make the same. The people may be very fond of the greenback currency, and have great confidence in it; but being willing to pay one dollar and ten cents in greenbacks for one dollar in gold, the people like the gold currency at least 10 per cent. better than the greenbacks. Which is, now, the best currency that this country ever had? In which have the people more confidence? And what kind of an argument is it by which gentlemen try to prove the unbounded confidence of the people in the greenback currency when they say that people were actually so fond of it as to hoard it during the crisis? Of course they did. They had nothing else to hoard; and so, distrusting the banks, they hoarded the only currency they had. If they could have exchanged that currency at par for gold would they not have done it? Or is there anybody foolish enough to think, or bold enough to assert, that if they had had gold they would have made a run on the banks and on the Treasury to exchange that gold for greenbacks? The absurdity is apparent. I hope we may stop talking about "the best currency this country ever had," and "the popular confidence in irredeemable depreciated paper currency," since we all know better. It is mere talk to befog the good sense of the people.

But I am confident the people will gradually and surely learn to understand, if they do not understand it already, that, aside from its demoralizing influences, an irredeemable, depreciated, and fluctuating legal-tender currency is the most expensive money that can possibly be invented, for it obliges the Government to pay extravagant prices for all that it needs, and in consequence of its depreciation and its fluctuations it imposes upon the people a most unequal, unjust, extortionate, and oppressive tax, the more extortionate and oppressive as it is uncertain and irregular. And every addition to the currency causing further fluctuation and depreciation and further uncertainty of values renders that tax but more unjust and oppressive. The laboring man will learn to understand, if he does not understand already, that upon him this tax imposes an especially unjust and oppressive burden, because in the rise of general prices which always accompanies the expansion and depreciation of the currency, the wages of the laborer always rise last when he has already had for a time to pay inflation prices for his necessaries; while as soon as the inflated balloon collapses, he is the first to be plunged into the most grievous misery. And the farmer will learn to understand that while the prices he receives for most of the products of his toil are regulated by the foreign market, untouched by our home inflation, and exposed to the competition of all the world, the price of all he has to buy at home is driven up to an extravagant point by the influence of a depreciated currency, he being thus compelled to buy all he has to buy at prices which are far advanced, and to sell almost all he has to sell at prices which have remained very far behind. The farmer will understand at last that, injurious as is to him the tyranny of transportation monopolies and the operation of the tariff, the oppression he suffers from a fluctuating and depreciated currency is as great, if not greater; and it is to be hoped that the farmers who have risen to protect their interests will in their efforts not forget this most insidious and most burdensome oppression.

Thus, from whatever point of view we may look at it, every consideration of honor, of good faith, of general advantage, and of sound policy urges us to make an end as soon as possible of this iniquitous system.

Now, since all Senators admit that ultimately we must come back to a specie basis, the only question to be discussed in that respect seems to be that of method and opportunity. The difficulties which stand in the way of redemption I see clearly enough. In considering them I have at once to enter my protest against two plans suggested, which, as I believe, involve dangerous delusions. The first is that proposed by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] that we should first expand the currency in order to revive prosperity, which revived prosperity would then enable us to return to specie payments with greater ease and facility. The second is that proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] to do nothing, but let things remain as they now are, and to wait until the business of the country will have grown so much that its necessities will bring gold and paper to a par by a natural process of development.

The proposition of the Senator from Michigan appears to me so illogical, so visionary, that I can scarcely understand how he can have been in earnest in advancing it. Had the Senator proposed it for the distinct and avowed purpose of making our irredeemable currency perpetual, at least till the final breakdown shall come, it would have been intelligible and eminently practical; but as a pretended preparation for the resumption of specie payments, with due respect be it said, it looks to me like a huge joke. That the way to the resumption of specie payments, when there is already so much of irredeemable paper money that its very quantity is said to make resumption next to impracticable, should be to issue still more, appears to me, to say the least, somewhat funny. Most of the fallacies involved in this singular scheme I have already exposed. I have shown that an additional issue of greenbacks would at once revive all the dangerous influences which that kind of currency has exercised before, and always exercises wherever it exists, that wild enterprise, speculation, and gambling will spring up again, that a new expansion of credit will take place, that the cry for more and more paper money will appear with imperative and almost irresistible force; and so on until another crash puts an end to it. I need not go over that catalogue again.

It is really amazing that anybody should have to be told that the return to specie payments must be preceded by certain conditions the fulfillment of which will be rendered utterly impossible by the inflation policy proposed by the Senator from Michigan. It must be preceded by severe retrenchment in our public and private expenditures; by the abandonment of windy schemes and enterprises leading to the unproductive consumption and waste of capital; by abstinence from wild speculation and gambling; by moderation and prudence in the conduct of industrial and mercantile business; by a new and practical recognition of the truth that honest, productive labor is the true source of wealth; by the accumulation and judicious employment of savings, instead of an unnatural expansion of credit and an accumulation of debt.

These are the things that are necessary to render specie resumption practicable without leading to serious embarrassment and disaster. But now let the cry of the Senator from Michigan, "Prosperity through currency expansion," prevail, and what will be the result? Then, sir, good-by retrenchment and economy, whatever may be said or attempted to-day, with the spectacle of an embarrassed Treasury before us. Already we hear prominent inflationists say that a great government like ours should consider it beneath its dignity to be niggardly in its expenses. Let "prosperity through inflation" prevail, and in a short time our expenditures, public and private, will be more extravagant and reckless than ever. Then good-by prudence and moderation in enterprise and in the conduct of industrial and mercantile business. In a short time wilder schemes than ever will waste our capital. Then good-by to general respect for honest labor, for getting rich through speculation and gambling, without work, will be more popular and seductive than ever. Good-by reduction of indebtedness in the business community, and contraction of credits. The credit balloon will be strained soon to the bursting point again. That is your "return to specie payments by prosperity through inflation." We had a curious instance the other day how, in such things, cause and effect are mistaken.

The junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] gave us the statistics of our extravagant importations of luxuries, to show how difficult the resumption of specie payments would be if we continued to export specie for luxuries at such a rate, and then he exclaimed, "Look at this list, and who shall say that we are not the most extravagant people under the sun, trampling under foot all wise economic laws?" That was very well spoken. The Senator was right. But then he went on advocating an increase of our irredeemable currency; and now what will he answer when I show him that in making that proposition he did some of that trampling under foot of all wise economic laws himself? He evidently did not consider that an expansion of the currency is always accompanied by an increase of importations. Here I hold in my hand a table showing that in thirty years, with the exception of only two, which exception can be explained upon other grounds, the importation of goods from abroad has continually and most strikingly corresponded with the expansion of our currency, and vice versa. This fact stares us in the face. It is impossible to question it.

This being so, if the Senator from Indiana wants to reduce the extravagance of importations, he should insist upon contraction and not upon expansion. If the Senator is disturbed by our extravagant importations now, what will he have to say when more paper money is issued, and the importations become more extravagant than ever? There is another instance of your return to specie payments by "prosperity through inflation." It is exactly like the advice to drink brandy in order to get sober.

I approach now the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] that we should sit still, do nothing with the currency, waiting patiently and quietly for the development of the resources of the country and the increase of business to bring greenbacks and gold together in value, as he said in his speech a few days ago. When in his opinion that period is likely to arrive the Senator did not tell us, and yet an answer to just that question would be a very valuable piece of information coming from the principal champion of that policy. I will venture to ask the Senator from Massachusetts, in perfect good faith, whether in his opinion the present condition of things is entirely satisfactory? He certainly will say no.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Does the Senator want an answer? I say no; and I say that the suggestion made by the Senator from Missouri promises to bring upon us a more unsatisfactory condition than that which exists now.

Mr. SCHURZ. I ask whether in his opinion what I have said about the evil influences of our irredeemable and depreciated currency is not substantially true; whether that kind of currency has or has not shown a tendency to engender unproductive enterprises, over-speculation, and gambling; the creation of fictitious values, an over-straining of the credit system, a general demoralization of business, not to speak of social life; a continual demand for more and more of such money, and so on; apt to lead finally to great breakdowns and ruinous disaster? He certainly will not deny that; and if he cannot in the face of the facts known to all deny it, I would further ask whether every day that such a system is continued just as it now is, with all these influences and effects, is not a day of danger?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, as the Senator from Missouri has appealed to me, I will take this occasion to state very concisely the position which I occupy. In what he has said concerning the evils of an inflated paper currency, barring some exaggerations of rhetoric, I concur with him. In what he seems to propose—immediate, unconditional, forcible contraction of the currency of the country, as a means of remedying the evils which we suffer—my position is, that the consequences of that policy would be infinitely more disastrous to the country than the evils under which we are now suffering.

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senator from Massachusetts has somewhat anticipated my conclusions.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I supposed I should.

Mr. SCHURZ. But he has not anticipated them quite correctly. If he had waited until I had finished my speech I think he could have spoken with much more intelligence of what I was going to propose than now.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If the Senator from Missouri is against contraction, and is disposed to wait for the development of the country, and the increase of the business and power and prosperity of the people by natural causes, and does not propose a remedy by artificial application, then we are together.

Mr. SCHURZ. No, sir; we are not together. When I asked the Senator from Massachusetts whether he does not substantially agree with me in all I have said as to the evil influences of an irredeemable and redundant currency, he declared, as the Senate has heard him, that he did. I was just now asking him, unable and unwilling as he is, in the face of the facts known to all, to deny these evil influences, whether every day that such a system is continued just as it now is, with all these influences and effects, is not a day of danger. Can it be continued without serious peril to every interest we hold dear? Certainly it cannot. And if it cannot be continued without such peril, and he still advises us to hold on to the currency just as it now is and thus to continue that peril, may we not at least expect of him to show that he has himself a definite idea whether the period which, by some natural process of development, is to bring us the relief so sorely needed, is near at hand or not? Is it quite enough that he should refer us to some indistinct, nebulous future, the darkness of which he himself does not pretend to have penetrated? Is it enough to say, as he said in his speech the other day, that it will come in time; how long a time it may require he cannot tell, but in time? Has he considered what may intervene; nay, what is most likely to intervene, according to the laws of cause and effect, between this day and that indefinite future? Has he considered that unless we soon take decided steps to change our system, it becomes with every day more probable that by some means further inflation will be forced upon us as it is being enforced upon us now, and the promised period of relief will be removed into a still further and more nebulous future; and that if we want to avoid the most evident danger of sliding backward, it is absolutely necessary that in some way we should go forward.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SCHURZ. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask whether he, with his sense of the evils of inflation, will for himself favor inflation if the Congress of the country should not favor contraction, or whether he will then stand upon the good we have rather than to fly to evils because we cannot get a better system?

Mr. SCHURZ. No, sir; I shall never favor inflation; but I hope——

Mr. BOUTWELL. If there is a majority of members of this body or of the other standing either with the Senator from Missouri or with myself, we are then able to resist the tendency to inflation; and if it be not possible for those who are in favor of contraction, who are by the number of one at least less than those together who occupy the position I occupy and those who occupy the position of the Senator from Missouri, how can he with his associates expect to resist inflation, if through their influence, combined with others, inflation is probable?

Mr. SCHURZ. Why, sir, I have been trying to demonstrate all the time that if we want to resist inflation, we cannot stand still with our arms folded; for the simple reason that then we shall be driven into inflation. Has he not understood me? We are being driven into inflation at this very moment. Already the reserve has been drawn upon to the amount of $25,000,000. Has not the Senator from Massachusetts himself, perhaps unwittingly, in his speech expressed an instinctive apprehension of the possibility of a pressure pushing us in the direction of inflation? When he spoke of his policy of "maintaining steadily the volume of currency at the minimum point," he then added the very important and significant qualification, "as far as practicable." Does he not know how elastic such an expression, "as far as practicable," has already been made by the drafts upon the $44,000,000 reserve which we witnessed, and by which the Government itself started inflation? Does he not know how much more elastic the expression, "as far as practicable," may be made when, by new embarrassments or a new period of speculation, the minds of men are again thrown out of their balance? Does he not know that inflation "as far as practicable" without legislation is going on to-day? Does he not feel himself, therefore, the truth of what I say, that if we want to resistthis current which drives us into inflation, we absolutely must go forward in the opposite direction? And now, in the very face of the disasters surrounding us, and the awful chances and perplexities which threaten us, is a mere passive reliance upon a dim idea, a vague trust, that things which so far have gone badly will henceforth go very well and come all right in time—is that the only foundation upon which a great Government like ours should build its financial policy, when our honor and good name, when the fortunes of the country, and the morality of the people, are at stake?

Let me now apply to the Senator's policy a practical test. In his remarks the other day he declared himself opposed to contraction, which term, to judge from the spirit of his speech, included all legislative measures tending to bring on resumption of specie payments. The reason he gave was this: it would, he said, bring the business of the country to a stand, diminish the revenues, and by diminishing the revenues render taxation inevitable, and impair the credit of the country. Such were his words. Now, I would ask him whether I misrepresent the meaning of those words when I say that the Senator advocates the let-alone policy—and I call his policy so with all respect to him—that he advocates his favorite policy distinctly in order to avoid these disasters and difficulties? Of course I do not misrepresent him, for I quoted his words.

Now, let the Senator look around and examine the events which have recently taken place. What does he behold? He beholds there a crisis which did "bring business to a stand;" which did "diminish the revenues," which did thus imperil the credit of the country; and thus the identical things which he predicts as the result of legislation tending to specie payments have actually come to pass, and have come to pass under that identical do-nothing policy which he advocates in order to avoid those very disasters, and which he as Secretary of the Treasury, as well as his successor, faithfully adhered to, "as far as practicable." I venture to say, further, that that very do-nothing policy, keeping alive all the evil influences of a redundant, irredeemable currency, and strengthening them by creating a popular belief that according to the settled policy of the Government nothing will be done to counteract them, has very naturally aggravated the causes which brought about such results. I need not go over that whole catalogue again.

Such was the practical upshot of the do-nothing policy. This is a piece of history which cannot be denied, for it is known to all; and we had better try to understand its teachings instead of wasting our time looking through a telescope into the fog-banks of infinite space to watch the condensation of those nebulæ into that benignant star whose advent is to make us all happy and comfortable in spite of ourselves. The teachings of that piece of history, if we are willing to understand them, will convince us that the same economic disturbance which has occurred under the do-nothing policy now may and will come again if the causes and agencies which brought them forth are kept alive, even with a probability of their being strengthened; and that finally, after much more disgrace, much more tribulation, and much more suffering, we shall after all have to do the very things which the Senator from Massachusetts is afraid of doing, but then under far greater difficulties.

The policy of the Senator from Massachusetts is particularly dangerous because it carries a certain plausibility about it. There are a good many persons in this country, as there are in all other countries, who, not seriously occupying their minds with the subject, consider the science of finance one of those mysterious things which, as Lord Dundreary says, "no fellow can find out;" and who, because they do not take pains to investigate its laws, content themselves with saying there are none. When, in difficult circumstances, they do not know what should be done, and are confronted by difficulties and dangers which they cannot clearly comprehend, they easily persuade themselves that doing nothing is as safe as anything else. At any rate it relieves them of the trouble of thinking.

I need not say to the Senator from Massachusetts how highly I respect him; and I believe in the conscientiousness with which he advocates his favorite policy; but it must occur to him, also, that it is that inert state of mind in the country which is so little suited to the exigencies of the country that his policy is best calculated to confirm. I submit to the Senate that it is not a fitting part to be played by the Congress of the United States, when called upon to find remedies for a diseased condition of things, to stand still and let the disease work on for fear of "bringing business to a stand and of diminishing the revenue," when by the very operation of that disease business did come to a stand and revenues have been diminished. We shall indeed present a sorry spectacle to the world, hiding our heads in the sand, paralyzed with the apprehension that by moving we might break something, while the breakdown has actually occurred and the pieces of the wreck are flying about our ears. If the Senator will consult history he will discover that no country that was to any great extent cursed by an irredeemable legal-tender paper money ever got back to specie payments without bringing them on by decisive governmental action; and, as far as I know, every country that trusted to the dim idea of the general development of things to bring things all right, and thus abstained from governmental action, ran irresistibly into bankruptcy and ruin. So much for the policy of happy expectation.

Now, I repeat I do not underestimate the difficulties that stand in the way of resumption; but I declare as my candid opinion that since the first year after the close of the war, when our irredeemable-currency system had not so deeply eaten its way into the whole economic life of the nation, and when the business of the country had to adapt itself from the ways of war to the ways of peace—a moment which unfortunately we missed—the present time is the most opportune for the inauguration of a resumption policy; and if we lose that opportunity again we shall have to wait for another and perhaps more disastrous revulsion to see it return. And it is just from the present crisis in our economic affairs that the new opportunity springs. The reason is very simple. Many of the difficulties which, it was feared, would accompany and follow resumption have already been anticipated by the crisis. Much of that preparation which must precede resumption in order to avoid disastrous embarrassment has already been performed by the crisis.

What are those difficulties, and what is that necessary work of preparation? It is said that by a policy of resumption the debtor class would be greatly injured, inasmuch as a debt paid in gold would represent a greater value than the same debt did when it was contracted in depreciated paper. That is true; but it will always remain true; and if it is added that the debtor class is not yet ready for specie payments, it is certain that in that sense the debtor class never will be ready for specie payments, and that, therefore, resumption must be given up forever.

I do not underestimate the importance of the argument; but let us look it in the face.

In the first place, speaking of a debtor class and a creditor class, we involve ourselves in a confusion of ideas. There is no fixed debtor class composed of persons who always owe money and never have any money due them; nor is there a fixed creditor class composed of persons who always have money due them and never owe any. If there were such fixed and well-defined classes, the problem before us would appear very simple. Then we might say that when we suspended specie payments, and the legal-tender currency in which debts were discharged depreciated, the debtor class profited and the creditor class suffered loss to the amount of that depreciation; while, when we return to specie payments and the depreciation of the currency diminishes until greenbacks are on a par with gold, the debtor class would lose again what it had profited, and the creditor class would regain again what it had lost by the former operation. The accounts for the last thirteen years, as between the two classes, would then be about evenly balanced. But the fact is that some persons only occasionally owe money without having any due them, and some only occasionally have money due them without owing any; that those who are debtors to-day frequently become creditors to-morrow, and vice versa; and that a vast number of people owe money on one hand and have money due them on the other, thus being debtors and creditors at the same time; and this applies universally to the class of business men.

The talk about a debtor class and a creditor class in connection with the resumption of specie payments is therefore very mischievous, as it represents the question in the light of a struggle between two permanently distinct social bodies, the one trying to enrich itself by despoiling the other. The misrepresentation is only furnishing a fallacy to demagogues to excite the ignorant.

It is true, there are a great many people who owe more money than is due them, and who, if we should suddenly jump into specie payments, that is, all at once reduce the depreciation of the currency or the premium on gold from such and such per cent. to nothing, would suffer that percentage of loss through the increase in the value of their indebtedness; thus losing more in their character of debtors then they would gain in their character of creditors. But here two things are to be taken into consideration. In the first place, a wise resumption policy will not force the transition from a depreciated paper to a specie basis all of a sudden, but approach the result to be reached with gradual steps, extending over a sufficient space of time, say two or three years. To this statement I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts, who thought he had anticipated me. I do not know a single advocate of specie payments who proposes anything else. Such a gradual reduction of the depreciation of the currency would endanger and injure debtors much less than they have hitherto been endangered and injured by the continual fluctuations of that currency.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] told us the other day that the country could not endure a change in the value of our paper money of 10 per cent., which, at that time, was the discount on greenbacks.

Mr. MORTON. I wish the Senator would state the whole proposition. I said, not within a year, or a short time.

Mr. SCHURZ. Exactly. This makes my case only stronger. I might then ask him how it was possible for the country to survive the violent and fitful ups and downs which the currency has passed through during the last eight years. In the year 1866 the difference between the highest and the lowest point of the premium on gold was 42¼ per cent.; in 1867 it was 14⅜ per cent.; in 1868 it was 17⅞ per cent.; in 1869 it was 38½ per cent.; in 1870 it was 13½ per cent.; in 1871 it was 7 per cent.; in 1872 it was 7½ per cent., and in 1873 13 per cent.; so that it appears that that difference of 10 per cent., which the Senator from Indiana stands in such mortal fear of, has occurred over and over again, and fourfold in one year, within the last eight years. And now the Senator from Indiana wants to perpetuate the present system, nay, seeks to aggravate it by adding to the currency, and keep these fluctuations going on as they have been for the last eight years.

In the second place, this difficulty has been considerably lessened by recent events. The crisis has led to a very extensive liquidation of debts, so that the aggregate amount of pivate indebtedness is to-day much smaller than it was a year ago; while in consequence of a reduction of business transactions new debt is being contracted at the present moment to a far less degree than it has been for years.

It will naturally go on decreasing if a resumption policy is adopted, and the sure prospect of a return to specie payments gives warning to the business community to beware of extensive engagements. Every sensible man will take care not to run into debt any more than is absolutely necessary when he knows that the money in which he will have to pay that debt will appreciate to a certain amount in a certain time.

Aside from greatly reducing the losses which otherwise resumption might bring with it, these circumstances would naturally prevent a dangerous expansion of credit and give back to the business of the country a healthy tone and a safe and sound basis; and that I suggest is a thing which we stand very much in need of. There is not a business man in the country who could not with a little circumspection, and with the certainty of resumption at a certain period before his eyes, so arrange and manage his affairs as to reduce the possibility of loss through the appreciation of his debts to a minimum that will not very much injure him, especially as in business life debt contracts run only on short time; very short indeed in proportion to the period in which the gradual appreciation of the currency is to take place.

I say, therefore, as far as the debt question is concerned, no better time for the inauguration of the resumption policy can possibly be found than just the present moment. The number of creditors and the aggregate amount of indebtedness will hardly ever be less than after the liquidations and the business contractions of a crisis, and both will certainly grow again at a rapid rate, unless we enjoin caution upon the business community by the sure prospect of resumption. They will grow to an enormous extent if we expand the currency, and blow up the credit balloon once more.

In this connection I must devote a few words to the confused talk about the West as the debtor section of the country upon which resumption would inflict peculiarly heavy losses. The fallacy involved in the term "debtor section" I have already exposed when speaking of the debtor class. It is true that western business men have to depend in their operations to a very great extent upon their credit in the East, and therefore contract from time to time considerable indebtedness, which, however, is periodically covered by shipments of western products. I have already shown that in consequence of the crisis private indebtedness all over the land is very considerably reduced, in which respect the West certainly does not form an exception, and how business men by prudent management, as will be forced upon them by the prospect of resumption, can easily protect themselves against serious difficulties.

But there is another aspect of the case. The economic interest of the West is mainly agricultural. The western people are, by overwhelming preponderance, a farming population. Their whole prosperity depends upon the successful and profitable cultivation of the soil. If it is true that the farmer, for all the necessaries he had to buy, had to pay prices blown up by our irredeemable and redundant currency, even far beyond the point to which the tariff alone would have driven them, while the prices of almost all the staples he had to sell were regulated by a foreign market, untouched by home inflation, governed by a specie measure of value, and exposed to the free competition of the world—if that is true, and I trust nobody will deny it, must it not be equally true that the farming interest, and through it the whole western country, will not only not be injured, but be vastly benefited, by a resumption of specie payments, which will greatly reduce the prices at which the farmer has to buy his necessaries, while not reducing, but greatly increasing, the purchasing power of the crops he produces and has to sell? And will not this immense advantage in fact vastly overbalance any possible amount of loss which might be suffered in consequence of temporary indebtedness, and which by prudent management may be made very small?

I hear it said that there are a great many farmers whose farms are covered with mortgages, and who would be greatly injured by specie resumption, inasmuch as the money in which they would have to pay off the mortgages would be of higher value than the money in which they contracted the debt. But how can they expect to pay their mortgages unless they derive the necessary profit from their farms? And how can they derive that profit from their farms if they continue to labor under the same disadvantage, having to buy at high prices and to sell at prices that are low? Moreover, what will be the consequence if we inflate the currency still more? Will not, by the operation of the same laws, the farming business be still more depressed? Will not, in consequence of the still aggravated disadvantage of buying at high and selling at low prices, the mortgages accumulate upon their farms in a worse degree than heretofore, and when, then, the day of settlement comes, will not their discharge be more difficult than ever? I insist, therefore, that the agricultural interest, and with it the whole West, and the South, too, which were never benefited, but always injured by inflation, and will be still more grievously injured by further inflation, will not in any way be injured, but in every respect be vastly benefited by a return to specie payments; and if I stood upon this floor not as the advocate of the interests of the whole country, but as a mere advocate of western interests, I would advocate specie payments with no less zeal than I am now doing.

Another difficulty standing in the way of resumption arises from the shrinkage of the prices of commodities accompanying that process. But this difficulty also is far less formidable now than at any time within many years. The crisis has brought down prices already, and it is questionable whether resumption would depress the general average much lower. For several months merchants all over the country have been careful to keep only light stocks of goods on hand in view of a sinking market, and many of those stocks have been laid in at prices already considerably reduced. With the prospect of resumption before their eyes, they will be obliged to persevere in that cautious policy, adapt their purchases to the limits of actual demand, abstain from speculation and excessive importations, and be careful not to engage themselves beyond the bounds of safety. Thus they will be able to approach specie payments without serious difficulty, and their losses in consequence of the shrinkage of prices will be as light as we ever can expect them to be.

Moreover, there are certain kinds of property which will scarcely suffer any depreciation at all, because they did not participate in the inflation of prices. I have already called the attention of the Senate to the fact that all those products of agriculture whose prices are regulated by the foreign market did not keep pace with the rise of home prices caused by currency inflation; and I may add that the price of that class of farming lands which did not happen to become the subject of speculation, or whose value was not enhanced by the building of railroads or other contrivances of communication, but depended for their value upon the value of their products—that is, a large majority of the farming lands—has been left behind in the general rise of prices altogether; and this is especially the case in the West.

I repeat, it must be evident to every candid observer of passing events that a large part of the work of preparation for a return to specie payments, and perhaps the most delicate and painful part, has already been performed by the present crisis in our economic affairs. We have only to respond to the impulse we have thus received and we shall reach the end. At last the popular mind is beginning to measure the iniquities the existing system has brought forth, and to appreciate the necessity of reform—reform in private as well as in public affairs.

The cry of "economy and retrenchment" is resounding all over the land, so that even politicians begin to hear it, some with hope and some with fear.

The lessons taught by the recent disasters have impressed themselves upon the minds of men. The business man has been made to understand that an unnatural expansion of credit is not prosperity; that an accumulation of debt is not an insurance of wealth; and that the fruits of speculative gambling, seductive as they may appear, are apt to turn to ashes when you bring them to your lips. Let us take care to act upon these teachings before they are forgotten again; let that state of mind be confirmed and be taken advantage of before it again passes away.

Look at the forces opposed to us and examine their situation, their temper, and their power. The resumption policy is opposed, and a new inflation of the currency pressed by three classes of persons: first, the men who, with honesty of purpose and patriotic intentions, have arrived at what I consider erroneous conclusions—and on this floor we have heard their voice; secondly, men who, hearing the cry for more paper money, think it a popular cry, and therefore join in it; but behind them, pushing on with all the energy of unscrupulous selfishness, is a third class, consisting of speculators and gamblers, who were caught by the recent revulsion in the midst of their reckless operations, stripped of their spoil, and involved in heavy liabilities, who now want no end of inflation and further depreciation of the currency to settle their old scores cheaply, to recover their losses, and then to set out with full sail again on a new career of speculation and gambling, knowing full well that they are only preparing a new crash, but hoping to reap at least their harvest before it comes, and then "let the devil take the hindmost," no matter what may become of the country.

The first of these classes we may hope to convince by sound argument. The second may be turned by a new breeze of opinion clearing away the fog and revealing that the cry for more irredeemable paper money is not the cry of the people after all. But the third class consists of men of purpose, selfish, unbending, unscrupulous. Active and cunning as they are, no trick, from falsification of public opinion to downright corruption, will be left untried by them in their effort to control the movements of the business world as well as the legislation of the country. To-day they are still in a somewhat crippled condition, for the crisis has happily curtailed their means and exposed the character of their schemes; but before long they will be as powerful as ever, if the continuance of the present system enables them to recover from the recent shock and to entangle the business community of the country once more in the net of their operations, so that their fate will involve the fortunes of many others. Would it not be well to take advantage of their weakness?

Let me now, in as few words as possible, sum up the points I have stated, and I hope satisfactorily established:

1. The Government of the United States is in law and honor bound to pay the debt incurred by the issue of its promises to pay, as soon as by its own action it can render itself able to pay.

2. When, under circumstances like ours, an irredeemable paper currency is constantly depreciated, at a discount as to coin, that depreciation proves that its volume is in excess of the real wants of the general business of the country. This being the case with our paper currency, the present crisis cannot have been caused by any insufficiency of that currency as to the real requirements of business.

3. While a sudden fright or panic, showing itself in runs upon banks, &c., may under certain circumstances be momentarily checked by an additional issue of currency—a stage of affairs which lies several months behind us—a crisis caused by the unproductive consumption of capital and overspeculation cannot be remedied by an addition to an already redundant paper currency.

4. The proposition that the Government may, without the most pressing necessity springing from extreme public danger, issue any additional amounts of irredeemable paper currency at its arbitrary discretion, merely to exercise a certain influence upon the business of the country, tends to create a system which will place all the private fortunes of the citizens at the mercy of the Government.

5. A currency which to the vice of inconvertibility adds the vice of redundancy has always had, and must naturally have, the effect of stimulating overspeculation and gambling; of diverting the energies of the people from honest productive labor; of leading to the unproductive consumption of capital and the creation of fictitious values; of unnaturally expanding the system of credit; of demoralizing business as well as social life; and thus of seriously aggravating the causes which produce the general breakdown at once.

6. The further expansion of such a currency during or after a crisis can only revive and stimulate anew the influences which have already demoralized business and brought forth crops of disaster.

7. An addition to such a currency does not only not add to the wealth of the country, but does not increase the efficiency of the currency itself as a means of exchange, for the reason that it drives up prices, and by stimulating speculation causes its being drawn away from the legitimate business of the country to the centers of speculation. It will not make, permanently, money easy, but rather raise than reduce the current rates of interest.

8. For the same reasons every addition to such a currency will not satisfy, but excite the demand for more and more, and thus push the country forward on the road to bankruptcy and repudiation.

9. No legitimate economic interest of the country will, therefore, be permanently benefited by such expansion, but all will be injured.

10. Least of all is the agricultural interest benefited by our irredeemable and redundant currency. It is, on the contrary, most grievously injured by it, because the farmer must pay extravagant prices for all he has to buy, while the prices of the principal products he has to sell are regulated by a foreign market untouched by our home inflation and controlled by the competition of the world.

11. These evils will be increased by every further expansion and consequent depreciation of the currency, and the idea that the agricultural interest and those sections of the country—the West and the South—whose prosperity depends on a profitable cultivation of the soil, can be really benefited by further expansion, is therefore fallacious in the highest degree.

12. On the other hand, the agricultural interest will be vastly benefited by a return to specie payments, because resumption will greatly reduce the prices of the commodities the farmer has to buy, while it will not, in proportion, reduce the price of the principal products he has to sell, thus adding greatly to the purchasing power of his income.

13. The idea that the return to specie payments can be facilitated by that sort of prosperity which would be brought forth by further inflation involves a mischievous fallacy. Further inflation would only revive and stimulate all the evil influences of a redundant, irredeemable currency upon all economic movements, again excite overspeculation, promote excessive importations, thus turning and keeping the trade balance against us, again expand the credit system to the bursting point, and lead to new and more disastrous revulsions.

14. Such expansion would render impossible the fulfillment of the conditions which must precede the resumption of specie payments, retrenchment, and economy in public and private affairs, contraction of the credit system, and of private indebtedness, prudent management of business, &c.

15. The idea that the return to specie payments can in the safest way be brought about by doing nothing and waiting until the development of the resources of the country and the growth of business shall have brought our paper money and gold to a par in commercial value is equally fallacious, for the reason that the period of relief thus vaguely pointed out lies in an undefined and undefinable future; that in the mean time all the demoralizing and dangerous influences of our irredeemable and redundant currency remain at work with undiminished vigor and activity; that there will be continued danger of further inflation being forced upon us by agencies beyond our control, as the Government at the present moment is already expanding the currency; that thus the day of promise is put off farther and farther, and that the very difficulties and disasters which the advocates of the do-nothing policy fear will spring from legislative action in the direction of specie payments, will naturally occur, and have in fact occurred under the do-nothing policy itself, as recent events have clearly demonstrated.

16. The resumption of specie payments cannot surely be brought on but by legislative action; and no more propitious moment can be found for the inauguration of a resumption policy than the present, for the reason that much of the work of preparation which must precede resumption has already been done by the crisis. Private indebtedness has been greatly reduced; credit in business transactions has been largely contracted; the prices of commodities have already declined to a low point; business men have generally but light stocks on hand, and for months have been circumspect in their operations. The possibility of loss through the appreciation of the current money or the decline of prices will therefore be now as little as we ever can expect it to be.

These are the principal propositions which I have endeavored to substantiate. Now, I beg Senators to notice that I have not dealt in philosophical deductions from abstract principles, nor in vague theory, but in facts visible to all, and in practical observations which it requires only common sense to appreciate. I am very sensible of the incompleteness of my remarks as to several important branches of this great subject; for instance, the effect of an irredeemable and redundant paper currency upon commerce and manufactures, and the benefit these economic interests would derive from a return to specie payments; but it was my principal object to touch the main points which had appeared in this debate, and I am afraid I have already taxed the patience of the Senate too severely. I have also confined myself to a discussion of the general aspects of the question, because the Committee on Finance ask only for general instructions. The consideration of a specific method of resumption in detail would have served only to raise side issues and to confuse the debate. That will be in time when we shall have an elaborate scheme in the shape of a bill before us.

But one word more. I am very far from representing the resumption of specie payments as the absolute remedy for panics or commercial or financial crises; neither do I ignore the fact that such revulsions will sometimes occur where a metallic currency exists. Gold coin is by no means an unfailing medicine for all the ailments of the economic body. I know that well; but I know also that an irredeemable and redundant currency must seriously aggravate all those ailments, and that, issuing from our present troubles, we shall never succeed in laying a sound basis for a new development of prosperity, unless by doing away with our vicious paper money we remove that agency which inevitably would make that basis unsafe and that new development unhealthy. And thus whichever way we may turn our eyes, I cannot impress it too strongly upon the minds of Senators, that if they really desire to rid the American Republic of the disgrace of Government promises to pay, which stand dishonored and a solemn duty unperformed; of a fraudulent measure of values, which is like an elastic yard-stick, long to-day and short to-morrow; of an unjust, unequal, and extortionate tax, which oppresses the people and bankrupts the Government; of an incentive to overspeculation and gambling, which has diverted so much of our capital from useful production, has wasted our energies, has undermined the respect for honest labor, has corrupted our morals, and is an inexhaustible fountain of fraud and disaster—if we really desire to rid the American people of these iniquities and to prevent still greater dishonor, demoralization and ruin, it will be in vain to hope for a more propitious moment than the present.

The very misfortunes that have befallen us have paved the way for our deliverance. We shall never be better prepared for a resolute beginning of the work which, if not undertaken to-day, will become still more necessary, and much more difficult, to-morrow. We have suffered the ills of the crisis; now let us also reap its benefits. If this opportunity be lost—and it will be lost unless we seize it promptly—who knows when, and in what form and measure of disaster, it will return?

As to the resolution now under discussion, I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] in which I find the simplest and clearest statement of the object I pursue. If that should fail, the resolution introduced by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance will of course have my support. Let me express the hope that at an early day a bill embodying a method of a return to specie payments will be laid before us. It is a matter of experience that in things of such moment there is always danger of losing the general object by wrangling disagreements on details. As for myself, I shall be ready to support any measure which will fulfill two conditions: first, of putting us practically on the road to resumption in such a way that the retreat will be cut off; and secondly, of providing for a method of preparation which will make the transition as easy as possible. Senators scarcely ever fail to protest that they are in favor of a return to specie payments. Let us have a little less of that protestation, and a little more of action, proving at last that those high protestations were something better than mere idle words. Where there is a will there is a way; and I hope we shall not give the world reason to say of the Congress of the United States that for the performance of a great and solemn duty no way was found because the will was wanting.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 945) to change the times of holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the western district of Michigan was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LEWIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 14, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SALARIES.

Mr. STEPHENS. I wish to state that if I had been in my seat yesterday, when the vote was taken on the Senate amendment to the salary bill, I would have voted "no."

Mr. BARRERE. I am recorded as not voting on the Senate amendment to the salary bill. I desire to have my vote recorded in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. It is not competent to record the vote of the gentleman now.

Mr. BARRERE. I was absent from my seat on account of sickness. If I had been here I would have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. LOWNDES. I was compelled to be absent from the city on yesterday. If I had been present when the vote on the salary bill was taken, I would have voted in the affirmative.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. POLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back House bill (H. R. No. 945) to change the time of holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the western district of Michigan.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. POLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HENRY SAVAGE.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to move that the petition of Henry Savage, with accompanying papers, be withdrawn from the files of the Forty-second Congress, before which the petition was pending, and be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

There being no objection, the motion was agreed to.

FACILITIES FOR TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. RICE. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a memorial signed by over twelve hundred business men of the city of Chicago and the Northwestern States. It refers to additional facilities for transportation from the Northwest to the Atlantic border. I ask unanimous consent to present the petition now, and have it referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and orderd to be printed.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the petition will be referred as indicated, and will be printed without the names.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. COX, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of New York City, in reference to the merchant marine service; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

RAILWAY AND TELEGRAPH FROM NEW YORK TO SAINT LOUIS.

Mr. HURLBUT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1214) to incorporate the New York, Chicago, and Saint Louis Railway and Telegraph Company; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

ELECTION CONTESTS IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. HYNES, by unanimous consent, presented a transcript of the record of the county court of Lincoln County, Arkansas, giving the election precincts of that county, with reference to contests from the State of Arkansas; which was referred to the Committee on Elections, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour now begins at fifteen minutes after twelve o'clock. Reports are in order from the Committee on Revision of the Laws.

CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURTS.

Mr. POLAND, from the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States, reported back, without amendment, a bill (H. R. No. 854) relating to circuit and district courts of the United States.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That when a district court is required by law to be held at different places in the same district, it shall not be necessary to adjourn by reason of the intervention of a term of the court elsewhere; but the court intervening may be adjourned over, by a written order of the judge to the clerk, a copy of which shall be posted on the front door of the court-house where such court is to be held, until the business of such session is concluded.

SEC. 2. That the judge of any district court may adjourn the same, from time to time, to meet the necessities of the business; and the intervention of a term of the district court at another place, or of a circuit court, shall not preclude the power to adjourn over to a future day.

SEC. 3. That if the judge of any district court is not present at the time for opening any regular, adjourned, or special term thereof, the clerk may open and adjourn the court from day to day for four days; and if the judge does not appear before two o'clock, afternoon, of the fourth day, the clerk shall adjourn the court to the next regular term, unless otherwise directed, in pursuance of the next section.

SEC. 4. That if the judge of any district court is unable to attend, or, in any case where he is so authorized by law, omits to attend and open any regular, adjourned, or special term thereof, he may, by written order to the clerk, either before the time for opening the term or within the first three days thereof, adjourn the court to the next regular term, or to any earlier day. And the clerk shall give such notice of the adjournment, and in such manner, as said written order may direct.

SEC. 5. That whenever any district judge shall hold a district or circuit court in another district, by designation or appointment, in any manner provided by law, he shall be allowed his reasonable traveling expenses, to and from his residence, to the place of holding such court, and his reasonable expenses while holding such court; and such expenses shall, when certified by the clerk of such court and district attorney for such district, be paid by the marshal of such district, and allowed him in his accounts with the United States.

SEC. 6. That any circuit court may at any regular term thereof adjourn to a future day, to be specified in the order for the adjournment, to meet at the same place, and any business may be transacted at such adjourned term which might be done at such regular term.

SEC. 7. That all transcripts from the records, files, or papers of any circuit or district court, remaining in the offices of the clerks thereof, which have been or may be made by the clerk of any circuit or district court in pursuance of any law establishing or altering a judicial district, and certified by the clerk making the same to be true and correct, shall be evidence in all courts and places equally with the originals.

SEC. 8. That whenever any final judgment or decree shall be rendered in any circuit or district court in any civil cause or proceeding, any suit or proceeding to make available any attachment of property, or bail, or other security made or taken in said cause, or for the default or neglect of any marshal or other officer therein, may be brought and prosecuted in the same court in which said judgment or decree is recovered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. POLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REVISION OF THE LAWS.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Revision of the Laws to report a bill (H. R. No. 1215) revising and consolidating the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, 1873. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, it is understood by all gentlemen in the House that for a considerable number of years we have had commissioners at work making a revision of the United States statutes; that this work has been completed, laid before the House, and referred to the Committee on Revision of the Laws for their examination. The committee now report this work for the consideration of the House. Of course, considerable time will be necessary for its examination and to carry it through the House.

I take it for granted, Mr. Speaker, that every gentleman here feels the same anxiety that is felt by members of the committee, that after so much time and labor have been spent upon this work, it should be brought to a successful termination. I suppose every gentlemen is aware of the very great necessity existing for a revision of our statutes. Those laws now occupy seventeen volumes; but a large part of these enactments have either been repealed or susperseded, or were merely temporary statutes, like appropriation bills or private bills. The commissioners have embraced in the volume I hold in my hand the whole of what they term the general statutes of the United States—the general public laws. The supposition of the committee is that all laws of this general character, in force at the commencement of this session, may be embraced in a single volume.

This work, as gentlemen know, was done by three commissioners appointed under a law of Congress. Their labors were completed last May. Under a law passed on the very last day of the last session of Congress, a sub-committee of the Committee on Revision of the Laws employed Mr. Durant, a lawyer of eminence in this city, to go over this revision and put it in the form of a bill to be brought before the House. The volume I hold in my hand is the work as completed by Mr. Durant, going over the work of the commission.

The committee have decided that in their judgment it was not advisable to attempt any change whatever in the existing law. By the original law of 1866, under which the commissioners were appointed, they were authorized to make changes to some extent, of which liberty they availed themselves—probably not to any greater extent than they were warranted in doing by the law under which they were appointed. But the Committee on Revision of the Laws at the last Congress came to the conclusion that within the limited time that could be allowed for the work in this House, it would be utterly impossible to carry the measure through, if it was understood that it contained new legislation. Therefore the committee, when they employed Mr. Durant to go over this work, directed him, in every case where he found that new legislation had been inserted by the commissioners, to strike out such modifications of the existing law. This, of course, did not refer to mere changes of phraseology not affecting the meaning of the law; but he was directed, wherever the meaning of the law had been changed, to strike out such changes. Mr. Durant has in the main done this.

Perhaps those gentlemen who have seen Mr. Durant's pamphlet report, as laid before the House, may have drawn a wrong inference in relation to the labors of the commission, as if in various particulars where he has made changes the commissioners have fallen into errors. Almost all of these changes made by Mr. Durant in the work are where he has struck out new provisions and changes they have made.

The committee are aware that in the multiplicity of engagements members of Congress have no time to go over this work to any great extent, and therefore we expect, if this work shall be adopted by Congress at all, it will be mainly upon their faith in the commissioners and in the committee which has it in charge. Since the commencement of this session, since this work has been laid before the Committee on Revision of the Laws, they have been patiently and faithfully at work endeavoring to go over it with care, so we shall be able to assure the House the work has been presented with such changes and amendments as we find necessary to make that it will be an exact transcript, an exact reflex, of the existing statute law of the United States—that there shall be nothing omitted and nothing changed.

With these few remarks, Mr. Speaker, I come to the question of how we are to consider this. I do not suppose the House will desire we shall take possession of the morning hour for nearly the residue of the session of this Congress. There are so many other things, so many other committees which have business to present, that we cannot expect to stand in the way of the House; and I do not desire to stand in the way of the general legislation of the country. Therefore it has occurred to me, Mr. Speaker, that some arrangement may be made by which some one day in the week may be devoted to this until completed; or we may be allowed to have a series of evening sessions, say two evenings of the week, which shall be devoted entirely to this subject. The committee desire to go on with the work, but at the same time to throw as little obstruction as possible in the way of the general business of the House and the country.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suppose the committee, of course, have a written report accompanying this bill, which will set forth all the facts more fully; and if that report be printed it can be examined by members of the House, which will, perhaps, be entirely satisfactory.

Mr. POLAND. Does the gentleman ask whether the committee has submitted a written report?

Mr. MAYNARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. POLAND. We have not made any written report, and do not expect to make any. It would be impossible.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman's remarks, so far as they have gone, have been very satisfactory; and if he would but extend them to the length of an hour's speech, covering the points involved in this revision of the statutes, we could no doubt be as ready to vote, upon an examination of his remarks, just as readily and intelligently upon the proposed measure as if its further consideration were postponed for two or three months. I am afraid, however, the gentleman's remarks have not been heard by many members of the House; and besides, as far as he has gone, they have been quite too limited to meet my wishes.

Mr. POLAND. I do not suppose I can ever speak loud; and, being hoarse this morning, I can hardly speak as loud as usual.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman, if he thought proper, might make whatever additions he pleases to his remarks this morning and have them printed in the RECORD, where they could be examined by the members at their leisure.

Mr. POLAND. The honorable gentleman from Tennessee seems to mistake me in supposing this is to be taken in a lump—swallowed at one dose.

But the committee have not yet gone through with the entire work. We have examined a considerable portion in reference to which the report is ready to be presented; but there are various chapters we have not yet examined.

We have not gone through with the entire work, and expect to devote a great deal more time to its examination. We have, however, enough examined to lay before the House.

We expect the House to go through the ordinary form of legislation on this subject. The committee have amendments to various sections, in order, as they thought, to make them perfect. Therefore my proposition is, we either have one day in the week set apart to us, or, if it is thought best by the House, we have two evenings in the week set apart. We are ready to work evenings, when we can sit down and devote ourselves to this entirely.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman is much better informed on this subject than I am or can be. I infer from the tenor of his remarks it was not contemplated to amend the general body of the statutes, but simply to compile them; and so we could have the assurance—and I know of no higher assurance we can have than the report of this most able and intelligent committee—the work of compilation has been faithfully and conscientiously performed. I do not see how it is possible for us to have any higher or more satisfactory basis of action. We have not time to take up the seventeen volumes of the Statutes at Large and go through them section by section and act by act. We must trust something to somebody; and when the gentleman tells us the committee has performed this work faithfully and conscientiously it seems to me it is the highest assurance the laws have been properly compiled.

Mr. POLAND. The gentleman understands correctly precisely what the committee proposes to do; and I have not expected, myself, that this volume shall be passed without a word of it being read in the House. I supposed we had to be allowed time when we could go through with it carefully in the House, so that any gentleman in the House who was not satisfied that the commissioners or the Committee on Revision of the Laws had got everything perfect, he might offer a proposition to make it more perfect if he chose.

Therefore we desire to have some time fixed when everybody will have an opportunity to aid in the perfection of this work. We want to do the best we can, and to do all we can, and to devote our whole time to it.

Mr. MAYNARD. Now I ask the gentleman whether he believes it to be a physical possibility that the body of the statutes can be revised in this House, and amendments made to meet the views of the majority, by any sort of means in our power?

Mr. POLAND. It is a considerable labor, Mr. Speaker; but I am not yet discouraged in regard to our being able to go through with it, and to go through with it carefully and considerately.

Mr. MAYNARD. Great is the power of faith in the gentleman.

Mr. DAWES. While I agree with the gentleman from Tennessee that if any body of men are entitled to the confidence of this House and of the country it is that body of men who have had charge of this from time to time, beginning with the commissioners and ending with the committee, I ask the attention of the gentleman, because he can perhaps appreciate them as well if not better than any other man in this House, to the difficulties connected with one or two chapters in that book—those relating to the tariff laws. He knows what the Secretary of the Treasury says in his report, that the tariff laws have come down to us from the very first session of Congress under the first President, without any revision, but complicated by amendments from time to time almost every session of Congress; so that the Secretary of the Treasury tells us that they are so complicated that it is almost impossible to administer them at the custom-houses. Now, I submit to the gentleman that the idea that these men can have revised all those laws without making one particle of change in their meaning is to suppose that they can work almost a miracle. When this matter came into the House I supposed that possibly the committee of which I am a member might have some special interest in looking into that chapter in the book; and I confess for one that I am oppressed with a sense of the responsibility of the House upon that question and upon that chapter in the book. It involves interests all over the country, ramified over every branch of industry; and a comma or a semicolon, honestly but inadvertently put into that book, might change—as my friend from Tennessee knows as well as or better than any other man in this House—the whole construction of the law. Commas changed into semicolons in the law of 1872, after it left this House and before the official copies were printed, have taken out of the Treasury of the United States hundreds of thousands of dollars. And a like change might inadvertently be made by men who perhaps did not understand exactly the intent of the phraseology of the law, which might affect, prosperously or otherwise, the various interests depending on the tariff laws.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Does my colleague think that changing back a semicolon to a comma would restore the money to the Treasury? [A laugh.]

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to my colleague that $250,000 has been paid back to citizens of Boston within the last month which had been paid by them under a mistake. What we want is to reproduce the law as it is.

Mr. MAYNARD. I take it that the work of the committee will do that.

Mr. DAWES. If you have entire faith that they have done that, then that is enough.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I hope the gentleman from Vermont will ask the House to order that when the revision of the statutes is considered, any proposed amendment to the existing law or change in the existing law shall be ruled out of order, as in the case of ordinary appropriation bills; otherwise the tariff, the currency, and the entire policy of the Government, will be open to motions to amend, to debate, to discussion, to long speeches. On the tariff alone the power of amendment and debate would be enough to consume the entire time allowed for the legislation of a single Congress almost, as we saw three or four years ago.

Mr. POLAND. I had the same suggestion in my mind as has been made by my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR.] But there were various difficulties which occurred to me in reference to it. Suppose a gentleman offers an amendment which he says is not a change of the law but is only to make the existing law more plain, who is to decide the question what the existing law is?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. It would be decided, as is now done on the point of order to any amendment to an appropriation bill, that it is new legislation.

Mr. POLAND. We might have a great deal of debate as to what existing law is under my friend's proposed rule; and although I had at one time the idea of getting some order or rule of that kind made, I came to the conclusion, on reflection, that it would be entirely impracticable.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Will my friend from Vermont allow me to suggest that all the appropriation bills are considered in this House under exactly that rule; and in practice the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole determines the question of order made in regard to any amendment that it would change the existing law, subject, of course, to an appeal to the committee? Ordinarily, the member making the motion acquiesces at once in the decision of the chairman.

Mr. POLAND. The Committee on Revision of the Laws considered this same proposition which my friend from Massachusetts suggests; and we came to this conclusion, that every member of this House who is desirous of having this rule go through, and having a revision of the statutes at all, would see that any attempt to ingraft new legislation upon it would be in substance preventing the completion of the work and a destruction of it; and that, therefore, we could come before the House with an altogether better grace, and with a greater likelihood of getting on, and being free from any effort to change the existing law, by an appeal to the judgment and good sense of the members themselves, than by the adoption of any such rule as my friend from Massachusetts proposes. And, therefore, the committee thought they would not ask the House to make any rule on the subject. Our proposition, then, is, that the House shall consider the revision reported, with such modifications as we might suggest to make it more perfect, and that we shall resist any attempt on the part of anybody to ingraft any new legislation upon it. And I think we can look with confidence to the aid of every gentleman upon this floor in adopting that course. If there is to be any revision at all we must abstain from any attempt to introduce new legislation.

Mr. MAYNARD. I understand the gentleman to say that they do not contemplate any modification of existing law.

Mr. POLAND. Not at all; not the slightest. The very title we have adopted to this bill is, "An act to revise and consolidate the statutes in force on the 1st day of December, 1873."

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I ask my colleague to yield to me for a suggestion.

Mr. POLAND. I will do so.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The question has been asked in the House, privately among members, whether or not it was the intention of this committee to allow any amendment to the bill where it embodies the law as it at present exists.

Mr. POLAND. The design of the committee is not, themselves, to propose any amendment that shall change the law, nor to allow anybody else to do so if they can prevent it.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Has there been anything already incorporated in this bill that does change existing law?

Mr. POLAND. As I have already said, the commissioners have made some changes in the law, as they were authorized to do under the law. Mr. Durant was employed by the sub-committee of the House, appointed under a bill passed on the last day of the last session, to go over this work and strike out everything in the nature of a change of the law. We purpose to present the law, when we have gone over it, as a reflex of existing statutes in force in the United States on the first day of this session.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to inquire what is the parliamentary attitude of this bill? Has it been reported from the Clerk's desk?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] chairman of the Committee on Revision of the Laws, reports this consolidated revision of the laws for some agreement of the House as to how it shall be disposed of.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to ask whether this bill, containing propositions for re-enacting the tariff and tax laws and laws making appropriations, and amendments to it being in order, would it therefore be necessary under the rules to have it first considered in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has supposed that the intention of the gentleman from Vermont was to obtain, by unanimous consent, or, if necessary, by a suspension of the rules, some order of the House directing the mode of disposing of this bill. It is very evident that it cannot be disposed of in the morning hour, for it would be liable to the objection suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. My purpose was not to raise the objection myself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands the gentleman; but this bill would be liable to the objection suggested. It is, of course, very evident that a work of this magnitude cannot be disposed of in the morning hour.

Mr. POLAND. I would suggest that Wednesday and Thursday evenings of each week be assigned to the consideration of this bill until we complete it, beginning with Wednesday evening of next week.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I have been trying for some time to submit a suggestion. Of course so far as it is in the power of any committee composed of the best men in this House, and dealing with the subject with the very greatest care, to report a consolidation without changing existing laws, this committee has done it. But nevertheless there may be some change made in existing law by oversight on the part of the commissioner, or in some other way. Of course we would all desire to avoid any difficulty of that sort that might arise hereafter. I suggest that the committee ultimately report to the House that in the re-enactment of the statutes by this bill there should be a provision to the effect that nothing contained in this re-enactment shall be construed or held in any way to change the law in existence at the commencement of this session, or whenever this bill shall go into effect. It seems to me that such a provision as that would be better than anything else to preserve the law as it now exists.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I should not desire to say anything in addition to what has been said by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Revision of the Laws, except that I wish this subject to be brought to the attention of this House, and of every member in it. And the voice of my friend this morning is in such a condition, from a cold, that I fear what he has said has been heard mainly by the little group of gentlemen who gathered about him.

The report of the committee contains an appeal to the consideration of this House upon a subject that has nothing of party in it, nothing contained in it but the public interest and convenience, and to which they ought to give their careful attention, their individual attention. If they will be so good as to do so, the committee think we may arrive by unanimous consent at a practical result upon a measure of the utmost importance. What the committee proposes to do with this great volume which is reported to the House is this: the House is aware, I will say by way of prelude, that a commission of competent gentlemen, carefully selected for the work, have for three years been engaged in it, availing themselves of the labors of their predecessors—a former commission having for three preceding years been to some extent engaged in the same work. That commission have reported the laws as they understood them to be at the present time. They were authorized to report amendments where there were doubtful provisions, or where the law could be made better by something which should not in their judgment substantially change it, or where through inadvertence the intent of the law had not perhaps been carried out in its enactment.

When the result of their labors was reported at the expiration of their official term the Committees on the Revision of the Laws of the Senate and of the House became satisfied that it was physically impossible to make a revision of the laws which should contain any amendment, because if you allow one amendment in way of substance, the bill is open to the amendment of every member who may think that any branch of the law needs change. Therefore the best that could be done was to confine themselves to reporting a bill which should codify the existing laws, and nothing more.

And I appeal, Mr. Speaker, to every member of the House, whether the attainment of this result is not most important to the interests of the people and the convenience of every officer of the Government throughout the whole country. If, instead of having seventeen volumes of statutes, passed at different times, passed sometimes without distinct reference to other provisions, you can make these statutes consistent and bring them within a single volume, the price of which will place it within the reach of the ordinary office-holder or any other person interested in the administration of the laws, will not this be a great benefit to the people of the country?

That commission having finally reported their revision, those two committees employed, under the authority of Congress, a competent and eminent lawyer to go over this work during the recess; and from last March until the assembling of the present Congress he most faithfully gave his entire time to the duty. He has undertaken to look at every law, comparing the work of the commission with it; and wherever they have made any change in the law, although they thought it an amendment within their power to recommend, he has struck out such change. The result is the volume which is now laid before the House. The House has also the additional security that the commissioners have undertaken, wherever they have suggested alterations of the law, to state the law as they understood it to be and then the change embraced in the revision.

It has been found by the committee in going over this work (and they have not yet completed their labors) that in some instances the revising lawyer who has been employed has differed with the commission as to what the law is—not in many particulars, only in occasional instances which are often not of very great importance; but in order to determine every question arising in this respect the committee have divided up this book among them, and have gone to work faithfully upon it to revise and compare, and then take the judgment of the whole committee upon the question whether there was any change in existing law. Confining themselves to this proposition, they have found some alterations, either from oversight or from differences of opinion, between the commissioners and the lawyer employed to revise their work.

I may say to the House that on the first morning of the recent holiday recess I sat down after breakfast and spent the whole of that day until dark in going over but two pages of this report, so that I might be enabled upon such examination to say to the committee, and through them to the House, that this part of the revision embraced no change in existing law. I have followed up that work with all the time at my command since, and I have made some progress in the part assigned to myself, though I have not yet completed the examination.

We now propose to lay before the House this great volume, and take it up section by section. This process can probably proceed in most cases rapidly, as, where the commissioners, the revising lawyer, and the committee of the House are agreed that there is no change in the existing law, nothing more will be required than the reading of the provisions.

Mr. HEREFORD. Will the gentleman state the name of the lawyer who was employed to go over the work of the commission?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Mr. Durant, of this city, was employed under authority given to the committee at the close of the last Congress.

We desire that this work shall be submitted to the House, for the purpose of ascertaining that it does not change existing law, in order that every member of the House who is interested in any chapter or section may have the opportunity at a session of the House, held for this purpose, to suggest, if he can, any point in which the existing law has not been scrupulously followed, even though the difference be only as in the case suggested by my colleague, [Mr. DAWES,] the difference between a comma and a semicolon.

We believe it important that every member of the House should have such an opportunity. After three revisions, first by the commissioners, then by the revising lawyer, then by the committee, the work has been submitted to the House; and if members will strictly confine themselves to a criticism of this work in regard to its conformity to existing law, we apprehend that the suggestions made will be few, and that the principal part of the time spent by the House in the consideration of the work will be that devoted to the reading of the various provisions.

Therefore the committee propose, as the chairman has stated, not to consume the morning hour through the whole session—which of course the House would not allow, because it would deprive other committees, other business, and other interests, of their proper opportunity—but that Wednesday and Thursday evenings of each week, beginning with next week, be set apart for sessions at which this bill can be read regularly through, every member having an opportunity to suggest, as we come to anything in which he is interested, that the work is not perfect, though we have done all we can to make it perfect. By thus going on week after week I think we may within some reasonable time during the present session complete this work in the only manner in which it is physically possible to complete it.

This proposition seems to me to contain all the elements of fairness. The measure will thus be submitted in a form which will afford every member an opportunity to consider what we are doing. When this process shall have been gone through with, we may have confidence that the work is substantially perfect. If there should be discovered any amendments that are regarded as necessary and proper, they can be reported in a supplemental bill, on which debate and amendment can be allowed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee whether it has been suggested to him (if it has not been I think it ought to be) that there should be some special rules of procedure adopted with reference to this measure; as, for instance, that debate should not be allowed except on questions whether there is a change of the existing law; that no discussion shall be allowed on the merits of the existing law, or anything of that sort. If members be allowed to go into a discussion of the wisdom or unwisdom of existing statutes, we can certainly never get through with this measure. I therefore suggest that the committee should be prepared to recommend hereafter (if they are not so prepared now) some special rules which shall apply to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. POLAND. The suggestion of the member from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] like that of my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR,] has been considered by the committee, and we have come to the conclusion we would get along better with this without attempting to get up any special code of rules; that we can appeal to the good sense and the good judgment of every man on the floor more effectually than we can coerce them by any special rule we can adopt.

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Speaker, I for one regard it as utterly impracticable for each member of this House individually to look into and examine and compare the bill as reported with the original law, to ascertain whether the bill is in exact conformity with the statute laws or not. Whatever action may be taken in the House we have to trust—at least the great majority of us have to trust—somebody, some committee or some person who may be employed by the committee to which this matter shall be submitted, or some sub-committee. Our consideration of the bill, therefore, in the open House must I think, from the very necessity of the subject-matter, be a mere formal consideration. I suggest, therefore, that the matter be allowed to rest upon our tables, or be referred to the Committee of the Whole, if the Chair thinks it must go to the Committee of the Whole—and I believe he so intimated this morning—and allowed to remain for a reasonable length of time, so as to give every member who feels any interest in the matter an opportunity to examine and report to the Committee on Revision of the Laws; and then after a reasonable length of time has been given we can take it up, either in Committee of the Whole or in open House, and act upon it summarily. I confess, whatever time may be given by other members, my other duties will not enable me to give special attention to this subject. I am willing to trust the Committee on Revision of the Laws on this question, with the distinct understanding if there be any mistake Congress will be frequently in session to enable us to remedy that mistake. Therefore I suggest to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] who has control over this matter that he will make some effort at some reasonable time in the future to pass this bill in some summary way as I have suggested, either by the supension of the rules or in some other way; otherwise we will have to consider it section by section, and that I think everybody must realize is an utter impossibility.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Let me say that the gentleman from Indiana misapprehends my suggestion. When we meet for this purpose and we come to a particular chapter, and it is stated that chapter contains no alteration of the law, and the committee has no amendment to suggest from the committee, and no member present has any amendment to suggest, I do not suppose we need then do more than read it by its title and pass on to the next chapter.

Mr. NIBLACK. I agree with the gentleman, that if we debate it at all we will go on debating it indefinitely, and it will be an endless task. We have to trust the committee in great part. I propose to trust them in every respect, and to vote on this bill as the committee reported it, which is, in my judgment, the most practicable thing we can do. I think we ought to have a reasonable length of time given to members to examine the subject, and to dispose of it in some summary way.

Mr. POLAND. If my friend from Indiana had spent any time on this subject he would see the utter impossibility of our adopting his suggestion. Now, no one man, no one member, of the committee, can go through the whole of this. The work has been parceled out to different members of the committee for their special examination, and each one has some suggestion to make, or some amendment or alteration to move. I have discovered in that portion I have examined some things which I think are not perfect as they stand. We want to amend the work of the commissioners. It is utterly impossible that our suggestions and amendments should be laid before members. The work has been printed. It is utterly impossible that members of this House should know everything about it. While I expect about as much faith will be given to us as my friend from Indiana suggests, I suppose the evening sessions which I propose will be more a session of the committee than of the House; but they will enable the members of the committee who are here, and as many members of the House as may please to be here, to know about it; and when we go through a chapter, and any amendment is proposed and agreed to, we can then go on to the next chapter. It is utterly impossible that this can all be acted on any other way. We are willing to be out of everybody's way, and therefore I propose a series of evening sessions, which, I suppose, will practically be sessions of the committee. I do not expect we shall have a very full House, but members will have an opportunity to give such attention as they can, and to give such faith and confidence in the committee as my friend from Indiana, and other gentlemen, have expressed. I see no other practicable way by which we can do this.

Mr. HOLMAN. It does seem to me that the suggestion of the gentleman from Vermont, that when the revision comes up for discussion in the House it will be a matter simply for the committee themselves, is not one which should be entertained. I consider it necessary that this revision should be carefully examined, to ascertain whether, upon any given subject, there has been an alteration of the law. If it should be found that that has happened, why of course it is only one of those misfortunes to which all are subject. I do not concur, therefore, in that suggestion of the gentleman from Vermont. No more important subject has ever been before Congress; and I trust that every gentleman who ordinarily attends the sessions of the House will be in his seat, so that if the member has had his attention directed to any particular mistake that mistake may be corrected; for instance—and I refer to an instance which I have already observed—where the word "shall" is used, when the word "may" was the original word.

I do not apprehend that more than a very few weeks would be necessary to dispose of this matter entirely. A revision of the laws of my own State almost as complete as this was compiled a number of years ago. On that occasion every single provision was read carefully through in both branches of the Legislature; and no very large amount of time was consumed in the work. I hope no other course will be suggested than one which will subject all of us to the duty of seeing that this compilation is as perfect as human caution can make it.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to say one word in this connection. I do not wish to get rid of any responsibility which attaches to me as a member of this House in regard to this revision or compilation; for I regard it as more of a compilation of existing laws than a revision of them. It is from the very nature of the case a work upon which very few minds can be brought to bear at the same time. It is essentially and necessarily a work of a committee composed of but a few persons. This has passed three ordeals, as I understand it: the ordeal of the commissioners appointed for that purpose, the ordeal of the attorney appointed for that purpose, and then the ordeal of the Committee on Revision of the Laws. And I have not the vanity and confidence in myself to suppose that in all the time I can give to it I can add anything to the perfection of this work. I repeat that it is necessary to trust somebody. And inasmuch as this has gone through so many ordeals, I am willing to take it on trust as it comes from the committee, with the distinct understanding that we shall have an opportunity to repeal and correct any gross mistakes into which the committee may have fallen. I am willing to come here at evening sessions and spend as much time as is practicable on the work; but I do it with the distinct expression of my opinion that what we shall do in the House is more likely to breed confusion and inject something into the law which will destroy the system that has been adopted in this compilation than to work an improvement upon the revision as reported by the committee. Any consideration that may be given in this House will be of necessity merely a formal consideration, and will be likely to do more mischief than good.

Mr. BECK. I hope the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] will not be adopted. I hope we will be required to come here to attend to and investigate this matter. There have been many suggestions made to me of changes which ought not to have been made and mistakes that have been committed. I have not had time to look at many of them, not having opened the book until this morning. But having one in my desk, furnished me by a gentleman who once belonged to the War Department, being the memorandum of a mistake which he said had been committed, I went over to the chairman's seat and obtained the book. I call the attention of the House to this as showing the importance of going over this work. Article 61 of the Articles of War (volume 2 Statutes at Large, page 366,) is as follows:

ART. 61. Officers having brevets, or commissions of a prior date to those of the regiment in which they serve, may take place in courts-martial and on detachments, when composed of different corps, according to the ranks given them in their brevets, or dates of their former commissions; but in the regiment, troop, or company to which such officers belong, they shall do duty and take rank, both in courts-martial and on detachments, which shall be composed only of their own corps, according to the commissions by which they are mustered into the said corps.

Mr. GARFIELD. What was the date of that?

Mr. BECK. The date is April 10, 1806. The act of March 1, 1869, (volume 15 United States Statutes at Large, page 281,) provides as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sixty-first article of "An act for establishing rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States," approved April 10, 1806, be, and is hereby, repealed.

I turned to the revision, and in the volume here which I have examined just now there is a reference to article 61 of the Articles of War, and article 58 of this revision re-enacts that old law, although it is in fact repealed and was repealed four years ago. That is the way in which it stands now. There is a re-enactment of a repealed law in this revision without any notice being taken of its repeal. Of course it is an oversight, but there may be hundreds like it. I merely point out one, and desire to call attention to the fact that we are asked to re-enact a repealed law as a reason why we should look carefully into this revision. I have a number of other memoranda on various subjects on which it has been suggested to me there are omissions, and I hope we will at least have time to look into them. It is impossible for any committee, however intelligent or careful, to avoid mistakes in a matter of this magnitude; and it is due to them that the House should furnish all the aid it can, and divide the responsibility of mistakes which will be found after we have all done our best to prevent them.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky show the necessity of having this entire volume considered in the House. Now, while it is possible that each member cannot undertake to examine the whole volume, yet each member will doubtless be familiar with some particular provisions or chapters of the laws on which he can make suggestions that will be of good service in enabling us to arrive at absolute accuracy. The chairman and members of the Committee on Appropriations are familiar with the general law relative to appropriations; when that chapter shall be before the House, the members of that committee will have their attention drawn to it, and we shall have the benefit of their acquaintance with the subject. When the chapter relating to military affairs shall be before the House the members of the Committee on Military Affairs will have their attention called to them, and, being more familiar with those subjects than other members of the House, can give to the House the knowledge necessary to reach absolute accuracy. So I might refer to other committees of the House. All these things being considered, it seems to me that the proper mode of proceeding is to have the entire volume read in the House, so that we may have the benefit of the criticism, the knowledge, and the learning of members who have paid particular attention to its several parts.

I know, sir, that it is not possible for any one member to examine the whole volume. It embodies the labors of commissioners for six years, and also the labors of Thomas J. Durant for nine months. Now, the labors of six years and nine months cannot well be understood by any one member of this House. It is utterly impossible that any one member should go over this volume to ascertain if the work has been rightly done or not. I do not suppose that with all that has been done absolute accuracy has been arrived at. My friend from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] said that he regarded this as rather a compilation of the laws than a revision of the laws. I am not sure that he is quite correct. This is not a compilation of the laws. This volume does not undertake to present the text of the statutes on any one subject as enacted by Congress. That would be utterly impossible. You have half a dozen statutes on a different subject, one modifying another, and a subsequent statute modifying both, and it is impossible to collect these together and preserve the original text of the laws passed by Congress. As a consequence of that, this revision undertakes to give, not the language of Congress, but a transcript of the laws; the reviser translates the ideas of Congress in his own words, giving his understanding of the law in his own words, and that I regard as rather a revision than a compilation.

Mr. NIBLACK. Is not that confined to a small proportion of the sections?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I think not; there are seventeen volumes of the laws of the United States, and, in my judgment, this is more a revision than a compilation.

Mr. MAYNARD. Could not the work have been so done as to present exactly in every case the law as it now is?

Mr. LAWRENCE. The design of the revision was to present the existing law precisely as it was on the 1st of December last. Every lawyer knows that in an attempt to translate into new language several conflicting statutes it is impossible that we should arrive at absolute and perfect accuracy. But, I believe, this has been done so far as it has been practicable. Every lawyer knows that even able, excellent, and accurate lawyers will differ as to their construction of statutes when brought together in this manner; so that I have no idea in the world that any revision we will make will be absolutely perfect, or will reflect the existing law, as possibly it might be construed by the courts if submitted to the courts. But there is such a necessity for a revision of the laws, of bringing into one volume the whole body of the laws, that something ought to be done; and that something we are attempting to do by bringing the subject to the attention of the House. I trust the plan suggested by the able and learned chairman of the Committee on Revision of the Laws [Mr. POLAND] will be adopted by setting apart two or more evenings in each week in order that this entire revision shall be read, considered, and agreed to, chapter by chapter. I suggest, however, to the chairman, in view of the fact that this volume comprises thirteen hundred and one pages, whether it is necessary that it should go into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It would swell the RECORD immensely, and it does seem to me that we ought to make some previous order by which this immense volume shall not be transcribed and put into the RECORD, merely because it is read and considered in the House. It will lumber up the RECORD unnecessarily.

Mr. POLAND. Well, sir, we will not trouble ourselves about the RECORD at present. The gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] who has charge of the naval appropriation bill is a little impatient, and I am desirous to get this matter disposed of this morning, so as to leave the morning hour of to-morrow to some other committee. I ask unanimous consent that Wednesday and Thursday evenings of each week, beginning with next week, be devoted to the consideration of this measure until disposed of, the House meeting at half-past seven; and I am willing that it shall be considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STORM. The House will meet, I presume, for that business only?

The SPEAKER. For that business alone; nothing else will be considered in order. If there be no objection the order will be made.

No objection was made.

Mr. POLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the order was made; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OFFICIAL REPORTERS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. GARFIELD, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 795) making an appropriation to pay the salaries of the Official Reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House, with the amendments of the Senate thereto; and moved that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate, and ask a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the amendments will be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read them.

The Clerk read the amendments, as follows:

Add to the end of the bill:

SEC. 2. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,636.12 to pay D. F. Murphy, Official Reporter of the Senate, for reporting the proceedings and debates of the Senate at the special session of March, 1873, according to the arrangement made with him by the Committee on Printing of the Senate, which was reported by said committee to the Senate on the 21st day of March, 1873.

SEC. 3. That there is hereby appropriated for reporting the proceedings and debates of the Senate for the congressional year ending March 4, 1874, the sum of $6,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, which sum shall be added to the contingent fund of the Senate, and be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate under the terms of the resolution aforesaid.

Amend the title of the bill so as to read:

A bill making appropriations to pay for reporting the debates and proceedings of Congress.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will say that the reason why I ask a reference of these amendments is, that in taking away the printing from the Globe people and putting it in the hands of the Public Printer, the Senate made one provision for reporting their debates and the House another; one House adopted one rule of compensation and the other another; one pays by the piece, so much for one thousand ems, and the other pays by a fixed salary, so much a year. The debate on this matter in the Senate yesterday, reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this morning, shows that there is such a disagreement in the two methods of paying that the Committee on Appropriations believed there ought to be a conference between the two Houses with a view to establishing one rule of pay for the reporters of both Houses. We therefore ask a disagreement in the amendments of the Senate, so that both Houses may have one rule of pay. We do not know now whether we are paying more or whether the Senate is paying more. We ought to know just what we have to pay. The reporters of the Senate being paid by piecework, the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate cannot say in advance how much they are to receive; and we want a free conference on the subject with a view to the adoption of a uniform system of payment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question, one which I have already propounded, but which was not answered at the time. I desire to know what is the effect of the arrangements made by the House and the Senate upon the compensation of the reporters; whether it increases or decreases it. I desire to know whether we have increased or diminished their compensation under the old system.

Mr. GARFIELD. We are increasing the amount paid by the Government directly. Under the old system the company of Rives & Bailey furnished the reporters and paid them, except that Congress paid them about $800 a year for the sake of making them officers of the House. The bulk of their compensation came from Rives & Bailey. Now, of course, we pay them altogether, and I cannot say whether what we pay them is more or less than what they were formerly paid. In the appropriation bill which I presented providing for their payment, I simply followed the law which fixed their compensation; and I will say to the gentleman that our action here brought these reporters under the influence of the 15 per cent. increase of pay, which we only repealed yesterday. My only reason for asking a committee of conference is that we may adopt a rule that shall be equal all around.

Mr. HOLMAN. I see much propriety in the reference of this matter to the Committee on Appropriations, but I trust the gentlemen having charge of the bill will, when they report it back, be able to inform the House fully as to the effect of the change made, and to let us know whether we are paying under the new system more for this work than we did before.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the gentleman refer to the reporters merely, or to the printing?

Mr. HOLMAN. To both.

Mr. GARFIELD. We cannot in reporting a bill of this kind go into the question of the relative cost of the two printing establishments; that question has already been referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that the gentleman will give us some information on the points I have suggested when this matter is reported back.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call the previous question on my motion.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REVISION OF THE LAWS.

Mr. POLAND. It is suggested to me that unless some order be made by the House on the subject the Congressional Printer will be bound to print this revision of the laws in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I had not anticipated any such consequence.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he will not be so bound; he will have to insert merely the title.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. LAWRENCE, the Committee on War Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Matilda Barnett et al., heirs of Lieutenant James Barnett, Second Virginia Regiment on Continental establishment; and the same was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. E. H. ROBERTS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1013) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1875.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is upon the amendment offered to the first clause of the bill by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. HALE, of Maine. As that question has not come to the attention of most of the members of the House yet, and has not been fully examined, I ask that the amendment be passed over informally for the present, to be considered in the progress of the bill.

Mr. BECK. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will strike out the minimum punishment.

Mr. RANDALL. I will attend to that when the amendment comes up for action.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless there be objection the amendment will be regarded as passed over informally. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I call the attention of the gentleman who has this bill in charge to a previous passage in the first clause, that I may ask him what is the difference between "mileage" and "transportation" in the tenth line.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. In some places, under the regulations of the Navy, the matter is regulated by mileage and in some cases by transportation, but not the two together.

The Clerk read the second clause of the bill, as follows:

For contingent expenses of the Navy Department, $100,000.

Mr. WOOD. I do not understand, sir, that we have passed from the consideration of the first clause of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The second paragraph has been read.

Mr. WOOD. I rose to offer an amendment to the first clause before the Clerk proceeded to read the second. I desire to obtain some information from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. He was kind enough to say yesterday that when we reached the consideration of any appropriation, the documents in reference to which had been called for but not furnished, he would cheerfully give us any information about it that we wanted.

Now, I want to know what proportion of this $6,250,000 is to go for mileage and transportation. When the chairman has answered that I desire to propound other inquiries to him in reference to this same paragraph.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not know whether the gentleman directs his question to me in terms.

Mr. WOOD. I recognize the gentleman as chairman so far as this bill is concerned.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The whole pay of the naval establishment, of its officers and men, was established and regulated in 1870. If the gentleman will examine the naval appropriation bill of that year, and if he will direct his memory back to that year, he will find that at that time the pay of the Navy was fixed; and that all of the officers and men of the Navy are now subject to a schedule of pay fixed at that time. The aggregate appropriation here is $6,250,000. The pay for the officers of the Navy, including all the ranks, from the Admiral down to ensigns and cadet midshipmen, amounts to something over one-half of this appropriation. I have not the exact figures here, but I have examined into that very question, because I was curious to know how it was that this sum was distributed. More than half of it, I may say to the gentleman, is consumed in the pay of the officers of the Navy.

Mr. WOOD. How much for the rank and file?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. In dividing it some hundreds of thousands of dollars more than half goes to the officers. Of course less than one-half the amonnt goes to the men.

Mr. WOOD. Leaving probably how much for mileage, and how much for transportation?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That is comparatively a small sum.

Mr. ARCHER. That is not included in this first paragraph.

Mr. WOOD. It is.

Mr. ARCHER. This paragraph is for pay only.

Mr. WOOD. The paragraph also says "for mileage and transportation." Now, I desire to know what amount goes for that.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. If the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ARCHER] will look at the bill he will see that it does include mileage and transportation.

Mr. ARCHER. It is not usual to include it. I supposed it was not included here.

Mr. WOOD. It is the first time it has appeared in any appropriation bill in this way.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. In that the gentleman is mistaken. I have before me the acts making appropriations for the Navy for 1873 and 1874. I have only those two, because I did not deem it necessary to arm myself with information further back. In those two acts I find the same language: "For pay of commissioned and warrant officers," &c., and "for mileage and transportation," &c. So far as my knowledge goes, that has been the invariable rule. There are by law certain allowances of this kind which must be paid until the law is changed, and in reporting an appropriation bill we have no right, of course, to change the law. The Committee on Naval Affairs, in investigating the subject-matter of the personnel of the Navy, may at any time report a change of the law, and when that change is made the Committee on Appropriations will conform its bills to the law But of course, as the gentleman knows, under existing laws the Committee on Appropriations has no discretion of that kind. The amount for mileage and transportation is comparatively small.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests to the committee that no amendment is pending.

Mr. WOOD. I move to strike out the last two words. I have failed to obtain from the gentleman an answer to my question. He leaves it entirely to conjecture what proportion of this appropriation of $6,250,000, ostensibly for pay, is to be diverted for other purposes. Those other purposes are fruitful sources of wrong. In every Department of the Government there are large sums appropriated for mileage, when no actual mileage is paid.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. If the gentleman is troubled about the matter, if he wants the exact figures, I will get them for him; there is no difficulty about that.

Mr. WOOD. I presume it is half a million dollars.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. O, no.

Mr. WOOD. Well, we will say $250,000. In the Department of the Interior, in the War Department, and, I have no doubt, also in the Navy Department, constructive mileage is allowed. Men are sent upon political duties, with free passes, and receive from the Treasury pay for mileage when they have not disbursed one dollar. And in the other matter of transportation, while the same character of wrong is impossible, it is yet capable of very great abuse. I would have preferred, therefore, that the committee should have reported an appropriation of so much for mileage and transportation, and so much for pay simply.

The law referred to yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] as I understand it, is confined to the regulation of the pay of the Navy. It does not bring under the head of pay either mileage or transportation. In voting for this appropriation of $6,250,000 ostensibly for pay, it is impossible for us to know what proportion of that amount may be diverted, and improperly diverted, to other purposes. I have sought this information because I was in hopes that we would have the information here in detail.

And there is a singular omission in the estimates from the Navy Department. The appropriation in this bill is copied verbatim from the estimates, even the clerical errors to which the gentleman refers in the Book of Estimates, which were intended to deceive this House and this country. Now, while we are always ready to appropriate every dollar required for the Navy of this great Government, we are not to be deceived or misled by any covering up of the purpose for which this money is required.

I desire to ask the gentleman what per diem mileage or what rate of mileage, is allowed by the Navy Department.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. If the gentleman is through I desire to have read——

Mr. WOOD. I desire an answer to my question.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I will wait until the five minutes of the gentleman have expired.

Mr. WOOD. I will sit down until the gentleman answers my question.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I ask the Clerk to read a portion of section 4, Statutes at Large, volume 16, page 332.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the pay prescribed in the next preceding section shall be the full and entire compensation of the several officers therein named; and no additional allowance shall be made in favor of any of said officers on any account whatever, and all laws and parts of laws authorizing any such allowance shall, on the 1st day of July, 1873, be repealed; but this shall not be construed as repealing existing laws allowing rations and traveling expenses to officers; and their traveling expenses in foreign countries shall be considered to include such expenses of transportation of baggage as were necessarily incurred; but no charge for transportation of baggage in connection with travel in the United States shall be allowed.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I wish to inform the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] where he can get, very readily, all the information he seeks upon this subject. The Navy Department, as he is well aware, publishes every year, or every six months, a register in which the name of every officer is printed, with the amount of his salary. The number of men employed, with their various divisions or ranks, is given in tables, which are very brief and easily examined. This book gives the exact pay which each officer gets. For instance, referring to the book, which is before me, I find that it begins with Admiral, stating his salary; then comes the Vice-Admiral; then the rear-admirals, with a statement of their pay. Turning on a page or two, I find given the exact number of admirals in the service, the exact number of commodores, and so on. Thus it would not take any clerk half an hour to ascertain from this book the exact amounts annually paid to all the officers, all the men, all the employés of every kind, without the variation of a dollar, unless sometimes a slight variation might arise, where for instance a man who was captain when the book was printed had subsequently advanced to the rank of commodore, getting in the latter position a little more pay.

Mr. WOOD, Let me suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] that the question is not as to the salary of these officers; I know that that information is accessible to us all; but I want to know something more. I want to know what the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, allows to these persons outside of the salaries fixed by law.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If the whole amount of salaries and pay of officers and men be deducted from $6,200,000, the result will show how much is paid for transportation and mileage.

I concur with the gentleman from New York in the wish that the Committee on Appropriations had figured up exactly the pay of the officers and men, and put it in a paragraph separate from the amount appropriated for mileage and transportation. Thus we would have been informed on this point without the trouble of a reference to books and documents. I was only undertaking to suggest to the gentleman from New York where he could get the information. I suppose that the form in which the Committee on Appropriations have reported this paragraph is because of the necessity imposed upon them to condense their bills. They cannot re-enact the Book of Estimates; it would make their bills too long. I think, however, it would have been better if these two items had been put in separate paragraphs, because thereby the Secretary of the Navy would have been freed from the suspicion of possibly using a large portion of this sum in a very liberal way to pay the traveling expenses of officers, while in fact, as I think, he has not done so, as everybody would have been able to see at a glance if the appropriation had been put in the form I have suggested.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BECK. I move, pro forma, to amend by striking out the last word. I do not know, and I have no information leading me to believe, that this matter of mileage is specially abused in the Navy Department; but it is perfectly certain that this system of allowing ten cents a mile as mileage to persons in the employ of the various Departments has grown to be a grievous abuse. Men traveling for not exceeding three cents a mile receive the full amount of this mileage, as they do when they travel, as they generally do, on free passes. General Farnsworth, lately a member of this House, presented in the last Congress a case in which he showed that an official, traveling under the direction of a Department from Washington to Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, charged mileage at ten cents a mile to Baltimore and back, to Philadelphia and back, to New York and back, to Boston and back, when there was, in fact, but one trip, and that made upon free passes. The case he presented only illustrated hundreds of others. It is a gross abuse, which ought to be stopped at once.

Ought there not to be a separate item of appropriation for mileage, so that a separate account can be kept for this matter? And is there not some way of reducing the allowance made so as to limit it to the actual traveling expenses, instead of paying this enormous allowance of ten cents a mile? I again say that I do not know of any special abuse in the Navy Department in this respect.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not the law already provide that these officers shall be allowed only their actual traveling expenses?

Mr. BECK. I think not; I think the legal allowance is ten cents a mile.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will state whether there is now a law allowing mileage at ten cents a mile, or any other rate, for traveling expenses of persons connected with the Navy.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The provision which was read a few moments ago by the Clerk provides in express terms for that.

Mr. HOLMAN. On the contrary, I thought it provided in express terms for the allowance of only actual expenses.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. By one clause of the law the mileage allowance is fixed at ten cents a mile.

Mr. SCOFIELD. But that is only paid when the person is traveling under orders. For instance, if a naval officer on the Pacific coast wants to come home to his family, though it may be absolutely necessary for him to do so, he travels at his own expense; but if the Department orders him home, then, traveling under orders, he gets ten cents a mile.

In reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] I would say, from my observation naval men are very rarely inclined to stretch the law to pay themselves. They hold their office during life or good behavior, are liable to court-martial, and when sixty-two years of age go upon the retired list, and make their calculation to live upon their salary or their retired pay after they go out of active service. They have less temptation than clerks or other persons employed in civil life for only a short time. My experience is, they are a very honest class of public servants. I have had no occasion ever to have heard of any particular extravagance on the part of the officers of the Navy. Some of them we pay tolerably well, while some of them are poorly paid.

But the gentleman from Kentucky referred to the case of some clerk. He was, perhaps, a clerk appointed to stay here a year or two, or as long as the gentleman who recommended him should be in a position of influence, and expected to go away again in a short time; to go home to find the little business he had before broken up, and he wanted to get all the mileage he could. I think the officers of the Army and Navy are not exposed to any such temptation, because they hold their office for life, as I have said, or good behavior. Indeed, in my belief, they are as honest and perhaps the honestest class of officers under the Government.

Mr. BECK. One word more, if I have the time. I make no complaint as to the officers of the Navy, as I have been informed they have not abused their privilege. I rose, particularly, to call the attention of the Committee on Appropriations in their other bills to what I think they will find a flagrant abuse in reference to this question of mileage in the different Departments for which they have to provide appropriations. This is said to be a very common case: A person in the Department, who wishes to go home upon his own private business, will be asked to look after the case of a pensioner who has died, or in reference to some other matter under some other Department, which makes him a special agent, and he travels free, and gets ten cents a mile going and coming. This practice has continued, I am informed, until it has grown to be a great abuse and a heavy charge upon the Treasury. I thought it quite as well to allude to it now so it might be before the Committee on Appropriations when they were preparing their other bills.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I rise to oppose the amendment, in order to say that the Committee on Appropriations is not only ready but willing to learn and to improve. These things are put together because, as I have shown, in all of your appropriation bills it has been customary heretofore. I recognize the force of the objection made both by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] and the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] and in preparing any other Navy bill, if it fell to my lot to prepare it, I should prefer that the pay simple should be by itself in one item, and the pay for mileage and transportation by itself in another; not that I think it would show any marked amount diverted for this purpose, but it would be on its face more satisfactory.

On this matter of pay I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] that while it may be that the very highest officers in the Navy are very well paid, yet taking them as a class they are not overpaid. The pay in the Navy of officers of corresponding rank in the Army is not as large. The pay of commodore, commander, captain, lieutenant-captain, and lieutenant, and of all other grades, clear up to Admiral, is not so high as the corresponding pay in the Army, and the allowances which they get are meager. These allowances do not apply in any particular year to any great number, because gentlemen will see, on account of the greater part of the Navy being abroad on the seas, there is not any call or claim for mileage, so that the number and amount altogether of transportation and mileage in the aggregate would be very small. Yet, on the whole, naval officers do not receive so large pay, everything being put together, as the officers of the Army.

Mr. LAMISON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The power of amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. LAMISON. I wish to make an explanation on the subject now before the House without committing myself for or against.

Mr. BECK. I will withdraw my amendment, and the gentleman can renew it.

Mr. LAMISON. I thank the gentleman from Kentucky, and will renew his amendment for the purpose of saying a few words.

I do not know, nor does it seem that the gentleman who presented the bill knows, the amount paid for transportation and mileage to the officers or the men of the Navy; but we have these data: The Navy is composed of eighty-five hundred men and its officers. The gentleman who has charge of this bill says that about one-half, and probably less than one-half, of the $6,200,000 or whatever it may be which is sought to be appropriated by this bill, goes to the payment of officers, and the other half or more to the payment of the men. If that be so, these men are paid at the rate of $300 per annum. Admitting the sum is split in two and equally divided between officers and men, we will then have for transportation and mileage $66.27 for each man, or in the aggregate $56,100 of the annual appropriation for the purpose of paying mileage and transportation to these men. Now I do not know whether that is too much or whether it is too little. I only submit the fact to the committee that it may dispose of this question; for I presume the Committee on Appropriations have some means of knowing how much is consumed in this branch of the service—the transportation and mileage. That is all I desire to say.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Here the committee informally rose, and Mr. TYNER took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill of the House (H. R. No. 1038) for the relief of the estate of Abel Gilbert and William Gerrish, late copartners in business under the title of Gilbert & Gerrish.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 202) to remove the legal and political disabilities of William Steele, of Bexar County, Texas.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For contingent expenses of the Navy Department, $100,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to reduce the amount $50,000, for the purpose of saying a word.

The older appropriation bills had no such items as this. I mean that they had no large appropriations of this kind. In every one of the older appropriation bills that I have been able to examine the exact purpose to which the appropriation is to be applied is set forth. I find that in the estimates the purposes to which this sum of $100,000 is proposed to be applied are set forth. I would suggest to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] that it is certainly a very unsatisfactory mode of appropriating money simply to say, "for contingent expenses of the Navy Department, $100,000." This same bill contains also appropriations for contingencies of the various Bureaus. For instance, for the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting there is an appropriation of $75,000 for contingent expenses. I do not complain of appropriations for contingencies if the purposes are specified to which they are to be applied; and I think old practice requires that the Bureaus should report the exact nature of the expenditures made under those appropriations.

I ask the gentleman from Maine to consider the proposition which I submit, that the exact nature of the expenditures provided for by this appropriation of $100,000 shall be specified in the bill. The country is scandalized by the rumors of malappropriation of this contingent fund. It is of the utmost importance that it should be known that the fund is properly applied; and with that view it is necessary that the country should be assured that those to whom is intrusted the power of regulating these matters see to it that there shall be proper expenditures of the moneys appropriated. I submit to my friend from Maine that the appropriation of $100,000 for contingencies is too vague and indefinite. The language of the estimates, also, in regard to these contingencies is too vague and indefinite. When they speak about "livery," for instance, what is meant and whom do you hold accountable? I submit to the committee whether there is not a chance for economy here. Can we not, while still keeping up the Navy, reduce these large sums for contingencies which are appropriated year after year?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The form adopted in this bill in regard to contingent expenses, in the items now under consideration, is the same form as has been observed for many years. Formerly, before the war, the form and the practice were different; but, Mr. Chairman, it was not so good a practice as now. If the gentleman from Indiana will examine the naval appropriation bills, or other appropriation bills—but I specially now call his attention to the naval appropriation bills—before the war, he will find that under this head of "contingencies" was sometimes embraced the whole expenditure in a Bureau; so that if $1,000,000 were given to the Bureau of Yards and Docks, or some other Bureau, there was discretion in the head of that Bureau to divert the money in one way or another. Now, instead of that having grown worse, it has grown better; and this committee has taken some part in the bettering of that condition of things. Why, sir, the item on page 81 of the estimates, and included in this bill, for the "maintenance of yards and docks, Bureau of Yards and Docks," was always a contingency until within the last two years. The committee has struck out wherever it could these expenditures under the head of "contingencies;" because, as the term implies, these expenditures are not all regular, that can be estimated for under the statutes, but are contingent, or dependent upon emergencies.

Now, the smaller that that fund can be in the hands of any Bureau or Secretary the better. But still, gentlemen should bear in mind that if you have particularized in the large military or naval appropriations as far as it is possible for human ingenuity to go, there are yet many items that will come up during each year that must be met and paid; and while we have confidence enough in the heads of Departments to maintain them in office there must be some discretion left them in regard to contingent expenses. The gentleman from Indiana asks why we do not particularize in the bill what this appropriation shall go for. Well, sir, in the estimates which the gentleman has submitted these different items are given:

Rent and furniture of buildings and offices not in navy-yards; expenses of courts-martial and courts of inquiry—

Who can tell what that will amount to?—

boards of investigation, examining boards, with clerks' and witnesses' fees, and traveling expenses and costs; stationery and recording; expenses of purchasing-paymasters' offices at the various cities, including clerks, furniture, fuel, stationery, and incidental expenses; newspapers and advertising; foreign postage; telegraphing, foreign and domestic; copying; mail and express wagons, and livery and express fees, and freight; all books for the use of the Navy; experts' fees, and costs of suits; commissions, warrants, diplomas, and discharges; relief of vessels in distress, and pilotage; recovery of valuables from shipwrecks; quarantine expenses; care and transportation of the dead; reports, professional investigation, and information from abroad; and all other emergencies and extraordinary expenses arising at home or abroad, but impossible to be anticipated or classified.

Now, for instance, in the past year there has been, what I presume the gentleman from Indiana would approve of, an examination and investigation into the Polaris disaster, a vessel sent out by the United States Government. The Treasury paid the bill. Every one knows the unfortunate and calamitous result of that expedition. Certain questions arose of great interest to the public in reference to the conduct, the honor, and character of the officers and men engaged in that expedition, and the Secretary, of course, had to make an examination. I mention this as an instance of the contingent expenses which may fall on the Department; and I think gentlemen must see that under these circumstances, putting in everything as regularly as you can, still something will be needed for expenses that cannot be estimated for regularly and for the precise amounts. The committee considered this matter, discussed it, and concluded that while it has cut down the other items of any amount for contingencies in the Navy from what they have been in former years, in this case it was not advisable to cut down the contingencies below what they were last year. It did cut down the estimates $25,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. In looking at the earlier system of legislation on this subject does not the gentleman find that the uniform practice was to set forth the items for which the contingent fund should be expended?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That is not the result of my examination, but I do not know to what particular era the gentleman refers.

Mr. HOLMAN. I refer to the time before the war. I insist that we should come back not simply to a more economical system, but to a system of more responsibility on the part of officers; a system of non-responsibility grew up during the war, but if the gentleman will refer to the act of 1859, or 1860, or to any preceding that year, he will see what I refer to.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman will find in that very bill certain contingent funds of a more sweeping character than those in this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is the Bureau of Docks and Yards, with an appropriation for its contingent fund of $100,000, but with no items given.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman knows that the expenditure of a contingent fund depends upon emergencies, and that it is impossible to give, in advance, a detailed list of the objects for which it shall be expended.

Mr. HOLMAN. I know, undoubtedly, that it is done in this bill; but in the legislation to which I have referred the items were specified upon which the contingent fund should be expended. Let the gentleman examine any of those of former years, and he will see that what I am complaining of now is the latitude which this bill allows the Departments.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I move as an amendment to strike out the whole of the third section of the bill. The gentleman in charge of this bill, [Mr. HALE,] in behalf of the Committee on Appropriations, seems to be very anxious to advance legislation upon the pending bill, and I will say that in most cases the desire of the committee in that regard would be very praiseworthy. But I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that we are discussing questions in which the material interests of the country are deeply concerned, when he knows that one-half of the members of this House are legislating in the dark.

There are, Mr. Chairman, upon this floor now over one hundred and forty new members, who never before had the pleasure of being members of the American Congress, and there are twenty additional members who were not members of the last Congress. I put to the gentleman who has charge of this bill whether, when the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] and the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] are not properly informed as to matters pertaining to this discussion, on which they should have full knowledge before they pass on these appropriations, how can he expect that others, who have not had the advantages that those gentlemen have had, can be prepared to vote at all.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman proposes to carry through this bill so hastily upon the score of economy. And I also say to the Committee on Appropriations that doubtless the whole country will be gratified at any proposition, looking to economy, that may come from either side of the House. But I call their attention to the further fact, that it has been gravely charged upon this floor by a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, [Mr. ARCHER,] who stands second to none in his knowledge and information on these questions, that this bill is a delusion and a fraud; that the appropriations asked for are not in the interest of economy, but for the purpose of deluding and deceiving the people of the country. Sir, I have a right to conclude that that assertion, coming from my colleague from Maryland, [Mr. ARCHER,] was made with the full knowledge and approval of the Committee on Naval Affairs, because it has not been contradicted by any other member of the committee. Now, sir, although I do not claim to be the especial organ in any respect of the new members on this floor, I ask the Committee on Appropriations whether, in face of the charge made by the gentleman from Maryland, we have not a right to conclude that there is some other, deeper, and not so praiseworthy a motive in pressing this bill than the economy of which the gentleman from Maine so loudly speaks, and which he vaunts as his motive for pressing this bill.

I will say further to the Committee on Appropriations that my colleague from Maryland [Mr. ARCHER] in whom I have all confidence, and on whose statements I must rely, has stated that our Navy is not in a condition to sustain the honor of the country—is not in such a condition as will justify the passage of this bill. Why, sir, I remember the impression that was created in the minds of many upon this floor and throughout the country by the debate which took place a few day ago upon the bill appropriating four millions for naval deficiencies; and remembering that impression, I am rather astounded that gentlemen on the other side of the House should place themselves and the country in such an unenviable position as they did by the utterances which fell from their lips on that occasion. I call the attention of the gentleman who has charge of this bill to what he then stated.

It was, as well as I can recollect—not having his speech before me—that the inefficiency of the Navy, or rather its weakness in Cuban waters during the recent complications, was mainly the cause of the Government being compelled to pursue the inglorious policy which was followed, instead of demanding instant redress from Spain for the outrages committed on our citizens, the insult to our flag, and the barbarous execution of the crew and passengers of the Virginius. Now, Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman imagine that the country will approve the legislation of this House that imperils the honor of the country, as far as it may be committed to the care of the Department of State, for want of proper appropriations? Is that the economy that he demands; or would it not be more consonant with the dignity of the Republic and spare us future humiliation, to respond to the demands of the Navy Department and place our Navy in a condition that would save our flag from degradation and protect our citizens in every quarter of the world? But, Mr. Chairman, as I before stated, we have no estimates upon which proper appropriations may be based. While I am favorable to the Navy being put in an efficient condition in order to answer all calls that may be made on that arm of the service, I prefer legislating with all the light that the reports from the heads of the Bureaus of the Navy Department will give me. These reports are not before us; and I trust this bill will not be passed until we have full information through the report of the Secretary of the Navy.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DUNNELL. I rise to sustain the motion to amend.

The CHAIRMAN. The only debate in order is in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. DUNNELL. I renew the amendment. I do not see how we can hope to make any reduction in the expenses of this Government unless we make them in some such manner as is proposed by this motion to amend. I agree with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that since the commencement of the war there has undoubtedly grown up the custom of appropriating larger and smaller sums of money for contingent funds. And I think that the time has come now when we ought to go back to the old method of appropriating; that the condition of the country now does not call for large contingent appropriations. The fact is, as every member of the House knows, there is no guard at all to the contingent appropriations. Any Department of the Government, having a contingent appropriation for its benefit, may expend that appropriation ad libitum; there is no kind of restraint on that Department.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman tell us on what authority he makes that statement?

Mr. DUNNELL. I am assured by those who I know possess all the requisite information that the Comptroller of the Treasury does not feel himself called upon to scrutinize a voucher or bill that comes before him to be paid out of some contingent fund.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the gentleman consider it no restraint upon these Departments to require them—as they are required by law—to furnish an itemized statement of every dollar expended from that fund?

Mr. DUNNELL. We know that the country is not aware of the manner in which these contingent funds are expended.

Mr. GARFIELD. They are published by the House of Representatives.

Mr. DUNNELL. Not all of the expenditures of these contingent funds.

Mr. GARFIELD. Has the gentlemen looked for any he has not found?

Mr. DUNNELL. I have.

Mr. GARFIELD. What, if you please?

Mr. DUNNELL. I have been unable to find a report printed that will cover what we have been told has been paid out of many of these contingent funds.

This contingent fund proposed in this bill, of $100,000 for the Navy Department, seems to me to be too large; and I have noticed, what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] referred to, that there are other contingent items in this bill. I do not find fault with the Committee on Appropriations; but I think they are a little too sensitive when a member of this House attacks a bill of theirs, as if they were not careful enough, or had not all the knowledge necessary for their action.

I had before me a moment ago a bill reported to this House from the Committee on Naval Affairs in 1858. In that bill there is not enumerated a single contingent expense. Wherever expenses are referred to that could be classed as contingent, the items are enumerated for which the sum thus contingently appropriated is to be expended.

Mr. POTTER. Does not the gentleman know that that was under a democratic administration?

Mr. DUNNELL. That is true; and if there was anything good in a democratic administration we ought to go back to it. I am willing to go back to anything good in a democratic administration, though it may be somewhat difficult to find out what it is.

I do not propose to, and probably shall not, say another word on this appropriation bill, or perhaps on any other appropriation bill that may come before this House at this session. But as a member of this House I do believe that we ought to look after contingent appropriations with a great deal of care and with the greatest fidelity to the Government. We have here $100,000 for the contingent expenses of the Navy Department, when subsequently in the same bill we are called upon to appropriate contingent amounts to the different Bureaus which go to make up that very Department.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. I have felt, ever since I have been in Congress, now some ten years, the same embarrassment that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] says he is experiencing now, and I think if he should remain here ten years consecutively, as I have done, he would still have more or less of the same embarrassment. It is not solely new members who feel it, but old members as well.

This Government is a very vast machine. When you come to expend several hundred millions of dollars every year, it is impossible for any one man, brought here from some professional business at home, never having made the subject of national expenditures his study, to understand it in one year, or in any length of time. If in the course of a few years he comes to learn his own duties, those which particularly pertain to his committee, or those which come before him in some other way, he will be a very faithful student.

We cannot understand all these things. I think that one mistake that new members as well as old make all the time is to suppose that everything they do not understand, because they have not been able to give the necessary time to its consideration, is something wrong; that every appropriation that they have not tried to investigate perhaps, or trying have failed to understand the details of, is perhaps a steal.

In such a vast government as this we must trust somebody; we must to some extent trust our own committees. When we send a matter to the Committee on Appropriations, we must, until convinced to the contrary, believe that they endeavor to find out what is right, and to appropriate no more than what is necessary. We must, to some extent, trust the heads of the Departments. It will not do to violate the charity of the old criminal code, and instead of giving a man credit for being innocent until proved to be guilty, charge him with being guilty until he proves himself to be innocent.

Mr. O'BRIEN. That is the only safe way.

Mr. SCOFIELD. No; it is not the only safe way. We may be suspicious enough to investigate as far as we can; but we have no right, after entertaining those suspicions of the weakness of humanity, if we find nothing to sustain them, to come here into this House and assail the character of a man who is our equal in every respect, and probably just as honest as we are, when we are not able to point out a single thing in his conduct that is wrong.

Now, the gentleman complains that he has no information. I wish he had sent for the document I hold in my hand—Executive Document No. 5 of the present Congress—in which all these things have been printed, and printed for nearly a month. It has been lying there awaiting the gentleman's call. If he had obtained it and turned to page 77, he would have found exactly for what the Secretary of the Navy estimates this $100,000 as contingent expenses.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I was not referring to that specially.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not know that the Secretary of the Navy needs this $100,000; I am not going to say so, because I do not know it. I presume the Committee on Appropriations thinks he does, and thinks so upon an examination in detail,

But the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] says the Department does not need any contingent fund at all. Did I not understand the gentleman correctly?

Mr. HOLMAN. I said that in bills passed years ago, including the first appropriation bill reported to this House in the Thirty-sixth Congress by a gentleman from Ohio now in the Senate, no fund was appropriated as a mere contingent fund without indicating the purpose for which it was to be expended.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Does the gentleman mean to say that we never should give a Department a contingent fund?

Mr. HOLMAN. I refer the gentleman to the acts passed at the session of 1859–'60 and the session of 1860–'61, the latter of which he will see at once was enacted with a view to intestine troubles——

Mr. SCOFIELD. I do not wish to discuss that question. If the gentleman does not take the position that we should have no contingent fund, I shall have no discussion with him at present. I was going to reply to what I thought was his allegation that no Department ever needs a contingent fund.

I am aware that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] often subjects himself to opprobrium among members—never with me—by his criticisms upon proposed expenditures of money coming before this House. The gentleman knows that I have often gone over to his seat and told him that I honored him for his efforts in this respect, and regretted the opprobrium to which he subjected himself by his criticisms of measures appropriating money. In all his efforts in that direction I have sympathized with him, although I have not perhaps the courage to do as much as he does in that respect. But if the gentleman intended to urge that we need no contingent fund, I was going to show that we have had some such fund always. Whether the amount proposed here is too large the Committee of the Whole can judge.

Mr. DUNNELL. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I renew the amendment in order to say a word. Gentlemen who have criticised the clause now before the House have had, I think, no rejoinder to indicate that the Committee on Appropriations are restive under criticism. I think no disposition of that sort has been shown. The only thing under which I am restive is vague, general, clawing, sweeping charges, to which it is no more possible to reply than it is to kick a cloud with your big toe. [Laughter.] If any man comes here and makes a specific charge, I welcome him; but when he says that he is inclined to think that somewhere there is a motive in the background that is other than the public good; that the object is not really to cut down the expenses, but that there is some concealed motive on the part of the Committee on Appropriations for pushing this bill unduly, who can reply to such an intimation? Could omnipotence undertake to answer it? If it could I must enlarge the scope of my theology to understand that term.

But, sir, the point which has been made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is one that deserves a careful response; for in principle he is right. I agree with him in the position, that whenever an appropriation of money is asked for, the purpose for which the money is to be used ought to be stated as specifically as possible; but the question is whether it is practicable to embrace in specific items all the appropriations in a bill for a great Department I affirm that it is not. I affirm that when you have itemized to the last degree of your capacity in that direction there will still be left something that you cannot enumerate, which you must cover under some general term, as "miscellaneous expenses" or "incidental expenses," or a "contingent fund."

The gentleman from Indiana referred us to the naval appropriation bill of 1859; but he forgot in his zeal to tell the House that although in that act there was nearly half a column of items to describe the contingent, the aggregate amount of that contingent in that single naval bill alone was $890,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. But the items were all indicated.

Mr. GARFIELD. But many of the items are almost as vague as the language "contingent expenses."

Mr. HOLMAN. But if the gentleman will take the next bill reported in this House by Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, he will find that it requires the objects of expenditure to be more clearly indicated on the face of the estimates.

Mr. GARFIELD. My friend does me honor in following me so attentively; for I desire his attention, and that of the committee, to a further point.

In this same volume which I loaned to the gentleman I turned to a bill which is always as particular as a bill can possibly be made—the legislative appropriation bill; and I find under that two columns of contingencies. How contingencies?

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman is confessing and avoiding.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. Confine yourself to the bill under consideration.

Mr. GARFIELD. What bill does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. HOLMAN. To the bill of 1869–'70, the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is the one I am responding to.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman is referring to the bill for legislative purposes.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman afterward said the committee in charge of the naval appropriation bill ought to be more explicit in their other bills, and I am replying to that point which he made.

Mr. HOLMAN. In that naval appropriation bill to which I have referred there is a provision "that the expenditures under the foregoing appropriations," giving each item one after another, "shall be so accounted for as to show disbursements for each Bureau under each respective appropriation; and provided further, that the estimates for expenditures for such purpose shall be hereafter given in detail." That provision in reference to giving these contingencies in detail is more definite than the language of the bill now before the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. My friend from Indiana helps me again. The language which he has read is the law to-day, and it is our protection in regard to every contingency; so that every one of these Departments is required to send us itemized statements of how they expend every dollar of their contingent fund. That is our protection.

I wish to call attention to the value of itemizing. Suppose we had taken that long statement of items under the head of "contingent expenses" in the Book of Estimates and put it in the bill before us; what would we have? Rent and furniture of buildings, offices not in navy-yards, expenses of courts-martial and courts of inquiry, and a long list of other items, finally winding up with "and other miscellaneous items and incidental expenses."

Mr. HOLMAN. I would have moved to strike that out if it had been in there.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman had fifteen yards of items he still would have the final residuum "of other miscellaneous items and incidental expenses" in reference to any great Department of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GARFIELD. Just one sentence more and I will conclude. It has been determined, while prudent to call contingencies by the name of the contingent fund, to require all of the Departments to report how they have expended every single dollar of it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will substitute for the vague language here the more specific language of the bill of 1869.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, it appears to me the debate has not yet touched the point of objection in this item of the bill. It is clear, and I think all agree, that the contingent appropriation should be as small as it possibly can be, but at the same time to be sufficiently flexible for the uses of the Departments. What the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] observes is undoubtedly true, that no head of a Department or head of Bureau can estimate precisely just what the requirements of his Department or Bureau will be for the next fiscal year, but unquestionably he can approximate it. He called attention to the estimate which has been made in this case—not in the bill before us, but furnished in the Book of Estimates—which recites, as he has read to the House, a dozen or twenty different items. These items have been appropriated year after year under the head of "contingent expenses." Now what I suggest is, what obstacle is there to heads of Departments coming here, under each one of these items hitherto classed as contingent items, and estimating the amount required for that particular item? Take, for instance, the item of mail and express wagons. The Navy Department know, or ought to know, what they are going to require for the next year, or very nearly so, for mail and express wagons; they know, or ought to know, how much will be required for livery for the next year; they know, or ought to know, how much will be required for rent and furniture of buildings. Then each one of these items can be appropriated for specifically. Unquestionably there will be a small margin for contingent expenses over and above that which will have to be taken care of, and that will come under the head of the item for emergencies and extraordinary expenses, arising at home and abroad, and impossible to be anticipated and classified. What is possible to be anticipated or classified can be set down with the figures. If you go outside of that, you do need a contingent fund of course, and one should be provided. It seems to me in this item we may appropriate for at least seventy-five thousand dollars of this one hundred thousand, leaving only a margin properly appropriated as a contingent fund.

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BURCHARD. I renew it, for the purpose of answering the remark made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] in regard to the appropriation bill of 1861. I have before me the act passed February 21, 1861, United States Statutes at Large, page 148, where I find specifications for contingencies, commencing with "freight, ferriage," &c., and ending with "paving, and other purposes, $32,500."

I wish to say that in answer to implied suggestions that the republican party, which has charge of these appropriation bills, had introduced a new feature in legislation by omitting to specify the objects to which these appropriations should be applied.

Mr. HOLMAN. On the contrary, I called attention to this very bill as the bill reported in the first republican House of Representatives. The bill I have referred to was passed on the 22d of June, 1860, and reported to the House by a republican Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BURCHARD. It is no new, no late, feature of legislation that has been adopted by the committee which has reported this bill. It seems to me that there is much in the argument made by the gentleman who has charge of the bill that you cannot specify all the details. I will go as far as the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] or any other gentleman on this floor, in favor of rigid economy. I have carefully looked through this bill and compared it with the estimates recommended by the Navy Department and the appropriations heretofore made; and I find that before the war, in 1860, the appropriations were in the neighborhood of ten or twelve millions of dollars. At this time the committee here report only in favor of an appropriation of about sixteen millions of dollars. Now, when the price of living, the price of supplies, the price of everything that is required by the Navy Department is increased to a large extent, it is necessary, in order to maintain the same naval force, that there should be a larger appropriation than at that time.

I believe the committee have, in the interests of economy, scanned all the expenditures and cut them down; and that, perhaps if they should specify here in detail all the appropriations that would occur to their minds we might find that other expenditures would aries for which there was no appropriation, and that it would be necessary either that the service should be jeopardized and injured, or that there should be a deficiency bill to meet necessary and unavoidable expenditures.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I hope the committee will now allow a vote on this matter. I do not feel inclined to call for a vote when gentlemen on either side of the House show a desire to speak to the subject-matter to any reasonable extent. But as this discussion has run nearly two hours, I hope the committee will sustain me in asking for a vote; only saying in regard to this item that the committee scanned it carefully and cut down the estimates $25,000, and I do not believe that under the circumstances it could have done better.

Mr. BURCHARD. I desire to be permitted to make a remark in reply to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] The estimates to which the gentleman has referred were asked for by a democratic administration, and while they may have been passed, as has been suggested, by a House having a republican majority, the democratic party had a majority in the Senate, and the estimates were asked for by a democratic administration.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire also, Mr. Chairman, to say but a word before the vote is taken. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] misapprehends me entirely. I had no political or party thought in my mind in connection with this matter. It affords me pleasure to say that the party of which the gentleman from Illinois is an honored member was distinguished at first by an earnest desire to reduce expenditures to the lowest dollar. But that was a long time ago. Vast events have transpired since then, and the last ten or twelve years have produced an entire change in these bills. All I ask is, that the gentlemen who control the appropriations of public moneys—for the appropriation of public moneys, as was shown very well by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] yesterday, has fallen into the hands of a very few gentlemen—will give heed to this matter; for I feel bound to say that the country will be exceedingly fortunate if the same severe view of economy is entertained now by the Committee on Appropriations that was entertained by the Committee on Appropriations at the time that bill was passed. No such vague appropriations as this were made at that time. Let me call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to this fact: The bill, now pending contains items of contingent appropriations for the various Bureaus, and contains also an appropriation of $100,000 under the head of "contingent expenses of the Department;" whereas the bills at the times I have referred to contained no vague appropriations of $100,000, or any other sum.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HALE, of Maine, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] part of which the Chair understood him to have yielded to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] has expired.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I wish only to say, for the information of the gentleman from Indiana, as he is so fond of recurring to this particular bill in comparison with the past, that the contingent expenses of the Navy Department for the year he has referred to, particularized or not particularized, amounted to more than double the contingent expenses of this bill; and that it is a matter of more importance to us and to the people that we are saving money, than it is that the phraseology of the bill should be made to satisfy the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman makes a mistake in that statement.

The amendment to the amendment was withdrawn.

The question recurred on Mr. HOLMAN's amendment to strike out "$100,000," and insert "$50,000;" so that the paragraph would read:

For contingent expenses of the Navy Department, $50,000.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 50, noes 72, no quorum voting.

Tellers were appointed; and Mr. HOLMAN, and Mr. HALE of Maine, were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 65, noes 87.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For civil establishment at the different navy-yards, as follows: At Kittery, Maine, $18,759; at Charlestown, Massachusetts, $23,093.40; at Brooklyn, New York, $23,789.40; at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, $21,293.40; at Norfolk, Virginia, $18,538.20; at Pensacola, Florida, $3,145; at Washington, District of Columbia, $19,123.20; at Mare Island, California, $20,317.20; and at League Island naval station, Pennsylvania, $4,680; making in all the sum of $157,738.80.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. For the purpose of eliciting information from the gentleman who has this bill in charge in behalf of the Appropriation Committee, I move to strike out in line 20 of this clause, "eighteen thousand seven hundred and fifty-nine dollars," and insert in lieu thereof the words "fourteen thousand dollars," so that the appropriation for Kittery, Maine, shall be $14,000. My reason for offering the amendment is this: in looking at the naval appropriation bill passed last year, so far as I can make up the figures, I find that the appropriations for the civil establishment at Kittery, Maine, amounted to $17,590. This bill appropriates $18,759; in other words, the appropriation made by this bill is larger than the appropriation made last year. At Charlestown, Massachusetts, the appropriations only amount, as I understand it, to $30,000—a reduction on the appropriation made last year. And the same reduction has been made in the appropriations for all the other navy-yards except League Island, which last year had only an appropriation of $2,600, and this year has an appropriation of $4,680.

I understood the gentleman in the remarks he made upon this bill when it first came before the committee to say that these civil establishments at the various navy-yards of the country had been kept up on a scale much too expensive; that we had miniature Bureaus in each navy-yard to correspond with the Bureaus of the Navy Department in Washington; and that the object of the committee was to make large reductions in the civil establishments of the navy-yards—a measure which would undoubtedly meet the concurrence of a large portion of the House. But it occurred to me—I may be wrong in my opinion—that this navy-yard in Maine—I am sure it could not have happened, because the gentleman having charge of the bill is a Representative from that State—is the only one which did not happen to be struck by this blow of economy. The expenditures for the other navy-yards are reduced from 25 to 40 per cent., while the appropriation for this yard is actually increased over what it was last year. I may be wrong in my figures, but so far as I have been able to gather them from the bill passed last year and the bill which we are now considering, that is the state of facts. If this be so, it occurs to me that unless some very good reason can be given why that navy-yard at Kittery, Maine, should have no reduction made in its appropriation, we ought to reduce the amount; and I have moved to reduce it to $14,000.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I am sorry that the gentleman from Vermont should have made what might be construed into an imputation at least of unfairness on my part, in reporting this bill. Mr. Chairman, if I had, after what I said the other day on this very subject-matter, attempted to reduce the civil establishments in the different navy-yards 40 per cent., and it was found that in doing it I had left the appropriations for the Kittery navy-yard unreduced, I should certainly be called under very disadvantageous circumstances to make an explanation. Now, the fact is that the gentleman's figures are all wrong. If he will take the appropriation bill of last year and follow it through he will see how easy it is to get at the items of the eighteen thousand and odd dollars which this bill proposes for the Kittery yard.

Luckily I have the figures by me in tabulated form, because I did not want in this movement in the direction of reduction to have any man question the accuracy of my movements. Now, the gentleman will see that in the bill of last year for the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, the sum of $3,400 was appropriated for the Kittery yard. That will be found upon page 4 of the naval appropriation bill of last year. Under the head of the "Bureau of Yards and Docks" there was an appropriation of $4,400; under the head of the "Bureau of Medicine and Surgery" there was an appropriation of $1,200; under the head of the "Bureau of Construction and Repair" there was an appropriation of $8,500; and under the head of the "Bureau of Engineering" an appropriation of $5,600. But I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that in a part of this bill of last year a portion of the appropriations are put down as for the Portsmouth navy-yard in New Hampshire, and a part for the Kittery yard in Maine. That did not occur to me until this moment. Then, in addition to that, I had also to add the items for the two Bureaus of Navigation and Ordnance, which were not put down by detail in the former bill, but were aggregated and divided by the number of the navy-yards. I directed the clerk of the committee to figure up these figures, and I found that the reduction made in the appropriations for this yard amounted to 40 per cent.—the same reduction that was made in the appropriations for other yards. Of course I may have been in error in my figures, but I think not; because I submitted the matter to the clerk of the committee, and the bill is the result of those figures. I am sorry the gentleman did not bear in mind that the Portsmouth and Kittery yards are one and the same.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I think I may be excused for not knowing the geographical fact that Portsmouth, New Hampshire, is Kittery, Maine.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The yard is there, just upon the State line, and it is sometimes called by the one name and sometimes by the other.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I move, pro forma, to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I do not understand fully the explanation now given by the gentleman from Maine. Of course the object I had in view was not to reduce the appropriations for the Kittery yard below what they ought to stand at. As I understand him now, the appropriation charged in the bill last year for the navy-yard at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, amounted to $5,000 which, if added to the amount appropriated for Kittery, would make $22,000 instead of $18,000. Still, if the gentleman himself has looked into the matter and made the proper reduction, I will take his word for it. I am willing that we shall appropriate for this navy-yard in New Hampshire or Maine, whichever it is—I will not undertake to settle the geography of the question—that it shall be appropriated for as other yards are, and I am satisfied with his statement that the appropriation is in the same proportion as in regard to other yards, and I therefore withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I say this because I have learned that there is nothing a man may be mistaken in so easily as in regard to figures. I will look over these figures again to-day, with the clerk of the committee, and if I find that there is any correction that should be made in this matter I will move it to-morrow morning.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I renew it, for the purpose of saying that there is another statement that should be added to that of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] By referring to the different portions of this Book of Estimates that relate to Kittery I find the items to be as follows: For the Bureau of Recruiting, $3,400; for the Bureau of Yards and Docks, $9,100; for the Bureau of Construction and Repair, $8,600; for the Bureau of Steam Engineering, $5,600; for the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, $1,290; amounting in the aggregate to $27,990 as I add them up. These were the estimates for the civil establishment at Kittery. We have in our bill cut them down to $18,759, making a deduction of over $9,000 out of $27,000, which is about 33 per cent.

Mr. BECK. If there is anything in which money is expended wastefully it is in these navy-yards if I understand the facts. And I am glad to see that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] is trying to cut them down. The civil expenses of these navy-yards and the machinery necessary to run them, when you come to analyze them, constitute one of the worst expenditures of the Navy Department. They are kept up and have been for years, not only under the present but under former administrations, as mere political machines. My idea is that they ought to be reduced in number to not more than three on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific coast. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] tried that some years ago, but did not succeed. I have no doubt that the civil establishments in the navy-yards ought to be and can be cut down as proposed by this bill, even if the number of them is not curtailed, without any sort of injury to the public service.

But what I want to say especially is this: I have heard during the discussion on this bill some reflections made on former administrations of the Navy, and a great deal said about the economical way in which the Navy Department is now administered. I wish to call the attention of the committee to one or two facts which it ought to know. They are facts furnished by a republican Senator, Mr. CRAGIN, of New Hampshire, chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs in the United States Senate, who I suppose would not do any injustice to the present administration of the Navy Department. He made a speech in which he took occasion to show, on the floor of the Senate last January, that the present condition of the Navy was deplorable as compared with what it was in 1860 and 1861, at the close of the administration of Mr. Buchanan. He gave the total number of ships then and now, and said, among other things, after showing that we had a better Navy in 1861 than we have now, with more ships, and more guns in order:

> As I remarked before, Congress has not authorized the building of a single ship during the past eight years. During the four years of Buchanan's administration Congress authorized the building of twenty-seven vessels of war, and some of the vessels built at that time are among the very best in the service, as the Hartford, the Lancaster, and the others of that class. Congress annually authorized the building of vessels during those years, and as I have before me the laws that were passed on those occasions, perhaps it will not be improper if I read them. In 1857 Congress enacted:
>
> "That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be constructed for the United States Navy, at as early a day as practicable, consistent with a due regard for economy and efficiency, five sloops of war, to be provided with screw propellers, and properly armed and equipped for service; said vessels and machinery to be built by contract or in the Government navy-yards, as the Secretary of the Navy may think most advisable for the public interest; and that there be, and is hereby, appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for the purpose above specified, the sum of $1,000,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."
>
> This law is almost exactly like the bill now pending. Then in 1858, the year after, Congress enacted—
>
> "That the Secretary of the Navy cause to be constructed, as speedily as may be consistent with the public interests, seven steam screw sloops of war, with full steam-power, whose greatest draught of water shall not exceed fourteen feet; which ships shall combine the heaviest armament and greatest speed compatible with their character and tonnage; and one side-wheel war-steamer, whose greatest draught shall not exceed eight feet, armed and provided for service in the China seas; and that there be, and is hereby, appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for the purpose above specified, the sum of $1,200,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."
>
> And in February, 1861, Congress passed another act:
>
> "That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be constructed for the United States Navy, at as early a day as practicable, having due regard to efficiency and economy, seven steam screw sloops of war of the second class, as vessels are rated in the Navy, with full steam-power, whose greatest draught of water shall not exceed fourteen feet, which sloops shall combine the heaviest armament and greatest speed compatible with their character and tonnage; and for the purpose above specified the sum of $1,200,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy."
>
> Those were the three acts passed during Mr. Buchanan's administration, adding, with seven vessels that were purchased during that administration, twenty-seven vessels to the Navy of the United States.

Now, sir, look at the facts. While twenty-seven first-class vessels were added to the Navy during Mr. Buchanan's administration, and not one has been added during the last eight years, what have been the expenditures of the Navy during that time? In 1857, $12,000,000; in 1858, $14,000,000; in 1859, $14,000,000; and $11,000,000 in 1860. What have they been for the last four years? In 1870, $21,000,000; in 1871, $19,500,000; in 1872, $21,000,000; and in 1873, $23,000,000.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BECK. I have only five minutes.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I ask for information.

Mr. BECK. The Chair will rap me down before I get through.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. No; we will extend your time. Is the cost of building the twenty-seven vessels referred to by the gentleman included in the appropriations he has given?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Were there not separate appropriations for those vessels?

Mr. BECK. No, sir; every dollar of it was put in the statement of the expenditures of the Navy Department by the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report for this year. Now let me call attention to this fact also, that we have given to the Navy Department in the last three years $63,000,000; while all the expenditures of the Government during the three years 1843, 1844, and 1845—the last two of Mr. Tyler's and the first of Mr. Polk's administration—for war, navy, legislative, executive, and judicial expenditures, Indians, and everything else, were only $53,000,000. We have not built a ship during these last eight years. What has become of the appropriations? They have gone into these navy-yards and to other political rings to keep up the (so-called) civil service, and the gangs of retainers who are not used for the purpose of building ships or for any other warlike or useful purpose, but for that which is purely political.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I renew it formally for the purpose of saying that I do not like to be on the floor as much as I am obliged to be in this matter. I had hoped that this bill would run through without my occupying so much of the attention of the committee; but some of the statements made here need to be answered.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] talked to us until after four o'clock last evening, and he has been reading up again old speeches on this old subject-matter, which he is never tired of dinning in the ears of the House. His unceasing strain is that so much money is bestowed on the Navy of to-day. If he were answered doubly and trebly every day, he would still rally his forces and still inquire why more money is needed for the Navy to-day than was needed in the years before the war; just as if he had never asked the question before; as if he had not asked it twenty, forty, and a hundred times; as if it had not been answered twenty, forty, and a hundred times. I cannot and will not undertake to occupy the time of the committee by the answer that has been so often given. The gentleman knows that every dollar appropriated now for materials, for labor, for new kinds of machinery introduced within recent years, goes no farther than half a dollar or the third of a dollar would go before the war. The gentleman knows that in this respect the Government is like every private establishment. No man lives as he did twelve or fifteen years ago; no man can do so.

And, sir, after the Committee on Appropriations have in this bill cut down the appropriations nearly $3,000,000, when they are seeking to crystallize their action into formal law, it is poor encouragement that the gentleman continually gets up and talks about the amount of money that has been expended during the last three years. We should never have been able to cut down these appropriations as much as we have done but for the fact that new vessels have been provided for in the act of last year, some of which will go into the Navy during the present year. Besides this, the Secretary of the Navy has been able, out of the appropriations we have already given him, to repair vessels so that they are almost or quite as good as new. Therefore it is that the Committee on Appropriations, scrutinizing faithfully, have believed that the Navy Department can be run for a little over $16,000,000; and in meeting the legitimate expense of keeping the Navy afloat, I venture to say that this $16,000,000 will not go as far as $10,000,000 would go in 1859. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. BECK. I renew the amendment. Mr. Chairman, during the debate which has been kept up for the last two hours, contrasts have been made, and made sharply, by the gentlemen on the other side and the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] and others, as to the comparative expenditures now and before the war for naval purposes. Hence I thought I had the right to show, as I attempted to do a few minutes ago, that whatever expenditures were made in former times, under democratic rule, showed what they were made for. I proved by authority that will not be controverted that twenty-seven first-class ships were produced by those expenditures during the administration of Mr. Buchanan, and that now more than double that expenditure produces no ship.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] answers by saying that money does not produce now anything like what it did then. If a given amount of money does not pay for as much now as it did before the war, why is it? The answer is obvious. It is because gentlemen on the other side have taken occasion, in order to enrich the men of the eastern sea-board, to protect what they call their "industries," to put tariffs and taxation upon all the products of the people of the country, and upon all their consumption, robbing all the people west of the Alleghany Mountains and south of the Potomac, to enrich a few men in New England and Pennsylvania. For no other purpose than this everything has been made to cost more than double what it ought to. Gentlemen on the other side have themselves to blame for these high prices and for this most unfortunate condition of things.

In 1860 foreign nations were paying us $25,000,000 as the balance in our favor in the carrying trade of the world, while to-day we are paying them $65,000,000, which goes from us forever to build up the strength of foreign nations. Why is this? Because you have taxed everything that constitutes a ship, everything that constitutes a railroad, everything that enters into commerce, in order to enrich a few monopolists along the eastern sea-board. That is the reason you are paying the present prices for everything.

Twenty millions ought to produce something; and we have given that amount every year to the Navy. Let the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] tell his people in the next canvass that Congress has given to the Navy Department over $20,000,000 a year, raised by taxation on the products of labor, for the last four years, while not a new ship has been produced; and let him explain what an immense sum $20,000,000 is. A short time ago I asked the Director of the Mint, "Why do you not coin silver, which you can get at a discount for greenbacks, at the rate of $3,000,000 a month, so that we can have silver for change instead of fractional currency?" "Sir," replied he, "do you know that a million of dollars of silver weighs thirty tons, and that it is no easy thing to handle ninety tons of silver in a month, and make it into ten cents, quarters, and half-dollars?" Let me tell the gentleman from Maine, what he might not think prudent to tell his people, that during every year for three years we have been giving the Navy Department $20,000,000—or, in plainer terms, six hundred tons of silver coin; so that if you should load wagons with a ton of silver each, and allow twenty yards to be occupied by each wagon, they could not drive through the gentleman's district in single line in a procession seven miles long. Let such a procession drive through the gentleman's district, in view of his constituents, so they could realize the facts; and let him tell the people that all this went into the Navy every year, and that for such expenditures we have nothing to show; nothing but navy-yards and their civil establishments; nothing but voters; nothing but rotten hulks; and there will be a democrat in his place in the next Congress to a certainty. [Laughter.]

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Mr. Chairman, I have listened attentively through these days of debate, and I am very unwilling to occupy the time of the committee. As one member of the Committee on Appropriations, I do not feel sensitive under these criticisms; I do not feel called upon to reply to anything that has been said in criticism of this bill. As a member of the Appropriation Committee, I can say that we have worked faithfully to reduce the appropriations in this bill to the amount as reported, $16,000,000.

I think the Navy can be run now on this. For one member of the Committee on Appropriations, I would under no circumstances report a bill which would call for a deficiency. Looking to what has been done before by special appropriation under an emergency, fully justified by the facts of the case, I have thought and believed the Secretary of the Navy can run the Department creditably, unless some emergency like war occurs, upon the sum we have appropriated.

We do not object to fair criticism. I have not felt like replying to any fair criticism of the bill. Some gentleman began by saying the bill reported was so small—this was said by gentlemen on the other side—that the expenses could not be paid, and a deficiency would be called for. They are mistaken. There will be no deficiency.

But, Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] goes outside of a just criticism of this bill and talks about Mr. Buchanan's administration and about finance and tariff, it seems to me that he indulges in a line of debate not to be justified. Will the administration of Mr. Buchanan, which ran the country into debt in a time of peace—will that administration compare favorably with any administration since that time? Do we forget that in a time of peace it ran this country into debt and had to borrow money, and when at its expiration difficulty did occur we had no ships, not a single vessel, within reach to look after and follow up the vessels of the Southern Confederacy, so that the burden was then thrown upon Mr. Lincoln's administration to provide the first vessel which could be of any efficient service, and the few vessels we had were put by Buchanan's administration beyond the reach of our Government? The amounts expended under Mr. Buchanan's administration for the Navy were larger, taking into account the expense of building a ship, than they have been under the last four years of this administration, and one-third larger than is proposed in this bill.

The gentleman talks about the tariff, and tells us that some of those articles which are taxed go into the construction of vessels and increase the expense. Did the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] ever refuse to vote for a tariff upon hemp, a product of his State, which also enters into the finishing of our vessels?

Mr. BECK. I never voted for it.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The gentleman must have been a singular member from Kentucky, for all his colleagues repeatedly voted for the imposition of duty upon imported hemp.

Mr. BECK. I tried to get every other thing down to where they put hemp, but could not do it.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. He says he has tried to put other things down; but his colleagues, as everybody in the House knows, tried to keep hemp up. The gentlemen, too, on the other side of the House have spoken on the subject of currency here. Are they above criticism? Why only yesterday two-thirds of the members on that side of the House voted to increase the volume of currency. They voted for inflation. Is he to talk to us about high prices and inflated currency when two-thirds of his colleagues on that side voted for inflation? Consistency is a jewel; and when the gentleman parades Mr. Buchanan's administration, which was the most inefficient we ever had, and the most expensive, considering its weakness, going out of office, as it did, after having run the nation into debt in a time of peace, I must be allowed to say he has brought forward a very poor apology for the comparisons he has chosen to make.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I intended to keep out of this debate, but the extraordinary remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] attributing the increase of prices since 1860 to the tariff, attracted my attention, and call for a response. When I proposed the other day to pay the loan of 1858 instead of exchanging bonds, I did but propose to liquidate a debt contracted by the democratic administration whose glory the gentleman lauded so sonorously.

With what nation were we at war when the democratic party in 1858 saddled us with twenty millions of a gold loan, which we are just trying to renew, and which, according to the gentleman's theory that we are unable to pay it, must remain a debt, and in consequence of which when we shall have paid twenty millions of simple interest on it, compounded to nearly double the sum, we will still owe the whole twenty millions of dollars in gold, which that democratic administration saddled us with in his lauded period of commercial grandeur? With what nation or with whom were we at war in 1858? We were at war, sir, simply with the adherents of free trade and hard money. It was free trade that rooted out our manufactures, and thus closed the American markets upon the sea-board against the productions of the country west of the Alleghanies. It was hard money which enslaved the producing classes of the United States to the bullion and credit mongers of England and the continent. Sir, the gentleman's favorite theories of free trade and hard money were the only enemies with which we were at war. They it was who bankrupted the people and the Government. Then, sir, we had the democratic party of the South and their maritime ally, the British government, to sweep our commerce from the ocean. We were, as the gentleman said, carrying a large part of the trade of the world. But the tariff did not affect this; it was, as I have said, the democratic party of the South and their British ally who broke up our carrying trade and swept our commerce from the sea.

Under the benign influence of protection and paper money we are rebuilding our commercial marine so rapidly that it does not require one to be skilled in mathematics—for a poor arithmetician may do it—to compute and predict with certainty the day when American trade, international trade I mean, will exceed that of Great Britain. That is shown in our greater annual increase than hers in each of the last five years. Our ratio of increase is steadily and strikingly in excess of hers. For proof of this I refer to the official figures representing the annual exports and imports of both nations.

And I tell the gentleman that to-day the most prosperous and growing industry in our country is that of iron-ship building, and that if he and our old enemies will leave us alone and not, under the cry of "specie basis and hard money," contract our currency, and by free trade close up our ship-yards and workshops, we will help the South and West develop their fields, and carry all their surplus productions in American bottoms and under the American flag to all the countries of the world.

Mr. HALE, of Maine, rose.

Mr. BECK. Allow me to answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania this once, and I will speak no more to-day. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I am glad that the gentleman should have that opportunity. I wanted to answer the gentleman from Kentucky on one point, but he may have others, and I yield to him now, intending to follow him.

Mr. BECK. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. STARKWEATHER] I know does not intend to do any injustice to anybody. He is greatly mistaken when he announces that ships of the United States in 1860 were put out of the way in order to deprive the United States of their use in the anticipated war with the South. Mr. CRAGIN, of New Hampshire, who is himself a republican, and chairman of the Naval Committee in the Senate, I suppose would not tell a falsehood. He states, in the speech from which I read when I had the floor before:

> It has frequently been stated, and I have myself repeated the remark, that Secretary Toucey, at the breaking out of the rebellion, sent the ships of the United States into foreign seas, in order that they might not be used against the rebellion. I have stated that myself, fully believing it was true; but the investigation I have made during the consideration of this bill has convinced me that I was wrong in that statement. I find no evidence whatever to justify it. I find that Secretary Toucey was a faithful Secretary of the Navy so far as caring for the interest of that service was concerned, and at the breaking out of the rebellion there were probably as many naval vessels of war in the ports of the United States as there are to-day, and if we should to-day be called upon to furnish vessels of war, as we were in 1861, I apprehend that we should be even in a worse condition than we were then.

Mr. CRAGIN in that speech lauds Secretary Toucey as an effective man, and shows that we had more ships then than we have now, with more guns and in far better order.

I desire to say one word more in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.] The debt of the United States of $20,000,000, created in 1858, of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania speaks, was incurred because of the Mormon war, as I am advised.

Mr. KELLEY. It was incurred in 1858, in a time of profound peace.

Mr. BECK. The gentleman from Pennsylvania wanted to force us to pay that twenty millions in gold on the 1st day of last January. He wanted to deny the Secretary of the Treasury the power of converting it into 5 per cent. bonds, as we are seeking to do with all the balance of our debt. Why, sir, his position must be on account of his protective theory. He wanted to pay that debt in gold in order to run the United States more in debt, so that higher tariffs could be laid and more protection demanded. And why, sir, did that gentleman, and men like him, insist upon free tea, free coffee, and the abolition of internal taxes? In order to pile up mountain-high the tariffs that were robbing the people of the whole country, and especially of the producing regions, and putting ten dollars into the pockets of the men he represents for every dollar that went into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. KELLEY. Are internal taxes a luxury which you cherish? [Laughter.]

Mr. BECK. If the gentleman had better politics he would be better-tempered.

Mr. KELLEY. I am angry only at your having disturbed my nap. I would have been asleep but for the sound of the word "Pennsylvania" reaching me in the gentleman's sweet voice.

Mr. BECK. I have no doubt the gentleman is ready to sleep whenever the truth is told, if he can. If there is any man who has been instrumental in keeping up the tax on articles of prime necessity, especially pig-iron, when there is no necessity for it, the gentleman from Pennsylvania is that man. Why should we protect it, when it is worth fifty dollars per ton, and can be made in Tennessee for nineteen dollars, and in Missouri for twenty-one dollars? If there is any resistance to the honest efforts of men who want to keep the country from being plundered by monopolists, the gentleman from Pennsylvania is sure to be the head and front of it.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Well now, Mr. Chairman, having had public buildings lugged into this bill, we have now the tariff and pig-iron; and I begin to think that a better place for this bill in my charge, so far as comfort goes, instead of being at the beginning, would be at the tail end of the heap, so that this torrent of objection might be expended on other bills. But, sir, here it is, and I desire that we shall go through with is as fast as possible.

There is one argument which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has used which is unworthy of him, and this is the argument of locality—the attempt to set one part of the country against another upon this bill. Why, sir, he says that all the naval appropriation bills are for the benefit of gentlemen of fortune, or otherwise, upon the coast of New England and Pennsylvania; and that the laboring men of the West are robbed to keep up the Navy. Well, sir, God made the sea-coast here to be protected, and in protecting it the West is as much protected as the East. The gentleman might as well claim that because nearly all the appropriations for the Army go to keep up the establishments on the western frontiers, and to protect them from the incursions of the savages, and to expend in Indian wars, these appropriations are for the benefit of those localities alone, and the East should grumble. He might as well complain that all the magnificent appropriations of public lands that have been made for railroads on the western line of our civilization were for those localities alone, and that the East is not interested in them. Sir, the gentleman's argument is fallacious; it is unworthy of him. He is fond of going back to the days of Mr. Buchanan—the last democratic administration. What was the condition then, sir? Did the East alone feel then, or the West alone feel, the abandonment under which the Executive and the administration left the country? Now, he or his subordinates sent those ships abroad, so that when the rebellion came we had no navy to protect our coast or to protect our harbors. Did the gentleman less feel the war than we did at the East? Was not his western blood aroused as much as that of any eastern man when the rebel cruisers went in and out of our harbors and brought the munitions of war and sustaining life to the confederacy? Sir, it was a matter in which the whole country was interested; East and West arose alike in prompt rebuke of that administration, and rallied for the defense of the country. Sir, the gentleman should know that national establishments are kept up for the whole country, not for the East, not for the West. This is the first instance I have known on the floor of this House of an attempt being made to array one section against another. Why, sir, if you draw that line and begin to combat expenditures of the public treasure in this way, everything will be at a dead-lock.

I close by saying again that the argument was unworthy of the gentleman from Kentucky, and I hope I shall not hear him repeating it again. I now withdraw the amendment.

Mr. DAWES. I renew the amendment merely to state a matter of history in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] who has read from the speech of Senator CRAGIN, of New Hampshire, in which he says that it is altogether a mistake that the vessels of the Navy of the United States, before the rebellion, were abroad and out of our reach. Sir, the Senator from New Hampshire did not quite say that. He simply stated that Mr. Toucey did not put them there with the intention that they should be beyond the reach of the United States. If the gentleman will turn to the proceedings of the Congress of 1860 and 1861, he will find there a report on this subject, and in that he will find the statement of Mr. Toucey himself that at the time of the firing on Fort Sumter almost every vessel in the United States Navy was absent on foreign stations; and then he will be able to judge where in point of fact every one of them was. What the purpose of the Secretary of the Navy was in having them so located of course none of us know; but if my memory does not mislead me, the gentleman will find that every vessel of the United States Navy, excepting two, was in service beyond the reach of the Secretary of the Navy at that time, and one of those two vessels drew so much water that it could not enter Charleston Harbor, except at spring-tide, and the other was a supply-boat. Sir, that was the report made to Congress by the Secretary of the Navy himself; and, if I do not forget, that very Congress passed a resolution of censure on Mr. Toucey for that very disposition of the Navy. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I move to amend that clause by striking out in lines 26 and 27 the words "eighteen thousand five hundred and thirty-eight dollars and twenty cents," and to insert in lieu thereof, "twenty-one thousand two hundred and ninety-three dollars and forty cents."

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that it is a very difficult and ungracious thing for any member of this committee to move to increase any appropriation in this bill, but I desire to have the appropriation for the civil establishment of the Norfolk navy-yard raised to the same amount appropriated in the bill for other navy-yards, because at that yard there are as many men employed as at other yards, and from the very nature of the case so much work cannot be done for the Government at any other yard, especially at this season of the year, as at the Norfolk yard. I am aware that the reduction in the appropriations for the Norfolk yard recommended by the committee is, perhaps, pro rata equal to that of the other yards—a reduction of 40 per cent.; but that brings the navy-yard at Norfolk below any other yard in the country except that at Pensacola. Sir, the Norfolk yard is the only one of any importance in the South, and there is no reason at all why a smaller sum should be allowed for this purpose in that yard than in any other. I venture to say that the gentleman can give no reason except the fact that in previous bills a smaller appropriation was made for that yard than for others, for the reason that at that time the district and the State had no representation on this floor, and no one to protect their interests. Advantage was taken of this fact by gentlemen representing other yards, and this yard was plundered for the benefit of others. I ask, as a measure of justice, that this yard be placed in the same position as the other yards. I do but ask an expenditure as great as that at the other yards which are not doing as much work for the Government.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I can only say in reply that the reduction the committee made was on a level scale of 40 per cent., and if we begin increasing the appropriations for one navy-yard some gentleman will offer an amendment to increase the appropriations for another yard. Sir, I trust this committee will sustain the Committee on Appropriations in the reduction they have made in this appropriation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] if the Committee on Appropriations have considered the propriety of discontinuing several of these navy-yards.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. For one, I am in favor of two navy-yards on the Atlantic coast and one on the Pacific coast. But all the navy-yards at the present time exist under statute laws, and the Committee on Appropriations has no jurisdiction in that direction. If the Committee on Naval Affairs will report some such consolidation as that, I for one will give it my hearty support. But the gentleman must know, from his long experience here, that we cannot initiate that proceeding; because the other committee would at once say that we were encroaching upon their prerogatives, and our action would also be subject to a point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. That remark is undoubtedly correct. But it is unquestionably clear that if we are to have any reduction of the expenditures of the Navy Department we must reduce the number of our navy-yards. I think that two on the Atlantic coast are sufficient. I called the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. SCOFIELD] to the necessity of legislation in that direction.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I have been trying for a number of years to consolidate all the navy-yards at League Island, [laughter,] and having got a little start there, I was very much discouraged last winter when I found that gentlemen who had prompted me to aid in getting a navy-yard there were opposed to our building any ships in that yard, but sent them to private navy-yards to be constructed. I told them that after having tried to build a first-class stable, I thought it a little hard that the first horse we had should be sent to a livery stable for board.

Mr. HOLMAN. When gentlemen insist that the navy-yards on the Atlantic coast shall be reduced to two the gentleman who controls this House is allowing appropriations to be made for League Island navy-yard, with the certainty that we shall in consequence have another navy-yard on our hands.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The object is to remove the old navy-yard at Philadelphia to a new locality.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I am as much in favor of reducing the number of navy-yards in this country as is the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] I would like to have them reduced to two on the Atlantic coast, for if they were reduced to two, I am certain the navy-yard at Norfolk would be one, and if they were reduced to but one I am certain that Norfolk would be the one retained. Therefore in no instance would there be any loss to the Government, even if the reduction should take place, in keeping up the Norfolk navy-yard to a condition of efficiency.

Mr. RANDALL. Allow me to correct the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] when he states that League Island is to be an additional navy-yard. On the contrary, the establishment of the League Island navy-yard is simply a transfer, whereby the Government is likely to realize an enormous profit by the sale of the land vacated, while the land occupied is given to the Government.

Mr. MYERS. That transfer will probably be made at this session.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, to increase the appropriation for the civil establishment at Norfolk navy-yard from $18,538.20 to $21,293.40; and there were—ayes 25, noes 61; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. PLATT of Virginia and Mr. HALE of Maine were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 63, noes 84.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The following paragraph of the bill was read:

For civil establishment at the several naval hospitals and naval laboratory, $39,161.

Mr. ARCHER. I move to increase this appropriation to $50,000. I make this motion more to ask the gentleman who reported this bill whether or not there has been any report on this point from the medical officers of the Navy, as to whether there is sufficient appropriated here for the hospitals. The estimate was for $75,000.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The reduction that is made here is the same only that is made in the other civil establishments at the navy-yards. There were no reports from any of the Bureaus in favor of the reduction of 40 per cent. that the Committee of the Whole has just sanctioned. If the Committee on Appropriations had waited for that, there would never have been any reduction. So, in the same way, there is no recommendation from the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery in favor of this reduction. In looking over the items of the old bill, and this coming in the class of civil-service clerks, employés, &c., the committee thought these hospitals should be cut down like the other Bureaus of the service.

Mr. ARCHER. I am satisfied that the Committee on Appropriations are in error with regard to these hospitals. The civil force of these hospitals does not consist in its clerical force. The civil employés of these hospitals are the hospital nurses. There is no probability of any reduction in the number of the sick in the hospitals along the sea-board of the Atlantic. On the contrary, it is likely that there will be a large increase in the number of patients on account of the exigencies of the service requiring the naval force to be kept in the malarious regions of Key West and elsewhere.

Happening to be in the Navy Department this morning, I saw in the office of the Surgeon-General of the Navy a letter from a New York hospital, speaking of the provisions for the sick in that hospital. It stated that in that hospital there were accommodations for only twelve small-pox patients; that they now had nine of such patients, and that they were coming in almost every day. The provision there for those afflicted with small-pox, is in a small out-building, without gas-light, without proper furniture, and improvised for the time being only.

The Government ought more particularly to be liberal to the hospitals, because they are sustained almost entirely—perhaps I go too far when I say almost entirely—but they are largely supported by contributions of twenty cents per month from every officer and every seaman in the service.

The Government adds only a small amount to this contribution which is thus made up by monthly deductions from the pay of every officer and enlisted man in the Navy. I am satisfied that the Committee on Appropriations have erred from want of sufficient information on this subject. I give them credit for all diligence in seeking to reduce the civil establishment in our navy-yards and the other branches of the Navy. In this respect I think they have done exactly what they ought to have done in every single item except in regard to these hospitals, for which I ask the small allowance of $11,000 in addition to the appropriation proposed by the committee. I am satisfied that even with this addition, the appropriation will be insufficient.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the manner in which this appropriation is reported. There are existing at present eight naval hospitals. I believe that the number of these hospitals, like the number of our navy-yards, is greater than necessary. Perhaps these hospitals should be reduced, not to three, but to half their present number.

In each navy-yard are such employés as the following:

One purveyor, at $1,000; one chief cook, at $540; one cook, at $480; four baymen and four washers, at $480 each; one watchman and two laborers, at $360 each; two mess-room attendants, at $216 each; one engineer, at $1,000; one fireman, at $500.

These are for Mare Island; at other establishments the employés are more numerous. Now, I do not believe all these are needed.

But the appropriation for naval hospitals has all been lumped together. It amounted to $65,268. Now, instead of taking each hospital and appropriating to each 60 per cent. of the former appropriations, I aggregated the whole, took 60 per cent. of that, (thereby saving $26,000,) and provided for appropriating it altogether. What is the result? The appropriation is made flexible. If the Department believes that a particular hospital can be run with hardly any attendants, it can put its force into other hospitals where it may be more necessary. Thus this is a measure within the law in the direction of economy. If we pass the appropriation in this form, the Secretary of the Navy, if he believes that the hospital at Pensacola, or Boston, or Mare Island can be run with an apothecary, a purveyor, and a single attendant, can make such a reduction of force. But in the aggregate there will be, under the plan we propose, a saving of nearly $30,000; and I sincerely believe that under this arrangement the Secretary of the Navy can run these hospitals better than they are run now.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment of Mr. ARCHER, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase of copper, iron, wood, and other materials necessary for the manufacture of torpedoes, and for work on the same, $25,000.

Mr. COX. I move, pro forma, to amend by striking out the last word of the clause just read. I propose to submit some remarks, but I will yield for a motion that the committee rise, if any gentlemen wishes to make that motion.

Mr. STORM. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I hope that motion will not be pressed now. I intend to make the motion myself very soon. Let us run on until half-past four o'clock. I think we may make some progress with the bill.

Mr. STORM. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, several weeks ago I happened to state in a debate on this floor that the city of New York was vulnerable to attack from any foreign power having the extraordinary iron-clads which some of the European nations have. When I made that statement, my friend from Maryland [Mr. SWANN] got up and questioned it, remarking that he had information from men connected with the Navy Department, engineers and others, showing the incorrectness of my position. I simply wish, Mr. Chairman, to reaffirm what I said, and to support it by reading from an editorial in the Army and Navy Journal of December 20, 1873:

It is not very probable that the Thunderer and Devastation will steam into our harbor before the year is out and exact tribute from New York, but it is possible, and, as things now are, they could do it.

* * * * * * *

Before steam was introduced as a naval motor, before armor was applied to war vessels, our sea-coast forts at New York, Boston, Charleston, and other points were no doubt fully adequate to destroy a hostile fleet that should attempt to pass them in order to capture the cities they were built to defend. Of their kind they were excellent, but within the last decade the whole system of such defenses has been revolutionized, and forts which once were fairly impregnable are to-day of scarcely more account for defense than pasteboard boxes. No one who has the slightest knowledge of the great changes which have occurred in naval warfare can now hold the opinion that our forts are equal to the defense of our cities. To be of avail against the latest naval constructions, they must be assisted by floating defenses and systems of submarine attack. If the outbreak of war should find us without these indispensable adjuncts to land defenses, we might forget our maxims of economy in the presence of actual peril to our great cities. What have we to offer, except an untried and still doubtful torpedo system, to prevent a foreign iron-clad fleet from entering, for example, the harbor of New York? It is substantially nothing; and if the capital and business of the city were aware of the fact they would tremble for their security.

Mr. Chairman, you know and we all know how utterly futile was the attempt, with merely guns and forts, to prevent Admiral Farragut from going up the Mississippi or from entering Mobile Bay. There has been a revolution on this subject of naval defense; and I submit that there is no possible protection for our large cities on the coast except it be from a refined system of torpedoes. As I understand, we have not these torpedoes now in our harbors. I hope we shall have them. I believe they may possibly protect our large cities.

The gentleman from Maryland, in replying to me upon this subject, rather intimated that it was indelicate, or unpatriotic, or something of that sort, for a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to throw out in the American Congress such a statement as I had made; that it was in effect an invitation to hostile fleets to enter our harbors.

Sir, I tell my honorable friend that every nation of any consequence, with which we are likely to be at war, has a perfect chart or map of the harbors of our principal cities. Those nations know our strength and our weakness.

Mr. Chairman, though torpedoes have been known for more than a century, it is but comparatively of recent date that they have been put to actual use.

Since the Crimean war, more especially, the attention of the maritime powers has been directed toward the development of a complete system of submarine warfare. During the late rebellion in this country great use was made of torpedoes by both Federals and confederates. Many vessels were destroyed by them; in fact not one of the Federal vessels was destroyed by guns, while between twenty and thirty were destroyed by torpedoes. The rebel ram Albemarle was blown up by a torpedo in charge of Lieutenant Cushing. That gallant officer has since stated that he could have compassed her destruction in no other way. During the late Franco-Prussian war the Prussians kept the formidable fleet of the French at bay by the exclusive use of submerged mines.

While our Government has relied upon monitors for coast and harbor defense, it is probable that a perfected torpedo system must supersede them altogether, for the reason, while the monitor does not prevent the actual entrance of the enemy's vessel into the harbor, but is simply one vessel pitted against another, the torpedo effectually stops any entrance whatever. Again, monitors cost large sums to construct, and are perishable; torpedoes cost but a very trifling amount, and can be made and fixed in a very short time.

With a system of fixed mines and movable torpedo-boats, such as has been devised in this country within the past few years, any harbor can be most effectually fortified upon a few days' notice. As I understand it, our principal cities have not yet been thus fortified.

Assuming a war between this country and England, the latter approaching our coast with fifty iron-clads and as many or more wooden ships, what have we at the present time to cope with them? Nothing of any account but our land fortifications. Farragut demonstrated at Fort Saint Philip and at Mobile but too well their inability to damage even wooden ships, to say nothing about iron-clads. We have no iron-clad fleet sufficient to cope with second-rate powers.

While it is desirable for certain purposes to build iron-clads, we should have at our command a perfected system of submarine defense, capable of destroying the most formidable fleets. I made a statement the other day that the city of New York was at the mercy of foreign powers, especially such a power as has such vessels as the Devastation and Thunderer. My statement was questioned; perhaps it was not discreet, even if true; but, sir, it is but just to myself to say, that many accomplished engineers have vindicated my statement. The Army and Navy Journal confirms it. There is as yet no torpedo system adopted which can answer the purpose. It is time we should make use of this submarine system in its most advanced and successful results. The cost is comparatively small; the implements, once made, can be kept intact for years without any expense; they can be ready at any moment for actual service.

I shall not be niggard, as a Representative from New York City, where so much is at stake and where the peril is so great in case of war, in voting liberally to make the Navy strong. I would add to its strength by the building of wooden or iron ships, made after the latest models, especially for speed, carrying heavy guns and such torpedoes as are adapted to naval warfare. In the event of an aggressive war, these same vessels can be more readily utilized in transporting and operating torpedoes than cumbersome iron-clads.

Mr. SWANN obtained the floor.

Mr. CROOKE. Allow me to say one word on a personal matter. Although a very new member, Mr. Chairman, at the beginning of the session I expressed my astonishment at the statement made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Cox,] that the harbor of New York was at the mercy of the Spanish navy. I expressed my astonishment then; I am still more astonished now, to find the member from New York backing up that statement by something which he read very indistinctly from some scientific journal. I did not hear it, and therefore cannot answer it; but I state here, now in the presence of this House and in the presence of the whole world, that the Spaniards had not a powerful iron-clad ship in all their navy which could have crossed the bar at New York. You will find in documents before the House that every iron-clad in the Spanish navy draws thirty-four feet and over of water, and that no ship can carry over twenty-eight feet over the New York bar, and it cannot carry twenty-six feet of water after it gets over the bar.

Mr. ARCHER. Then it was the strength or weight of the Spanish navy which would have given safety to New York, and that is the only defense we have.

Mr. CROOKE. I stated that New York was perfectly safe. I believe she was safe otherwise; but in order to meet these remarks on the defenseless condition of New York it may as well be known that there is not a European iron-clad ship of war of any force in the world which can cross New York bar. I call the attention of the House to the fact that only three or four years ago, when the remains of Mr. Peabody were sent over here, the iron-clad Monarch could not cross the New York bar, but had to lie off and send the remains on shore in a tug.

While I did not hear the remarks of the gentleman, or the extract read by the gentleman, I wish to say that I know something about New York Harbor, and that I do know something about the defenses of New York City. I know that New York was perfectly defended outside of the fact that nothing could get in there to attack her, and that was defense enough. The Spanish iron-clad Arapiles, which was there in the navy-yard during all our recent unpleasantness with Spain, had to leave part of her armament behind her in Cuba in order to enable her to cross the bar, because she never could have crossed New York bar with her full war armament. In order to get her down to twenty-six feet draught she had to leave a part of her heavy metal behind, to get in at all. I will conclude by saying that there is not a Eupopean iron-clad, with full armament on board, which does not draw more than thirty feet of water.

Mr. KELLEY. And I wish to state a fact in verification of what the gentleman from New York has said; that when the Cathedral was unable to get into the port of New York they sent her round and discharged her cargo at Philadelphia, which cargo was sent by rail to New York City. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. COX. One word in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.] In the first place, I beg to say that the State of New Jersey has been encroaching upon our harbor, narrowing the channel toward New York. Furthermore, our harbor has been filling up with the refuse of the city, with ashes and what not; and a bill is now pending to clean out our channel, which will be done, as I believe, on the report of the Committee on Commerce.

Now, in the next place, the only dependence which my colleague from New York [Mr. CROOKE] believes New York City has against foreign ingression is in the shallowness of the channel. Now does he not know that may be obviated either by enlarging the channel or deepening the channel? May not our city, and his city also, be imperiled by an iron-clad or foreign vessel of war which draws less water than he has stated? He has said that he did not hear my remarks. Now I did not limit my remarks to the Spanish navy. The Army and Navy Journal, from which I quoted, said that the Devastation and Thunderer, those large English iron-clads, can enter New York Harbor. I know my friend from Maryland [Mr. SWANN] said the other day that even if they did enter it they could not get out again. If they got in there they would do their part of destruction upon that city whether they got out or not. It is not the part of wisdom, Mr. Chairman, for us to conceal the fact that we are more or less at the mercy of other powers who have more or less increased their naval strength by the skill which has been brought to bear recently in the construction of naval vessels.

I speak of this not for the purpose of derogating from the Navy. The Navy may do its whole duty, and perhaps has done its whole duty in this respect. I understand that experiments are going on with a view to making its torpedoes appropriate to river defense, as they were in the Franco-Prussian war, against invasion. I only call attention to it for the purpose of warning this House that the city of New York, to which two-thirds of our commerce on which we depend for revenue goes for outland and inland transportation, might at any time be at the mercy of the British power, when we have a cause of war with that power.

Mr. CROOKE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. CROOKE. I desire to say just a word about a personal matter, if the committee will allow me. There is as much water on New York bar to-day as ever there has been since the river was first discovered by Henry Hudson. The obstructions of New York Harbor are above the bar. There never has been a time when at low tide a ship drawing over twenty feet could not go over New York bar.

Mr. COX. The board of pilots do not say so.

Mr. CROOKE. I know as much about that as the pilots do. And the commercial representative of New York should know that the obstructions are not on the bar at Sandy Hook. It is five or six miles above that encroachments have been made, and there are only twenty-four or twenty-five feet of water at high tide, so that the large merchantmen scrape the bottom as they go out. But there is as much water to-day in New York Harbor as there was two hundred years ago, and the commercial representative of New York ought to know these facts. I do know them. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE, of Maine. This discussion to-day has had fearful and wonderful complications. I do not know what might come next. So I move that the committee rise.

Mr. COX. Pending that motion, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The motion that the committee rise was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. E. H. ROBERTS reported that the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1013) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

WEST VIRGINIA CONTESTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Elections. The Committee on Elections have instructed me to report the following resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Mr. Davis, claiming to have been elected a Representative in the Forty-third Congress from the first congressional district of West Virginia, was not duly elected and is not entitled to a seat in this House.

Resolved, That Mr. Hagens, claiming to have been elected a Representative in the Forty-third Congress from the second congressional district of West Virginia, was not duly elected and is not entitled to a seat in this House.

Resolved, That Mr. Wilson, claiming to have been elected a Representative in the Forty-third Congress from the first congressional district of West Virginia, was elected upon the day lawfully prescribed for the election of Representatives in Congress in the State of West Virginia, and is hereby admitted to a seat in this House.

Resolved, That Mr. Martin, claiming to have been elected a Representative in the Forty-third Congress from the second congressional district of West Virginia, was elected upon the day lawfully prescribed for the election of Representatives in Congress in the State of West Virginia, and is hereby admitted to a seat in this House.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I present a minority report, and ask to have it printed with the report of the majority.

Mr. SPEER. Concurring in the conclusions of the report submitted by the chairman, which I have signed, I submit on behalf of three members of the committee their reasons for holding the elections held in October to be valid.

The SPEAKER. When does the chairman of the Committee on Elections propose to call up the report?

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I propose to call it up at an early day.

The SPEAKER. These papers, the report from the committee, the minority report, and the reasons presented by the three gentlemen represented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, will be printed and laid on the table; and the chairman of the Committee on Elections intimates that he will call them up at an early day.

SALARIES.

Mr. SPEER. Having been detained at my home in Pennsylvania yesterday, I was not here when the vote on the salary bill was taken. If I had been here I would have voted "ay," trusting to the future to correct the mileage abuse.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following conferees on the bill (H. R. No. 795) making an appropriation to pay the salaries of the Official Reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House of Representatives: Mr. GARFIELD of Ohio, Mr. DONNAN of Iowa, and Mr. HOLMAN of Indiana.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. COBURN, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw papers on the application of Alma D. Brooks, widow of G. Brooks, for a pension, that they may be filed in the Senate.

On motion of Mr. TYNER, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House papers relating to the claim of Samuel S. Potter, considered by the Committee on Claims of the Forty-second Congress.

Mr. RANDALL. Cannot that be done under the rules?

The SPEAKER. It is done by unanimous consent.

The Chair finds among the papers sent to his desk this morning one to which he desires to call the attention of the House: "The gentleman from New York, Mr. DUELL, asks leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers relating to the claim of James Byers and others, there being no adverse report in the case," and he appends to it a certificate from the file clerk that there has been no adverse report in the case. The Chair thinks that is a valuable improvement, and that gentlemen in asking for the withdrawal of papers should present a certificate from the clerk in charge of such matters that no adverse report has been made; because the great objection is that after a claim has been adversely reported on an attempt is made to approach the Treasury by referring it to another committee.

Mr. BECK. I ask leave to withdraw from the files of the House, the papers in the case of the claim of the Louisville and Bardstown Turnpike Company against the Government, for the purpose of referring them in the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. Does that come under the rule?

The SPEAKER. No; the withdrawal can only be made by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. I shall object to anything that interferes with our rules.

The SPEAKER. These papers are to be referred to a committee of the Senate, and the Chair thinks there will be no objection to their withdrawal.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to have them referred in the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not object to that, but I think if we have rules we ought to live up to them.

Mr. TYNER. I desire to say that the motion I made for leave to withdraw the papers in the case of Samuel S. Potter was made with a view of having them referred in the Senate.

Mr. BECK. I withdraw my request.

The SPEAKER. Papers may be taken from the files of the House and referred to a committee of the House, under the rules, at the Clerk's desk; but in case a gentleman desires the absolute withdrawal of papers, the Chair suggests that he should go to the Clerk's office and get a certificate from the file clerk that no adverse report has been made in the case.

TEMPORARY LOANS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House of December 18, 1873, transmitting a statement of temporary loans authorized by the acts of February 25, March 17, and July 11, 1862, and of June 30, 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYÉS IN CLERK'S OFFICE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Clerk of the House of Representatives, transmitting, in compliance with the act of August 26, 1842, a statement containing the names of the clerks and other persons employed in his office; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. COX: The petition of Mrs. A. B. Walker and other women of Wyoming County, New York, for suffrage.

By Mr. DOBBINS: The memorial of D. H. Bates and others, of New Jersey, praying for an increase of pensions to disabled soldiers of the late war, &c.

By Mr. FIELD: The petition of Jane Hinsdale, of Detroit, Michigan, for compensation for services rendered during the war.

Also, a petition of citizens of Detroit, Michigan, for the application of the fund known as the "Chinese indemnity fund" to the education of the Chinese in the Pacific States.

By Mr. HUBBELL: The petition of A. Beers and 121 others, in favor of the improvement of Pine River Harbor, Charlevoix County, Michigan.

Also, the petition of William P. Naley, Justin Shapley, and 178 others, citizens of Keweenaw County, Michigan, asking for an appropriation to continue the improvements at Eagle Harbor, Lake Superior, Michigan.

By Mr. MAGINNIS: A petition in favor of the prepayment of postage by publishers of newspapers.

Also, a petition from the settlers on public lands in the Bitter Root Valley, Montana, in favor of an extension of the homestead act to their benefit.

By Mr. McDILL, of Wisconsin: A petition of soldiers of Wisconsin regiments, for equalization of bounties.

By Mr. O'BRIEN: The petition of Theresa Keibler, of Baltimore, for pension on account of the death of her son, Henry G. Keibler, while in the Army, in the Second Regiment Infantry, Maryland Volunteers; killed in engagement at White House, Virginia, in December, 1862.

Also, petition of sundry citizens of Baltimore, to have pension granted to Theresa Keibler.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The petition of Elizabeth Brannix, widow of Captain George H. Brannix, formerly of the United States volunteers, for relief.

By Mr. SCUDDER, of New York: The petition of E. J. Swayne and others, of New York City, asking the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the liquor traffic.

Also, the petition of William Irwin and many others, of Troy, New York, asking for like commission.

Also, the petition of Dr. O. S. Pine and others, of New York City, asking for like commission.

By Mr. SENER: Memorial of James R. Doughty, of Washington, District of Columbia, praying an allowance to compensate him for his services in the late war, and for his property lost and destroyed as the result of his loyalty.

By Mr. THORNBURGH: The petition of the trustees of the Mossy Creek Baptist church, East Tennessee, praying for relief.

By Mr. VANCE: The petition of sundry citizens of Mitchell County, North Carolina, for the establishment of a post-route from Mica post-office to Cranberry post-office, in the county of Mitchell, State of North Carolina.

By Mr. WALLACE: The petition of the president and faculty of Wafford College, Spartanburgh, South Carolina, for the early payment of the Southern Methodist publishing house, Nashville.

By Mr. WARD, of Illinois: The petition of Mrs. Eveline Dunn, for a pension.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts: The petition of Abraham Lansing, of Cambridgeport, Massachusetts, for an increase of pension.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

The following bill was introduced under the rule, and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads:

By Mr. VANCE: A bill to provide for establishing a post-route from Mica post-office, Mitchell County, North Carolina, to Cranberry, North Carolina.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 15, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 854) relating to circuit and district courts of the United States, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a petition from citizens of Michigan, soldiers in the late war and members of the First Regiment of Michigan Cavalry, praying that justice may be done to them in the matter of their services to the country; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the petition of Henry L. Lochlin and 147 other citizens of Dorchester, Massachusetts, and the petition of Isaac F. Sawtell and 58 other citizens of New Bedford, Massachusetts, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I also present a petition of the New England Shoe and Leather Association, in favor of the extension of the post-office grounds and buildings in the city of Boston. I wish to say that this memorial is from an association composed of merchants whose dealings amount to $250,000,000 a year. I move its reference to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL presented the petition of George S. Hollister, late a captain in the Seventh Regiment of Infantry, United States Army, praying Congress to consider the justice and propriety of passing a law to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1871, and for other purposes," approved July 15, 1870, so far as it relates to section 12 of the act, which honorably mustered him out of the service, he being a supernumerary officer, and that a court of inquiry be established with a view of reinstating him in the service; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Charles E. Farrand, late a captain in the Twentieth Regiment of Infantry, United States Army, praying that the twelfth section of the Army appropriation act approved July 15, 1870, be so amended as to create a court of inquiry with a view of reinstating him in the service again, from which he was honorably mustered out by that section; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FENTON presented the petition of the Methodist Episcopal church of Little Neck, Queens County, New York, signed by the pastor, Rev. Stephen Baker, and other officers of the church; the petition of the First-day school of the Society of Friends of New York City, signed by its superintendent and teachers; the petition of the Harmony Lodge of Good Templars of New York City, and the petition of the Second Baptist church of Williamsburgh, New York, signed by the pastor, Rev. J. N. Folwell, and other officers of the church, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. President, I desire also to present a petition forwarded to me by Miss Susan B. Anthony, president of the National Woman Suffrage Association, now in session in this city. The petition is signed by several ladies of Western New York, and is in relation to the enfranchisement of women and their right to equal suffrage. I ask that this petition be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such petitions have usually been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FENTON. I am requested in the communication from Miss Anthony to ask its reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That reference will be made.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM presented the petition of Philip Bacon and other citizens of Simsbury, Connecticut, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petitions of pastors of eight churches of Portland, Maine, and a large number of other citizens, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SARGENT. I present the petition of Lydia S. Sharp and 95 other United States citizens, praying for the equal protection of women to vote with colored men; the petition of Elizabeth Wright and 155 other women, for national protection of their citizen's right to vote; the petition of Mary Bloomer and 85 others, for the national protection of woman's right to vote in the several States; the petition of Emily R. Barker and other citizens of the United States, asking for women equal protection with colored men in the exercise of their right to vote; the petition of Lydia Ann Alburger and others, asking for women equal protection with colored men in the exercise of their citizen's right to vote; the petition of Lydia B. Jones and others, asking for women equal protection with colored men in the exercise of their right to vote; the petition of George O. Morgan and others, for the equal protection of women with colored men in the exercise of their right to vote; and the petition of James H. Blake and other citizens, asking for women equal protection with colored men in the exercise of their right to vote. I move the reference of these petitions to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER presented the petition of Asa Faulkner, of Tennessee, praying compensation for the value of a cotton factory and materials destroyed by military order; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. INGALLS. I present the petition of Leonora S. Van Brunt and other citizens of Kansas, asking for women equal protection with colored men in the exercise of their right to vote; the petition of Mrs. Hannah Allen and 180 citizens of the State of Kansas; the petition of Hannah Hiatt and others, of Kansas; and the petition of Mrs. Ann H. Winans and other citizens of Kansas, asking for women equal rights with colored men in the exercise of their right to vote. I move the reference of these petitions to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CROZIER presented the petition of Louisa H. Griffin and others, of Kansas, asking for women equal protection with colored men in the exercise of their right to vote; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of Canady O'Brien, late of Company K, Third Infantry, praying for an increase of pension for services rendered in the Mexican war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DENNIS presented the petition of Martha E. Burgess, Mary J. Cristy, and other citizens of Baltimore, Maryland, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LOGAN presented a petition of certain soldiers of the late war, residing in Montgomery County, Illinois, in regard to pay and bounty; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Euphemia Martin and 42 other citizens of Illinois; the petition of Susan Evans and other citizens of Illinois; the petition of Mrs. Kimball Labaugh and 40 other citizens of Chicago, Illinois; the petition of Mrs. Fannie S. Edgar, and the petition of Martha H. Walsh and others of Illinois, asking for women equal protection with colored men in the exercise of their right to vote; which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also presented the petition of George Townsend, praying for a pension for services rendered in the war of 1812, he having served fifty-eight days, or within two days of the time required by law; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented two petitions of T. J. Tillery and a large number of other citizens of Danville, Illinois; the petition of J. W. Bullock, John Wright, and others, citizens of Young America, Illinois, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SCOTT presented the petition of the monthly meeting of the religious Society of Friends, of Kennett, Chester County, Pennsylvania, signed by the clerks, Thomas F. Seal and Martha M. Tussy; the petition of the First Presbyterian church of Allegheny, Pennsylvania, Rev. E. E. Swift, pastor; the petition of the Second Presbyterian church of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, Rev. W. D. Howard, pastor; the petition of the Third Presbyterian church, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, T. A. Noble, D. D., pastor; the petition of the Second Presbyterian church of Allegheny, Pennsylvania, representing 270 members; and the petition of the Central Presbyterian congregation, numbering 900, (350 communicants,) Rev. William H. Gill, pastor, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, presented the petition of members of the Sons of Temperance and other citizens of Baltimore, Maryland, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of George R. Murphy, praying indemnity for spoliations committed by the French prior to the year 1801; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SCHURZ. I hold in my hand a paper, which is not exactly a petition addressed to the Senate of the United States, but a petition addressed by the officers of the camp at south end of Tule Lake, California, to the President of the United States concerning Acting Assistant Surgeon B. Seming, who enlisted in the United States Army as a private, went through the Modoc campaign, and was dangerously wounded. The officers of that command wish to have him promoted to the rank of assistant surgeon. The Secretary of War communicated these papers to me with a view to have them submitted to the Senate and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, so that the Committee on Military Affairs may take such action as it pleases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers will be received and so referred if there be no objection.

Mr. HOWE presented the petition of Robert D. Brown, J. W. Weston, and other citizens of La Crosse, Wisconsin, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, presented the petition of R. T. Nash and many other citizens of Winooski, Vermont, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. OGLESBY presented the petition of B. N. Wiles and other citizens of Macomb, Illinois, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut, presented the petition of Rev. Rodney L. Tabor and others, of Hartland, (west parish,) Connecticut, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORTON presented the petition of the Oakland Lodge of Good Templars, of Oakland, Indiana, signed by its officers, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented the petition of M. W. Ladd and other citizens of Woodstock, Vermont, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of Rev. Charles E. McCaslin and other citizens of Greentown, Stark County, Ohio, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. FENTON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Annie E. Page be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. FENTON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of the Mercantile Insurance Company, of New York City, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. BUCKINGHAM, it was Ordered, That the petition of Miss Harriet DeWitt Mitchell, daughter of General O. M. Mitchell, for an increase of pension, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. INGALLS, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Thomas H. Yeatman be taken from teh files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. INGALLS, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of E. A. Coleman be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. INGALLS, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Charles P. Redmond be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. INGALLS, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Elkanah Huddleson be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will inquire whether there has been any adverse report in any of these cases?

Mr. INGALLS. I am informed by the party who requested me to have these orders made that there has been no adverse report in any of these cases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there has been an adverse report in any of these cases the Secretary will not deliver the papers until copies are retained.

On motion of Mr. LOGAN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Sebastian Reichart be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion of Mr. LOGAN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of John M. Scott and others be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the petition of a large number of citizens of Peoria, Illinois, praying for a uniform rate of compensation for letter-carriers at $1,000 per annum, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of W. W. Elliott, formerly in the Twenty-second Illinois Infantry, praying compensation for extra services as acting assistant surgeon United States Army, reported a bill (S. No. 310) for the relief of W. W. Elliott; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (S. No. 311) for the relief of Joseph Montanari, and for other purposes; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. KELLY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 149) for the relief of certain settlers on the Fort Randall military reservation, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 193, for the benefit of Uriah Porter, which was reported favorably by the Committee on Finance when I was out of the Senate. It is a local bill, relating entirely to a citizen of Kentucky. The Committee on Finance have reported it favorably, and I ask the Senate now to take it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the bill at this time.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no objection if the Senator will allow me to introduce a bill for reference; and I have a resolution, also, which I should like to present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is in the nature of an objection.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have a report to make.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive the report.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Daniel Ivens, M. D., late hospital-steward Thirty-sixth Regiment Iowa Infantry, praying compensation for services rendered as assistant surgeon between October 4, 1862, and August 26, 1865, reported adversely thereon; and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 254) to donate the military reservation at Fort Steilacoom to the Territory of Washington for the use of the insane asylum, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MERRIMON, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Minnesota, praying for a repeal of the law providing for the registration of letters, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. WADLEIGH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 110) for the relief of the East Tennessee University, reported it without amendment.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the petition of Lizzie M. Mitchell, widow of Captain John Mitchell, Forty-third United States Infantry, praying for a pension; the petition of Samuel Spaulding, of Michigan, praying to be allowed a pension; and the petition of Mary D. Loud, mother of Joseph R. Newman, late private of marines, praying for a pension, reported adversely thereon, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petitions.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 854) relating to circuit and district courts of the United States was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INDIAN WAR IN DAKOTA.

Mr. KELLY. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 29) to authorize the Secretary of War to ascertain the amount of expense incurred by the territorial authorities of Dakota for arms, equipments, military stores, supplies, and all other expenses of the volunteer forces of the Indian war of 1862, to report it back with an amendment and recommend its passage. This bill passed the House at the last session, and is now reported by the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate; and as it makes no appropriation of money, but simply requires the Secretary of War to ascertain the amount of expense incurred by the territorial authorities of Dakota for supplying arms, &c., I ask that it be put on its passage at this time.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which requires the Secretary of War to ascertain, or cause to be ascertained, the amount of expense necessarily incurred by the territorial authorities of Dakota for arms, equipments, military stores, supplies, and all expenses of the volunteer forces called out to suppress Indian hostilities in the Territory of Dakota in the year 1862, and report to Congress at the next session the names of the persons entitled to relief, together with a statement of the facts and sums upon which such report may be based.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs was to strike out in line 10 the words "at the next session," so as to read, "and report to Congress the names of the persons entitled to relief," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 312) to establish an assay office at Helena, in the Territory of Montana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COOPER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 313) to confirm the purchase by the executive department of three acres of land, more or less, in the vicinity of Nashville, Tennessee, known as the site of Fort Houston, and to donate and convey the same to the Fisk University for educational purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 314) for the relief of the heirs at law of Mathieu Alexis de Rochefermois; which was read twice by its title, and referred, with papers on file, to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Attorney-General, communicating, in obedience to a Senate resolution of February 24, 1873, information in relation to the expenses of proceedings in bankruptcy in United States courts; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

GRAIN-SACKS.

Mr. SARGENT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the propriety of providing under proper guards for the return, duty free, of grain-sacks which are of American manufacture, or which have been imported into the United States and duty paid thereon, and subsequently used in the shipment of grain to foreign countries.

RAILING IN THE SENATE CHAMBER.

Mr. WRIGHT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire into the propriety of removing the railing back of the seats of Senators in this Chamber.

POSTAL SERVICE ON NON-PAYING ROUTES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law that postal service on mail-routes where the aggregate receipts shall not amount to one-fourth of the expenditures in any one year, shall thereafter be discontinued; and to report thereon at an early day.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 202) to remove the legal and political disabilities of William Steele, of Bexar County, Texas, without amendment.

The message also announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 795) making an appropriation to pay the salaries of the Official Reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. JAMES A. GARFIELD, of Ohio, Mr. WILLIAM G. DONNAN, of Iowa, and Mr. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN, of Indiana.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the bill (H. R. No. 793) repealing the increase of salaries of members of Congress and other officers; and it was thereupon signed by the President of the Senate pro tempore.

YELLOW FEVER EPIDEMIC.

Mr. FENTON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Whereas yellow fever has again prevailed during the past year as an epidemic of frightful severity in some of the cities and towns of the United States, paralyzing trade and commerce throughout large sections of the country by impeding travel and menacing neighboring communities; and whereas many cities, equally exposed with those which suffered most severely, escaped with slight mortality, indicating that certain conditions and measures may control or arrest the spread of the epidemic; and whereas the history of the disease tends to show that it is almost uniformly introduced into the United States by seamen already infected with the contagion, or arriving from ports where the disease exists; and whereas the United States marine-hospital service, through its medical officers at the ports where the epidemic prevailed, was enabled to become familiar with the course of the disease, the conditions favorable to its introduction and progress, and the measures which were successful in controlling or checking it: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, directed to instruct the supervising surgeon of the marine-hospital service to prepare, or cause to be prepared, from the reports and observations of the marine-hospital surgeons, and from other available sources, a brief and succinct history of the yellow fever epidemic of 1873, as it prevailed at the various ports of the United States, with especial reference to details of prevention and hygiene, and transmit the same to the Senate at the earliest day practicable.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate now resume the consideration of the post-route bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 798) to establish certain post-routes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this bill the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator will allow me I should like to offer an amendment to the bill, adding after "Ohio," in line 321, the words—

OREGON.

From Eugene City via Diamond Lake, Fort Klamath, Sprague's River, Drew's Valley, and Goose Lake, to Winnemuca, in the State of Nevada.

From Newport, Benton County, via Seal Rock on beach Pacific Ocean, mouth of Alsea River and Peake's Mill, to Alsea Valley.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PATTERSON. I offer an amendment on page 14, after line 316, to insert under the head of "South Carolina:"

From Rock Hill, York County, to Lancaster Court-house, Lancaster County; also, from Chester, Chester County, to Lancaster Court-house, in Lancaster County.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reference to counties will be omitted if there be no objection.

Mr. PATTERSON. Very well.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether he approves of the amendment?

Mr. RAMSEY. It has not been formally considered by the committee. The practice has always been to take the suggestions of members of the Senate and members of the House of Representatives. The Senator from Maine, in what he said yesterday, created the impression that this bill was gotten up either by the committee itself, without any suggestion from members who knew the wants of the locality in which they live, or by the Post-Office Department. It is a bill gotten up just as he suggested it should be gotten up, on the representation of Senators who know the wants of the communities they represent and upon the representation of members of the House of Representatives. This, as I understand it, has been the practice of Congress from the very beginning of the Government. There is no possibility of scrutinizing either the distance of the respective routes proposed or the absolute wants in all these cases. These matters are referred to the Post-Office Department subsequently, without the consent of which not one cent is spent upon any one of these routes. They have a topographer, they have other officers, and they have communication and correspondence through their deputies all over the United States, and they ascertain, after the lines are authorized, whether the business of the country will justify the expense which service on them would involve. Unless service is placed upon a route, there is no expense growing out of it at all.

The Senator asked me yesterday to tell him off-hand what number of miles of service was provided for in this bill. For the reason I mentioned it is impossible for myself and for the committee to ascertain that. If the Senate desire that information, if it be at all important, the bill may be referred to the Post-Office Department, so that its topographer may ascertain the distances covered by the proposed routes.

The Senator asked me what was the length of the mail routes in the United States. I told him off-hand that I thought it was two hundred and fifty thousand miles. I told him that that matter was fully gone into by the Postmaster-General in his annual reports.

Mr. President, there are but six or seven States of this Union where the receipts pay the postal expenditures within their respective States; and I would say to the Senator from Maine, that Maine is not one of those States; and to my friend from Vermont, who is interested in this bill by rigidly scrutinizing its details, that his State is not one of those that pay the expenditures of the Post-Office Department within the boundaries of the State. But, Mr. President, suppose neither State does, it has never been the practice of the Government to expect, at least, that the Post-Office Department should bear its own expenditures. Probably in the States that pay least in that regard the greatest service is rendered by postal facilities. The correspondence from the State of Maine that passes over the large State, territorially, of Minnesota, for instance, is as valuable to the people of Maine as it is to the people of Minnesota; so with the correspondence that passes through the State of Illinois, the State of Missouri, and so on.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If the Senator will allow me, in relation to Vermont, I will say that the State itself pays for all its accommodations, and very much more; but it is compelled to carry the large mail, commencing at the end of the State, from New York across into Canada by Lake Champlain, and also by the Connecticut River. The immense cost there is mainly for the transportation of these large mails for the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. RAMSEY. Then I would suggest to the honorable Senator to cut off that mail entirely, and that, then, will make his State a contributing State to the treasury of the Post-Office Department. And so to the gentlemen who desire to curtail the expenditures for transportation, I suggest simply that they cut off the remote States of the Union, where the expenditures are larger than in other States. There was a period in the work of the Post-Office Department within the last twenty years when there was a surplus of revenue, but that was when the Southern States were entirely cut off. Now, I suggest to these gentlemen if they entirely cut off the States in the valley of the Mississippi from all postal facilities, then the Post-Office Department in the East would pay for itself. But can they, can the trade and commerce of the Eastern States, afford that? Is not the correspondence from Maine carried in the West and South just as profitable to the State of Maine as the correspondence carried within its own borders?

But, sir, after all, is the expense of the Post-Office Department increasing in any extraordinary degree? Why, Mr. President, it is just in one regular proportion from year to year. Just as the population of the country has increased, in about that proportion the expenditures of the Post-Office have increased.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. RAMSEY. Certainly.

Mr. SARGENT. The increase of the population of the country is about 9 per cent. annually; and if the gentleman is correct in his figures in regard to this bill, that it authorizes about five thousand miles more of additional routes, as the whole number is two hundred and fifty thousand miles, the increase in this bill to keep up with the population of the country ought to be about twenty-two thousand five hundred, whereas it is only about one-fourth that sum.

Mr. RAMSEY. I do not know that I am precisely accurate in fixing the amount at five thousand miles.

Mr. SARGENT. Well, it strengthens the Senator's argument. The increase of expenditure is not as great as the increase of population.

Mr. RAMSEY. The expenses of the Department for 1837 were $3,000,000; they are now $29,000,000. The population has increased in about the same proportion, and the business of the country has increased in the same proportion.

Again, you can reduce the expenditures of the Post-Office Department by not enacting continuously, as you do, that every kind of transportation shall be carried by the most rapid and expeditious service the country can afford. You ask not only that the letters which pass from one portion of the country to another shall be carried by the fastest possible service in the United States, but also that your newspapers shall and that your miscellaneous matter shall be carried in that way. Cut that off, tell the Postmaster-General to send simply the letters by the very fastest lines, the lightning lines of the country, and if you want to reduce the expense to the lowest cent, direct him to send the newspapers and the miscellaneous matter by slower lines. Instruct him to do that, and you will reduce the cost of transportation. These expenditures have grown up under instructions of your own in your own statutes, and in no other way.

Probably no Department of the Government is so economically administered as the Post-Office Department; and if it is subjected to extraordinary expenditures it is because of your own legislation. The honorable Senator from Maine says it has got to be an express company. Mr. President, you cannot carry a parcel in the mails over twelve ounces in weight.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Unless it belongs to the Post-Office Department.

Mr. RAMSEY. That is simply transmitting its own documents and papers. There is this exception, that by an amendment that you introduced here—and which became a law at the last session—in favor of the transmission through the mails of seeds, bulbs, and plants, they may be sent to the extent of four pounds in one package. In the countries of Europe, the post-office department, at least in Germany, does the general express business of the country. I do not know that that branch of it is unprofitable to the government.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota says——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine is entitled to the floor if he claims it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am willing to give way.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. A single word. I do not rise to attack the Post-Office Department at all. I am only desirous that that Department shall have an opportunity with all other Departments to economize to a reasonable extent. The Senator from Minnesota represents that the increase of the expenditures of that Department is caused solely by the legislation of Congress. I agree with him, for Senators will bear witness that any kind of a postal route may be established in any bill that is presented here. There is no objection on the part of the committee to any application for a further extension of mail-routes, and when once established Senators and Representatives go to the Postmaster-General and say to him, "Congress has ordered this; you have no discretion about it; you must establish service upon this route, because Congress has established it."

The Senator claims that these postal routes have only increased with the population of the country. Have not our revenues increased with the population of the country? He seems to utterly ignore the fact that the revenues of the Post-Office Department have also increased. Why, sir, up to 1850 the Post-Office Department was a self-supporting Department. We increased in population from 1830 to 1850 more rapidly than we have done since; and yet it was then made a self-supporting establishment. It was represented by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads last year that if we would abolish the franking privilege we should reduce the expenses of the Department. Instead of that, what are the facts? We have a larger deficiency than we have ever had before. The Department has become more expensive than it has ever been before in any year of the Government. I only call attention to this fact so that if there be any proper remedy it may be applied. I do not desire to apply any remedy that will be unjust to any portion of the country, whether it is to the frontier States or the older settled States; but I desire that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads shall diligently inquire as to whether there is any remedy for this vast increase in the cost of conducting the Post-Office Department.

Mr. RAMSEY. Will the Senator from Maine allow me one word on this point?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly; with great pleasure.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senator from Maine says, and the Senator from Vermont repeats, that notwithstanding our promises that with the abolition of the franking privilege there would be greater economy and saving in the expenditures of the Post-Office Department, they have increased. Other Senators have said that also. They ought to consider that the Post-Office Department has not had time enough yet to work up that system.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How much time do you want?

Mr. RAMSEY. The abolition of the franking privilege only commenced on the 1st day of July last. The whole country was then under contract for the transmission of the mails. Contracts were in existence in all the various sections of the country. The Post-Office Department divides the country into four sections, and every four years one of those sections is let. Not one of them has been let since the abolition of the franking privilege has been in force.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask the Senator whether there are not some companies who carry by weight?

Mr. RAMSEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has any change been made in the contracts with them?

Mr. RAMSEY. You cannot make a daily change. The contracts are for a long period. Congress passed an enactment that required the reweighing of the mail in the month of October last; and those returns must be ascertained before new contracts can be entered into.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I understand that the reform of the franking privilege, like the repeal of the President's salary that was proposed, has not begun yet, and it will not be likely to do so for some time to come.

Mr. RAMSEY. It has begun, but its effects are not yet seen. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I was called up unexpectedly yesterday, and said all that I intended and much more when I was up. I was called up simply from the answer of the honorable Senator from Minnesota to an inquiry of mine in regard to the bill before the Senate. My honorable friend had the candor or simplicity to say that there was no legislation in the bill, and that led me to remark upon the whole character of the legislation in regard to these bills; and my honorable friend comes in here this morning with most admirable freshness and seems to corroborate the whole of it. He says the amendments offered here he has never seen and knows nothing about, and has not the slightest idea what they add to the service, but he says this legislation is so much a matter of course that he takes it for granted that they are all right. When anybody proposes an amendment to the service, no matter exactly what, whether he has the slightest idea what it is or not, it is taken as a matter of course.

Mr. President, I do not rise in the spirit of invidious criticism to anybody; but does not that honorable Senator know that the spirit of retrenchment is abroad in the land? Does he not know that everybody who is charged with any branch of the public service which requires or justifies, or in which there is the slightest possibility to retrench, is expected to do something in regard to it?

Having been assigned by the kindness of the Senate to a position which requires me to look into that matter, my attention has been attracted to this branch of the public service, and I take occasion to repeat now what I said yesterday, that it is increasing with such magnificent proportions, in spite of all the endeavors of the honorable Senator to restore it to its pristine purity by lopping off the excrescence of the franking privilege, that this year, although the honorable Senator seems to think the expenditures are to be but about twenty-nine millions, they are to be thirty-six millions. The Senator knows that, doubtless. And looking around for the balance against the Treasury this year, I find that we are to be called upon for a balance out of the Treasury of the United States to make good the difference between the receipts and the expenditures of the postal service for the year ending June 30, 1875, of $7,000,000. Is that such an event in the progress of development in this branch of the public service as that we are at liberty to regard it with indifference? And am I to be told that I am here assailing a branch of the public service when I make this suggestion?

I rose in no spirit of invidious criticism, but to remark the general fact; and I stated yesterday, and I will be more accurate this morning, that since 1865 this service has more than doubled. Is that keeping pace with the population? Has the population of this country more than doubled, if that is your basis? Of course it has not. What, then, is the justification of this extension of the public service? I am not speaking as to the mails. I do not think that is the difficulty. We have ingrafted upon this service incongruities which are burdening it.

Mr. RAMSEY. If the Senator will allow me a word I will say this: I know he does not want to be unfair. Since 1866 the Senator says the expenditures of the Post-Office Department have increased more largely than the population. He knows why. Prior to 1866 we were discharged from carrying the mail throughout all the Southern States; that has been thrown upon us since. Then the Senator from Vermont said that in 1850 the Post-Office Department was self-supporting. He knows that at that time we had just obtained all the country on the Pacific coast, and that immense region and the intermediate spaces had to be served by the Post-Office Department.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That does not affect my remark at all. Prior to 1866 the service was very much below what it was in 1866. In 1866 the mails were running everywhere in the southern country. Does not the honorable Senator know that fact? Does he not know that the service had been reorganized? Now, in 1873, the cost of the service is $29,000,000 in round numbers; in 1866 it was $15,000,000. It has grown up in this way to these gigantic proportions. Why? I am not going to stop to analyze that. I know why, and at the appropriate time when the appropriations for this service are before the Senate, I intend to tell the Senate why, and I think the Committee on Appropriations will not be disagreed as to the direction in which we can go without crippling this service at all; I mean in what belongs to the postal service legitimately. Without crippling that at all, giving all the facilities for the circulation of that intelligence which the honorable Senator emphasizes this morning; giving full play to that and full circulation to that, I think it will not be difficult to find that we can reduce the cost of the service by lopping off excrescences, striking out from the mail—which loads it down and incumbers it and embarrasses the free circulation of intelligence—all that dead weight; not seeds and bulbs merely, but dry goods, anything you choose to put into the mails not exceeding four pounds, in any single package. Free it from the characteristics of an express.

Why, Mr. President, in 1872—the honorable Senator will correct me if I am wrong—he asked for a deficiency of little more than four millions, to make good the difference between the receipts and the expenditures. Now, for 1875, which we are to appropriate for at this session, we are to have about seven millions, or a little short of that; my friend on my left [Mr. SARGENT] will know—a little short of seven millions. The exact amount is $6,811,363. Can my honorable friend account for that? Does his theory of the increase of population account for that? Of course it does not. Does my honorable friend know that that great measure of reform which he urged upon Congress persistently, "in season," and I will not say "out of season," but certainly with all the ability of which he is master—the abolition of the franking privilege—has had any effect?

It was said that the franking privilege was overbearing the public service; that these immense expenditures were attributable to that; that these balances which we were constantly being asked to vote out of the Treasury of the United States were attributable to that. Now we have come to a period when that great reform is in force, and what is the result? The result of it is that your deficiency is nearly doubled.

When I rose I had not the slightest intention of alluding to these facts, but to arrest the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to the fact that in the present condition of the public service it is not well for him to adopt the principle that these bills may be made up, as a matter of course, without inspection and without examination; because my belief is—that Senator will know better—that when a post-route is established it is an authority which, if it is not imperative upon the Postmaster-General, certainly is a very great embarrassment to him, because he will necessarily, it seems to me, adopt the logic of the Senator himself, and feel that it is his necessity to adopt whatever amendment a Senator proposes. That was the only object I had in the beginning.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, this is a question which I think is surrounded by very many embarrassments; but I am of opinion that there are some remedies which may be afforded.

It is true that the Postmaster-General feels called upon to put mail service upon all routes that are established by Congress. He can hardly feel able to discriminate and to act upon the information within his knowledge upon any other rule. If Congress deem it wise to create a post-route, he holds it to be his duty not to supervise their action, but to place mail service upon it. In the newer portions of the country there are mail-routes called for which undoubtedly can supply but a small proportion of the expense from the revenues that will be received. We cannot, therefore, limit ourselves by creating post-routes that shall be self-paying. It would be a great injustice to many sections of the country. Indeed, I think I know of routes, of miles in extent, where the intermediate offices between two very considerable commercial points would pay but a very small proportion of the expense of the route, but yet the communication between the larger points is necessary, and the communications to be furnished to these intermediate points, although they are not self-paying, are absolutely demanded. But it is equally true that there has been a looseness in the formation of these bills that is inexcusable; and though I am on the Post-Office Committee I stand here to say that.

Senator after Senator here yesterday offered an amendment, without telling us that he had any knowledge within himself, or that he had ever had any petition for such routes as he proposed. Well, it is very pleasant to create a route because it may please some friends. I hold that there should be a greater scrutiny in that committee as to the necessity of proposed routes, and to guard, to aid, and to protect the Post-Office Department from the enormous demands that are now made upon it. But we do not do it. I do not know, I have no knowledge, that every amendment offered here was not just, and proper, and called for; but I know how easy a thing it is for a Senator to do to propose amendments establishing routes which are really not needed.

Now, as a practical matter, as my colleague has seen fit to call the attention of the Senate to this subject, I am going to make a suggestion to my colleague, and he can adopt it or not as he sees fit. I do not know how much there is in it, but I think there is something. The Post-Office Department has its special agents, either in every State, or in every group of two, or I think at most three States. I think they are called special agents of the Department. They are paid for their time, and the Government has a right to the use of all their time. I think a section or a provision might be incorporated in this bill that no service shall be put upon any one of these routes until they shall have been investigated by the proper officer of that Department and his report made that the service is just and reasonable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine will suspend, the morning hour having expired. The Senate will resume the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am through.

THE CURRENCY—SPECIE PAYMENTS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, reported by Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance:

Resolved, That it is the duty of Congress during its present session to adopt definite measures to redeem the pledge made in the act approved March 18, 1869, entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," as follows: "And the United States also pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin;" and the Committee on Finance is directed to report to the Senate, at as early a day as practicable, such measures as will not only redeem this pledge of the public faith, but will also furnish a currency of uniform value, always redeemable in gold or its equivalent, and so adjusted as to meet the changing wants of trade and commerce.

The pending question being on the amendment submitted by Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, to strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert the following:

That the Committee on Finance is directed to report to the Senate, at as early a day as practicable, such measures as will restore commercial confidence and give stability and elasticity to the circulating medium through a moderate increase of currency.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I desire to ask the attention of the Senate for a short time in reply to some points made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] yesterday. The Senator from Missouri, without intending it, failed to state correctly the position that I had taken in the few remarks I submitted to the Senate some time ago; and not intending to go over that ground again, I will read a brief passage from my speech then:

The question first presented is whether it is the duty of Congress at this session to take definite measures for the redemption of the United States notes in coin, for that is the pledge given in the act of 1869. I agree that the faith of this Government is pledged to redeem what are called greenbacks in coin. I agree to that as fully and as strongly as anybody; and I further agree that we are to keep steadily in view what is called a return to specie payments; but the question is whether it is our duty at this session of Congress, at this time, in the present condition of the country, to look to and adopt such measures; and at this point I differ with the committee. There is a wrong time to do a right thing; and in my opinion this is not the time in which we should adopt definite measures to redeem these notes in coin, unless the time be put off so far that it will not increase the present embarrassment or intensify the effects of the panic upon the country.

That is all I have to say in restatement of my former position. The Senator from Missouri yesterday, in a very able and elaborate speech, described the misfortunes and evils arising to the country from what he calls an irredeemable currency; and from the account he gives of it it is the worst possible infliction that could fall upon this or any other country. I listened very carefully for some suggestion from the Senator as to how we were to return to specie payments immediately or within a short time. The Senator suggested no method except by contraction. He argued that the currency is redundant. He undertook to show the evils of a redundant currency, and the only method pointed out by which we could return to specie payments was by contraction. I beg leave to read a very compact statement of his position on that subject in the conclusion of his speech. He said:

When, under circumstances like ours, an irredeemable paper currency is constantly depreciated, at a discount as to coin, that depreciation proves that its volume is in excess of the real wants of the general business of the country. This being the case with our paper currency, the present crisis cannot have been caused by any insufficiency of that currency as to the real requirements of business.

The proposition of the Senator is that the redundancy of the currency is measured by its discount. The discount is 10 per cent., and according to his logic a reduction of the volume of the currency 10 per cent. would bring it to par. Now I do not believe that. I believe that to bring this currency to par you must resort to some other means than contraction. But the argument of the Senator is that by a reduction of the currency 10 per cent. you will bring it to par; that the redundancy is measured by the discount and the discount by the redundancy. The drift of the Senator's argument is in favor of a general reduction of the prices of labor and of property. He argues that if the purchasing power of a smaller sum of money is equal to that of a larger sum, nothing is lost. That argument was made once before, I believe, in the Senate of the United States, by a distinguished statesman who is now no more, and who said that it would be just as well to have wages ten cents a day, provided the purchasing power of ten cents was equal to what a dollar was then, as to have wages at a dollar a day, and I believe that he obtained by that remark the sobriquet of "Ten-cent Jimmy," and the sobriquet outlived him.

I do not agree to a reduction in the price of labor and of property, although the purchasing power of money may be increased. One of the greatest attractions of our country to the laboring population of Europe has been our high wages. We all know that. It has brought millions to our country, and the mere fact that you may increase the purchasing power of money is no argument in favor of putting the wages in this country upon a level with those in Europe. You may bring down the price of everything along with the price of labor, so that fifty cents a day will purchase as much property as a dollar a day in former times; but you do not bring down the volume of your debt. We owe two thousand millions. There is a large private indebtedness, equal in amount, on the part of corporations, to say nothing of the indebtedness on the part of individuals.

Mr. President, I am opposed to this whole doctrine of reducing the price of labor and the price of personal property to what it is in Europe. I know that it is the argument of standard writers that it will make no difference to us, everything else coming down in proportion; but if it were so, it ought to be done very gradually; it ought not to be done in one year or two years. It ought to be done very gently.

Mr. SCHURZ. Ought it to be done in three years?

Mr. MORTON. Our prices are now upon a certain scale. The Senator would bring them down to a lower scale, and he would do it all at once. He would descend from Erie to Ontario over Niagara.

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senator knows very well that I did not say that I wanted to do it all at once, but in the whole course of my remarks I said that the process ought to be gradual. The Senator speaks of one year or two years. Why, if I can see specie payments before me even at the end of three years I shall be perfectly satisfied, and I said that virtually yesterday.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator's speech, as I have read it this morning, makes the impression upon my mind that this change should be made very suddenly, but I will take the Senator's correction of that; and I wish to say that if it is made it ought to be made very gradually. The prudent sailor will descend from Erie to Lake Ontario by the way of the Welland Canal, locking down by easy gradations and going a long way around; but these bold admirals of finance scorn this roundabout way, and insist upon going over Niagara at once.

I wish to consider very briefly whether our currency is redundant, and I will satisfy myself with a single comparison upon that point. I will compare it with the currency of England. The Senator yesterday gave the currency of Great Britain—England, Ireland, and Scotland—at $591,425,000 of coin and paper. I think I can show by data in my possession that it is over $600,000,000. I will assume for round numbers that it is $600,000,000. He only makes it $9,000,000 less than that.

England has 32,000,000 people; a very compact population, in a territory not much larger altogether than twice the State of New York. We have 41,000,000 people, scattered over this continent from the Gulf to the frozen regions of the north and from the Atlantic to the Pacific. By the way, I would remark that $600,000,000 of currency to 32,000,000 people in England upon the same ratio would give $768,000,000 of currency upon a specie basis to 41,000,000 population, about what we now have, being within a few millions of our currency as it now stands.

I remarked to the Senator yesterday that the currency of England was greater per capita, all things considered, than our currency is now, which he says is redundant; and I think I can demonstrate that beyond all question. In the first place, speaking of bank-credits, which take the place of money to a very large extent, they are much more numerous in England than they are in this country. There is hardly a man in England who lives five miles from a bank, public or private. Every man there can keep his account in a bank. A much larger proportion of the people of England live in cities, towns, and villages than in this country. Those who live in the country there are almost in sight of public or private banks; so that there is a much larger business done in the way of checks and bank-credits than in this country.

Mr. SCHURZ. If the Senator will permit me, I do not wish to say anything in regard to the argument he is just pursuing, but merely to put in a remark to set him right as to the drift of my remarks yesterday.

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. SCHURZ. My language was this:

> In the first place, a wise resumption policy will not force the transition from a depreciated paper to a specie basis all of a sudden, but approach the result to be reached with gradual steps, extending over a sufficient space of time. To this statement I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts, who thought he had anticipated me. I do not know a single advocate of specie payments who proposes anything else.

I have just told the Senator what I understand by a sufficient space of time. I am not in a very great hurry, provided I know that at a certain period we shall reach a certain result. Whether that be two or three years is indifferent to me; at least it is almost indifferent to me, if I only know that certain results will appear at the end of a certain period. That was the whole drift of my remarks.

Mr. FENTON. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me one word?

Mr. MORTON. It breaks the thread of my argument.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLAYTON in the chair.) Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. MORTON. I always yield with pleasure.

Mr. FENTON. Concurring fully with the general views so ably expressed by the honorable Senator from Missouri yesterday, I desire not to be misunderstood by the Senator from Indiana or others upon the point which has just been raised. I read from my remarks upon the resolution now before the Senate, made a few days since:

> I must not be understood as advocating rapid withdrawal of the currency, but rather that the time should be fixed not far off to commence. It should be gradual. The well-argued plan of my colleague [Mr. MORRILL] upon the Committee on Finance may do. The process may even extend through several years. My argument is to the end that we should begin some time; and when we begin, firmly and regularly proceed; so that all can see and know that in the course of years we shall reach solid ground again. Let us at least cut loose forever from this uncertain and varying course which has marked the conduct of Government for some time past, and conspicuously during the last few months.

Mr. MORTON. I will remark, in reference to the Senator from New York, that I listened to his speech with pleasure. The remedy that he presented, the means of returning to specie payments, is like that offered by the Senator from Missouri—contraction of the currency. It is well for the country to understand now that the proposition is that we shall return to specie payments by the contraction of the currency, while the great body of the people in the Northwest, and I have no doubt in the South, believe that the currency is not sufficient—that we need more money; and I had the assurance of the other Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] only last week in a strong argument made by him to show that the volume of the currency was too small. While this is the opinion, in my judgment, of an overwhelming majority of the people of the West and South, we are urged to return to specie payments by a contraction of the currency, aggravating vastly the evils under which the country is now suffering.

But I was making a comparison between this country and England. I was stating that the facilities for doing business through banks by means of checks and in the absence of money was far greater in England than in this country. Now, how is it in this country? Take the whole West: the people there, the most of them, live far from banks. They cannot resort to them every day. They are compelled to do their business with money. The farmers when they receive payment for their wheat and for their pork receive it in money and carry it home with them. The business between farmers is carried on with money, because they have not the facility for bank credits. Therefore, with the same population and anything like the same amount of business, there is a far greater need for currency in the United States than there is in England.

Mr. SCHURZ. If the Senator will permit me, he knows just as well as I do that a great deal of the business done by farmers is done by means of book credits at stores, where they carry their grain, sell it, buy there their necessaries, and finally settle their accounts in some way.

Mr. MORTON. I know there is some of it done in that way, but that is comparatively small.

Mr. SCHURZ. Most of it is done so.

Mr. MORTON. The amount is comparatively small. I think I understand the way in which business is done in the country in the West as well as my friend does; I think my opportunities of knowing have been as good; and I say that the actual necessity for money in the States of the West and of the South is a hundred times greater than it is among people who live in towns where there are banks, or who live in the immediate vicinity of towns.

Mr. SCOTT. With the permission of the Senator from Indiana, as bearing on this question, without desiring to enter into the argument, I wish to state what was the business of the clearing-house of London for the year ending April 30, 1872, on the amount of currency which was stated by the Senator from Missouri yesterday—about six hundred millions, I believe. The business of the clearing-house of London for the year ending April 30, 1872, was £5,359,722,000, and for the year preceding, £4,018,464,000.

Mr. MORTON. That is a very important statement. The general proposition that I make cannot be answered by my friend from Missouri, that the facilities for bank-credits per capita in England are infinitely greater than they are in this country, and therefore there is correspondingly more need for money in this country than there is in England; and yet England has six hundred millions of currency to thirty-two millions of people, while we have got something over eight hundred millions of currency, including the fractional currency, to forty-one millions of people.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator at this point if the broadness of our territory, requiring more time to make the exchanges from the interior to the sea-board, does not largely enter into the element of the volume of the currency and require a larger amount to transact a like amount of business than it does in Europe in a more compact territory?

Mr. MORTON. The Senator's statement is self-evidently correct. I need not enlarge upon it.

I desire to come to another important question. If the price of labor is 50 per cent. less in England than it is in this country it takes a smaller amount of currency to pay for it. If the price of personal property generally, of dry goods, of those things that are to be used by families, is 50 per cent. less on the average than it is in this country, a smaller amount of money will do the purchasing. And yet in England, with her currency of six hundred millions, the average price of labor is 84 per cent. less than it is in this country, and the price of dry goods and of those things that supply families, leaving out the price of wheat and flour, is in about the same ratio. When we take all these things into consideration it will appear that England has a larger currency than we have; that our currency is not redundant; on the contrary, that it is too small if there be anything in these comparisons.

Now, you take the currency of France as it was before the war. I have a statement here which I will not take, time to read, showing that the currency of France before the Germanic war—I think perhaps in 1868—was about eight hundred millions in coin and two hundred and fifty millions in paper.

Mr. SHERMAN. Seven hundred millions in coin.

Mr. MORTON. Seven hundred millions in coin. The currency of France was larger than our currency is to-day by two hundred millions; and France is comparatively a small country, though it is larger than England, and the price of labor is much less in France than it is here—even less, I believe, than it is in England.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to correct now, while the Senator is upon this point, the statement I see in the debate made yesterday by my friend from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.] It is true that France, before the Germanic war, had $700,000,000 of currency distributed among the people.

Mr. MORTON. Of coin.

Mr. SHERMAN. Gold and silver—mostly silver. He stated also that now it had the same gold in circulation, and $300,000,000 of paper money. It has about $700,000,000 of paper money—that is 3,500,000,000 francs; but it has very little silver and gold. Nearly all the specie in France has gone to Germany to pay the expenses of the war and the large, enormous levy put upon France by the German government.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. If the Senator will allow me I will call his attention to the fact that the premium on the currency in France is but one-half of 1 per cent. It seems to me that controverts the position taken by the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall endeavor to show in a day or two that we can learn a great deal from France. France maintains now, at or about the par of gold, $700,000,000 of paper money; and if we do precisely what France is doing to-day, give to our paper money the qualities that are conferred by law in France, we shall do what I propose to do at least toward the resumption of specie payments.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Will the Senator state what that is?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will do so when I come to argue the question.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I have generally one satisfaction when I make a speech here; and it is, that although I make a very poor one myself, a number of very good ones are injected into it, so that it is valuable in that respect if in no other. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, I wish to come to another point. The Senator from Missouri yesterday went on to show the bad effects of an irredeemable currency—of a redundant currency, as he called it—producing speculation, as if it was the peculiar effect of an irredeemable currency like ours to produce mad speculation. I simply desire to say, in reply to that, that the greatest periods of speculation in England have been upon a coin currency and paper redeemable in coin. We have never had such speculation in stocks in this country as they had in England during the period when they built their railroads, and when their currency was coin, or paper redeemable in coin. And now Germany is suffering from just such speculation. It has run mad there for a year in real estate, and especially in stocks of every kind, and has brought great distress upon the country, not by means of irredeemable paper, but by means of gold, because $800,000,000 or $1,000,000,000 of gold from France have been poured into the lap of Germany. The assertion, therefore, that this speculation is a peculiar result of an irredeemable currency is not borne out by the facts. It belongs to an access of currency or to an excess of enterprise, and not to the character of the money that is employed. It has occurred just as often in countries where the currency is specie, or where it is paper redeemable in coin, as in countries where the paper is irredeemable.

The Senator talks about the evils of this currency and the suffering it has brought upon the country. Let me say to him that the greatest period of prosperity this country has ever known has been the period of irredeemable paper—not that I want to continue irredeemable paper, but the fact stands right out, and cannot be overlooked, that we have flourished under irredeemable paper as we never did before. That may be all wrong. I suppose the Senator will argue that it is. The old doctors, you know, argued that it was better for a man to die secundum artem than to be cured by a remedy that was not acknowledged by the faculty. It may be all wrong for this country to have flourished under this irredeemable currency as it has, but the great fact is that it has flourished.

I have some data here, taken from the last census, to which I will call the attention of the Senate, as showing what has been the progress of our country in the last ten years, notwithstanding the war. Since the 1st of January, 1865, we have built 32,000 miles of railroad. The whole number of miles now is 67,104, and 32,000 have been built since the 1st of January, 1865. I have heard Senators say that we are suffering because of railroads being built where they were not wanted, where they were not needed. I do not know of any such railroad. There is not a Senator on this floor who will say that his State has got one railroad too many, one railroad that she is willing to give up. They are sometimes built in advance of being profitable. That is a loss to the men who build them, to the States or the counties that give them money; but railroads are the pioneers of growth and prosperity, and the country grows up to them rapidly; and nothing so builds up a country now as the construction of railroads. We have not one railroad too many; we need more than we have.

But I will go on. The number of manufacturing establishments in the United States of every kind in 1860 was 140,433; in 1870, 253,148; being an increase of 111,715 manufacturing establishments in those ten years. The number of hands employed in manufactures in 1860 was 1,311,246; in 1870, 2,053,966; being an increase of 742,750. The capital employed in manufactures—and this, perhaps, is a very imperfect computation, being too small in both cases—in 1860 was $1,009,855,715; in 1870, $2,118,208,769; being an increase of $1,108,353,054. The products of manufactures in 1860 amounted to $1,885,861,000; in 1870, $4,232,325,000; being an increase of $2,346,464,000. The real and personal property in the United States in 1860 was valued at $16,159,616,000; in 1870, $30,068,518,000; being an increase of nearly $14,000,000,000; and during eight years out of that ten we have had an irredeemable paper currency. It may have been very wrong, it may even have been wicked, for us to have grown so under the influence of this currency, but the great fact cannot be disputed.

Now, I should like to ask my friend from Missouri a question. I should like to ask him what four countries in Europe have made the greatest progress in material development and growth in the last ten years. I know he is familiar with the history of Europe.

Mr. SCHURZ. I must confess I have not got any statistics before me, and would not venture upon an answer to such a question without them. I want to have the correct figures.

Mr. MORTON. Has the Senator an opinion that he would be willing to give?

Mr. SCHURZ. I suppose the Senator from Indiana has made up an answer to that question before he asked it, and he might just as well state it himself.

Mr. MORTON. I wanted to have the Senator's opinion. I supposed he was familiar enough with the condition of Europe at least to give an impression on that subject. I understand that the four countries of Europe that have made the greatest progress in the last ten years are Austria, Russia, Germany, and Italy. Austria has made the greatest comparative progress in her internal improvement and growth, as I understand it, next to that of the United States. Russia comes next; Germany comes next; and then Italy. During this period the currency of Austria has been irredeemable, and at a discount of from 10 to 20 per cent.; the currency of Russia from 10 to 25 per cent.; the currency of Italy somewhere from 5 to 20 per cent., varying at different times. In defiance of the evils of an irredeemable currency, those three countries have flourished as they had not done before in any like period, perhaps, within a hundred years. Mr. President, there is a great difference between enough money and an excess. Fifteen hundred millions might be a great excess, but eight hundred and fifty millions might not be an excess.

The Senator made another statement yesterday, that by making money abundant you did not decrease the rate of interest.

Mr. SCHURZ. The statement I did make was this, that by an addition to an irredeemable currency already redundant, you did not lower the rate of interest. That was it.

Mr. MORTON. "By an addition to an irredeemable currency already redundant." Well, I will come at that with all those words put in. I had supposed that the law of supply and demand governed the rate of interest as it does the price of everything else. I had supposed that when money was plenty interest would be lower than when money was scarce. But according to the argument of the Senator the right way to make money cheap is to make it scarce and hard to get. I had supposed that when there was a large accumulation of money in the city of New York interest would be lower there—money would be a drug; but according to the logic of the Senator the way to make money cheap and reduce the rate of interest is to make it scarce—that is, to contract the volume of the currency. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] suggests that in the same way you may make horses cheap by decreasing the number of horses. If you want to make pork cheap, so that everybody can buy it, have a small pork crop. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, an abundance of money, plenty of money, does produce enterprise, prosperity, and progress. There is no sort of doubt about that. Now, I put aside all these old theories. My friend can bring from the books, as he has brought, authority that we ought to have absolute free trade. He can bring from the books authority in favor of the contraction of our currency to one-half of its present volume. I know he can do that. But after he has stated all these commonplaces of the books, these platitudes of finance, has given us the metaphysics of finance, there is no vitality in them. I prefer to take the actual results and the actual condition of the country, and let theory go to the dogs. There is no more vitality in these theories, as applied to the condition of our country now, than there is in the petrified snakes or the geological specimens upon the shelves of some venerable antiquary. Let us take things as we have seen them pass under our eyes for the last ten or fifteen years, and take the actual condition of the country.

The Senator did not venture quite upon the statement yesterday that our irredeemable currency had brought about the panic. He was entirely too familiar with financial history to say that; but he said that it had greatly aggravated the panic. I made an argument before the Senate, which stands unanswered, that this panic did not spring out of any defect of the currency. But the Senator says that the irredeemable character of the currency aggravated the panic. How? Did the currency depreciate when the panic began? Did it run down? Not at all. On the contrary it increased in value. How, then, did it aggravate the panic? How did it protract the panic?

Mr. SCHURZ. I am sure the Senator does not want to misstate me.

Mr. MORTON. Not at all.

Mr. SCHURZ. I did not say that the currency aggravated the panic, but that the currency aggravated many of the causes which brought about the panic. That is what I said.

Mr. MORTON. If there be any difference between the two propositions——

Mr. SCHURZ. There is certainly a difference between these two things, and I am sure the Senator sees it.

Mr. MORTON. I see behind all this argument, I see behind all this opposition to the national banking system, the shadow of the old State banking system looming up. The Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] some three or four weeks ago, in a speech in this body, declared himself unconditionally opposed to the national banking system and in favor of a return to the old State-bank system—no, I do not say the old State-bank system, but to a system of State banks; and I want to call the attention of the Senate, very briefly, to the argument that was offered by the Senator from Delaware in favor of a return to the system of State banks. He said:

I only wish to state my opposition to the further increase of the national-bank system. I wish to see another system restored—not too hastily, not by breaking away from the habits, the rights, the duties, and the obligations that have gradually grown up with the present system; but I desire to see a currency which is to be the localized currency; which will stay near the point of its issue by being discredited when it gets far from it. I desire to see some such currency restored for the benefit of the rural sections of this country—and not as now; when currency leaves the counter of the bank, it flows off in a rapid current to the money centers of the country, whence it is only to be returned by the payment of a premium.

I presume he was speaking for the backwoods of the Northwest—

I can say that the rural portions of the country have suffered enough by the old system of State banks. Then that paper had the precise quality that the Senator desires. He wants a paper that will stay at home because it is discredited when it goes abroad. That was the precise character of the old State banks. The notes of the State Bank of Indiana before the war, as good a bank as there was in the West, would not pay my hotel bill in the city of New York or the city of Washington. I must get eastern notes; I must provide myself with different money, just as if I was going to France or England; and every merchant that had a debt to pay in Boston, or in New York, or in Connecticut, was compelled to buy exchange at from 1½ to 5 and sometimes 10 per cent. That was a continual tax which was levied on all the western country. The Senator from Delaware desires that we should return to that currency—a currency that cannot go abroad because it is discredited. Now, sir, the national-bank notes you can put in your pocket in Saint Louis, and they will pay your hotel bills or your debt at Portland, in Maine—they are just as good in one place as another, being a national currency. But the Senator from Delaware wants a currency that will stay at home, because it is discredited when it gets out of the State where it is issued. I hope we shall never return to it, or anything like it.

My attention is called to the fact that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] yesterday declared himself in favor of the policy of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] I do not know whether that referred to the Senator's amendment proposed here or whether it referred to his general policy; but I do understand that our friends on the other side of the Chamber, the democratic party, with few exceptions, are opposed to the national banking system and are in favor of returning to a system of State banks. I must make the exception of my friend from Missouri, [Mr. BOGY,] who declared himself in favor of continuing the national banks. And now I want to compare the position of the distinguished Senators for a moment.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] comes and says that the State of Missouri is suffering from a scarcity of money—needs a larger volume of currency. He is opposed to anything like an immediate return to specie payments. He says that should be the work of time. The other Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] says we have too much money; we ought to contract the currency. Now, which of these two distinguished gentlemen represents the people of Missouri? I undertake to say that my friend on the left [Mr. BOGY] represents the great majority of them, unless it may be those who have money to lend and whose interest would be in having money scarce that the money they have already may be more profitable. Those who want to borrow money, those who are engaged in other business, are not in favor of the contraction of the currency.

As I said, Mr. President, that we shall have our currency redeemable in coin is the normal condition; but we must come to it gradually. If you come to it by a hot-bed process you must keep the bed hot all the time. When you have all our greenbacks at par by the hot-bed process they will not stay at par unless you continually employ the same means. If you bring them to par by the means suggested by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] by making them convertible into a 5 per cent. bond, we must always have the 5 per cent. bonds on hand to exchange for them. If you do it by accumulating gold, as proposed by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] although his plan has merits, perhaps, that have not been fully considered, you must always have the gold on hand, because if there be a day when the Treasury is not prepared to redeem then the premium on gold begins. You have not accomplished the work by simply bringing them to par for one day. The means resorted to for the purpose must be kept up all the time.

Mr. President, we are now suffering under the effects of a panic. I know that the times are getting easier. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] yesterday deplored the issue of any part of the forty-four million reserve, which I expressed myself in favor of, because the currency was already too redundant. I desire to repeat what I said before, that the disbursement of a part of the forty-four million reserve has greatly contributed to the relief of the country up to this time; it has given much relief; but still the effect of this panic is upon us. There are thousands upon thousands of men out of employment and crying for bread in every part of our country, and we are threatened with bread riots; for when there is starvation at the door you must not expect those who are in danger of starvation to be statesmen and to talk about theories and proprieties.

Sir, this contraction of the currency is to me filled with visions of disaster and ruin to our country. I would rather see the currency increased to a small amount. How is it? We have now $354,000,000 of national-bank notes. There is a great excess of the national-bank currency in the Eastern States. Massachusetts, with, I believe, something less than 1,300,000 population, has $57,000,000 of that banking capital; and Indiana, with over 1,700,000 people, has about $16,000,000 of it. There is a deficiency in many of the States of the West and of the South. Our friends in the East do not want more money. Let them bear in mind that they have immense advantages over us. It is a very great advantage to have a banking capital at home, and why? When Massachusetts lends out her $57,000,000 of national-bank notes they have to come back there in payment every sixty, ninety, or one hundred and twenty days. The money is constantly coming back, and the State is full of money. If she ever lends it to our people in Indiana they have the benefit of it at the time, but they have to pay interest on it, and at the end of sixty or ninety days the money goes back to Massachusetts. But if we had the banks at home, the money simply comes back to the banks in Indiana; and so in Illinois. That is the great advantage of having this banking capital in the different States. The report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1872 shows that it would take $44,000,000 of national banking capital to equalize the circulation between the different States. Are our friends from the East now opposed to giving us exact justice and putting us upon the same footing with themselves? I ask that. I appeal to them——

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. We will give you all you want.

Mr. MORTON. My friend says they will give us all we want. Well, you have not done it up to this time. We do not ask a great deal, but I think we have a right to ask that the national-bank circulation shall be so increased as to equalize it between the States according to the basis of the act of 1865. What was that basis? That $150,000,000 should be distributed according to population; that would have given the people of the Western States a proportion according to their population, not according to their wealth. That the remaining $150,000,000, or whatever it might be, should be distributed according to business and according to wealth. That basis has been violated all the time.

Then we passed an act in 1870 increasing the national-bank circulation $54,000,000, and providing that it should be distributed upon the basis of the act of 1865, to which I have referred, and according to the census of 1870. That act provided that $25,000,000 of currency should be taken from the Eastern States and given to the States that had not their fair proportion, providing for the transfer of $25,000,000. That has never been done; and it never will be done. That has been the law now for nearly four years, but that $25,000,000 has not been re-distributed. If a law was passed giving to the States not having their full proportion an amount to make them equal to the Eastern States, and repealing this $25,000,000 provision, that would be satisfactory. We do not want to take a dollar from Massachusetts, or a dollar from Connecticut or Vermont, where they have the excess. Let them keep it; but while they do keep it they should not stand like lions in the path and prevent other communities from getting their fair proportion. I therefore address this consideration particularly to our friends from the East. They ought to be willing to accord to us justice upon this subject. We have borne this injustice patiently; I do not think we have complained in an unseemly manner; and they ought to be willing to have this national-bank capital distributed equally upon that basis.

Now, Mr. President, what would be the effect of that? Would that cheapen the greenbacks? I think not. I am not speaking now of increasing the greenbacks beyond the four hundred millions, including the forty-four million reserve; but I am speaking of increasing the national-bank circulation forty-four or fifty millions, so as to make the States equal, and requiring it to be redeemed in greenbacks. That would not cheapen the greenbacks; it would not affect the value of our currency at all. The national-bank notes would still have to be redeemed in greenbacks, and the number of greenbacks would not be increased. I submit, therefore, that increasing the national-bank currency to the amount that I speak of, which is little enough, would not cheapen the value of the greenbacks, and would not increase the premium on gold; would not interfere with that gradual return to specie payments that I hope for.

Mr. President, the general demand for some relief from the States of the West and of the South ought not to pass by unheeded. I say to the Senate that there ought to be some respect paid to that demand. I say it ought not to be answered by dry and barren theories. The great body of the business men of this country are intelligent, and many of them study this subject more than we do, more than you or I have time to do, and they understand it well; and the general complaint is that there is not enough money. I do not agree to a large increase. I am not unreasonable. What I speak of is a moderate increase; that is, it does not even keep pace with the growth of population. What the currency was to our people in 1867 it is not to our people in 1874. There is a smaller volume of currency this day, when compared with the population and the wealth and business of this country, than there was five years ago. Shall there not be some consideration given to that? Are we to be whistled down the wind and answered by theories from John Stuart Mill or from Bastiat? I hope not. Let us rather look at the actual condition of our country; let us be governed by the circumstances that surround us, rather than by those which surround other countries; and yet the lessons of history are all in favor of what I advocated the other day and of what I say to-day. You can no more make the wages and prices that prevail in Germany and France applicable to this country than you can make the map of Europe answer for the map of North America. Suppose you take a plaster of Paris cast of the topography of the continent of Europe, with all her mountains, plains, and rivers, could you make that fit upon the continent of America? No more can you make a theory that may suit Germany fit the condition of things in the United States.

One word now in regard to former times. I want to say that we never were properly upon a specie-paying basis in this country; and I will refer to my friend from Connecticut, who can speak more intelligently in regard to the banks in the East. I will take the banks of Illinois, Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan, and I say they were never properly specie-paying banks in the best of times. Why? They were nominally so; but any man who came to a bank in Michigan or Indiana with $500 of the notes of that bank was looked upon as a public enemy by the officers of the bank and by all the people in the town, and every obstacle was thrown in the way of his presenting those notes and getting specie for them. They always kept an amount of five-cent pieces and ten-cent pieces and quarter-dollars on hand, and they counted them out very slowly and with great care, and they would weary the life out of a man who came there with their notes. They never were properly on a specie-paying basis. It was a myth. While I believe it is the normal condition, and I hope we shall get back to it when we can, yet specie payments are not the cure for our troubles; not the cure for a panic; not the cure for the difficulties we are laboring under; because irredeemable paper did not produce the panic and does not produce the present stringency in the money market. This thing of specie payments is a sort of fanaticism; some people have it on the brain. It takes possession of them. It is a kind of sentiment; they have read about it so long and heard so much about it that they think there is no other remedy for our troubles; but when you ask them to give a reason for it, all the reason they can give is that we ought to return to specie payments.

Mr. President, I have said more than I intended. I simply wanted to reply to some of the points made by the Senator from Missouri yesterday.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, the other day I was provoked into saying a few words on this subject of finance. There was a stress of debate that induced me to say a word, and having said it once I thought I would try to say it once more, "say it slow," as they express it in Nevada. Indeed, so many propositions have been submitted on this subject, so many bills, so many resolutions, so many plans have been drawn and devised, that I began to fear I might be thought unpatriotic if I did not contribute something myself. So I gave notice to the Senate the other day that I would at some future time introduce a bill. I have that bill in my hand, and with the permission of the Senate I will send it to the desk to be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin sends a bill to the desk to be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

A bill to provide for the gradual withdrawal from circulation of irredeemable national notes and the substitution therefor of redeemable national-bank notes, to remove unjust restrictions upon banks of issue, and upon the amount of circulation.

Be it enacted, &c., That any national bank which has been or may hereafter be organized in accordance with the laws of the United States, and which shall deposit with the Treasurer of the United States national notes in sums equal to some even number of thousands not less than fifty, shall receive in exchange therefor registered bonds of the United States equal in amount to the sums so deposited, payable in thirty years from date, with semi-annual interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, both principal and interest payable in gold coin, and shall also receive national-bank notes, in the form prescribed by law, equal to 90 per cent. of the principal of such bonds.

SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of the Treasurer to cause to be destroyed national notes equal in amount to the bank-notes so at any time issued, less the percentage fixed by law as the reserve of such circulation, until the volume of national notes outstanding shall be reduced to —— millions; and thereafter no more national notes shall be printed, and no more shall be destroyed, except such defaced and mutilated notes as may be returned to the Treasury from time to time, which returned notes the Treasurer shall redeem in gold and silver coin.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from Massachusetts who sits farthest from me [Mr. BOUTWELL] remarked the other day, aptly as I thought, that all the bills and propositions submitted here on this subject, when inspected, were found to involve either contraction or an expansion of the currency. I think that is so. I imagine that we have in the country but two financial parties. I am not sure that we ever had. They are known in the metropolis, I believe, as the "longs" and the "shorts." In the country we are in the habit of calling them the debtor and the creditor classes. We mean by the debtor class, I suppose, those who are most anxious about the debts they have to pay; and we mean by the creditor class those who are most anxious about the debts they have to collect. The former are, perhaps not unnaturally, though it may be unreasonably, anxious to pay as little as possible, and so we see them struggling for an expansion of the circulation; the others are, not unnaturally perhaps, anxious to collect as much as possible, and so we see them struggling for a contraction of the currency.

Now, Mr. President, if this battle goes on, if it is to be fought out on that line and between these two parties, it is my impression that one or the other will be victorious. If I dared to enter upon the office of prophecy, I should predict that one of them would be victorious, and not the other. It is evident to me, and I think it will be to the Senate, that in this contest the expansionists have very decided advantages over their antagonists. The Government is no longer a mere coiner of money; it is a manufacturer of money; it is a manufacturer possessing very ample resources. It has a great many mills; it has a great deal of raw material; it has plenty of skilled labor; and I ought not to omit to mention that it makes its own capital, which is always a great advantage to manufacturers. I think my friend from Connecticut [Mr. BUCKINGHAM] will agree to that. Like a saw-mill that uses its own saw dustfor fuel, you know, sir, very well, the more fuel it consumes the more it has; and so of this money manufacturer—the more capital it consumes in its business the more capital it has to work with. The expansionists only need the assent of Congress, and money will roll out of your machines by the million. And recent events have developed the somewhat curious fact that our Secretary of the Treasury has been keeping on hand for several years a large assortment of money, keeping it "in stock," as the merchants say. If age improves the quality of money, as it is said to improve the quality of some wines, this stock that is now being put upon the market ought to be a choice lot, for it has been kept a good while; and we have lost by it unless it has improved in quality, for we have been paying interest on the amount certainly for many years.

So you see the expansionists have this advantage: if they can get the assent of the Secretary of the Treasury they may expand the circulation by tens of millions, and if they can get the assent of Congress they may inflate it by hundreds of millions; whereas the contractionists, before they can contract the circulation, must not only get the assent of Congress, but they must get the money, the currency, to confiscate; they must collect it, gather it up, and they must gather it from a community, let me say, vividly impressed with the idea that they have much too little of it instead of a little too much of it, and who will, therefore, be likely to part with it very reluctantly.

Under these circumstances I put it to the Senate which of these two parties is likely to triumph if the battle goes on? Suppose wheat could be made as readily as Treasury notes, and suppose parties were to divide upon the question whether a few million bushels should be made or a few million bushels should be burned, and suppose the question were submitted to a popular election, to be determined, too, at a time when nine out of every ten voters want to buy wheat, whereas there is only one out of every ten who has wheat to sell. Which party do you think would triumph at that election? I think the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] could answer that question. He is a practical statesman.

Nay, I put this question, which I think is within the comprehension of all Senators: which one of these parties would probably be embraced by every sagacious politician who has not any wheat to sell, who can get along without buying any, who has no positive need in the world except to get into the Legislature, or into Congress, or to be translated into the White House—which of these parties would such a man be likely to join? These questions need not be answered, perhaps; certainly not until Senators have considered them very carefully. But I think this question must be answered very soon, and that is, which of these two parties ought to control the Government? For myself I have answered that question. I think neither ought to control the Government. I do not think the expansionists ought to control, for that would enable them to settle their debts at less than one hundred cents on the dollar; and I do not think the contractionists ought to control the Government, for that would enable them to collect more than one hundred cents on the dollar. And I think it strange that gentlemen who see very clearly that a contraction of the currency would be unjust to the debtor class cannot also see that an expansion of the currency would be unjust to the other class, and I think it very strange that gentlemen who see that an expansion of the currency would be unjust to the creditor class cannot see equally clearly that the reverse of that policy would be unjust to the debtor class.

If the Government means to be just between these two parties, it seems to me that it should be neutral between them; and yet it seems to me very evident that something ought to be done—something which is neither a contraction nor an expansion of the currency. The Committee on Finance does not seem to be entirely agreed what should be done, and I believe the country is not quite harmonious on that question. If I understand the proposition of the chairman of the committee, he recommends that we now set our faces toward the resumption of specie payments, and that we achieve that end within a given time. If I understand the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] he recommends to us that we achieve it at once. If I understand the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY,] he would recommend to us to resume specie payments when the printing of national notes shall be numbered among the lost arts.

Mr. President, if I know that my neck is sure to be broken, it has always been an open question with me whether I would rather have it done to-morrow or next year; and so I should hesitate to choose between these recommendations of the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Delaware, for I should feel very certain that broken necks were to be the result. This country is doing business on a scaffold a great way up from solid ground. You are sustained there by a statute. Repeal it, and down you come. Undertake to resume specie payments now or next year, undertake to convert your whole volume of paper into specie now or next year, and I think disaster would be the inevitable result. I am so sure of that that rather than agree to either of those expedients I think I should join the Senator from Michigan and go up in his balloon and not come down at all.

Sir, there is within a few yards of this Chamber a large brick mansion which a few years since rested upon the top of a high hill, twenty feet at least from the street which passed it. It was always a disagreeable spectacle for me to contemplate; but I never doubted that the draymen of Washington could level that house with the street. Just remove the earth from beneath it, and the house would come down; but it would come down a mass of shapeless ruins; and precisely how many draymen would have been buried beneath the ruins I do not know. Mechanical skill has produced the same result. Mechanical skill has contrived to remove the earth from beneath that house so gradually, supplying it all the time with a solid wall of masonry, that to-day the house stands there level with the street; no two bricks, so far as is perceptible, started from each other.

Mr. President, I have believed that we might draw instructions from that experiment; that instead of bringing down the whole volume of your currency to the level of coin either now or at any other given time, the business of statesmen was to build up coin to the level of your paper issues, and I have sent to the table a bill suggesting my idea of the way that is to be done—a bill which will not expand the existing circulation, which shall not contract that circulation, which does not command specie payments, either now or next year, but which shall open a way, and a safe one, along which the country may move toward specie payments, just as fast as its needs and its ability will justify; which will not, in a single day, either in the present or in the future, level your whole paper fabric to the basis of specie, but will steadily sustain that fabric where it is, while the reassured capital and labor of the country shall build up that solid basis of coin to the support of the fabric.

The essence of the bill is to allow the holders of your greenbacks to convert them into interest-bearing bonds just so fast as they will replace them by bank-notes and pledge the bonds as security that the bank-notes shall be redeemed in legal-tender notes or in coin on demand. The bill assumes that national notes cannot, while bank-notes can, be made convertible. I venture upon this assertion with great confidence, notwithstanding it is impugned by the high authority of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] In his last report from the Treasury Department I understand him to teach that under favorable conditions of our foreign trade the Government will be able to maintain its share of our paper circulation on a specie basis, but that without such support the banks will not be able for many years, if ever, to maintain a paper circulation on such a basis. I differ with such authority with reluctance; but I am compelled to dissent from that conclusion altogether. I hold, upon the best consideration I can give to the subject, the very reverse of both propositions. I believe no possible condition of our foreign trade, and no probable condition of our Treasury, will enable the Government to maintain a convertible paper issue of $350,000,000 for any length of time. A corporation whose capital yields just enough to pay its current expenses, and yet undertakes to carry a debt of millions in the shape of promissory notes, and actually to pay those notes in coin on demand, I think will fail in the endeavor. But I believe the capital of this country can maintain a paper circulation equal to its utmost needs and habitually convertible into coin. Of course I know that the banks can no more pay four dollars with one than the Treasury can. But that is not what resumption means.

A convertible paper currency is not one the whole volume of which may be exchanged for coin at the same instant. It is one which may be exchanged as fast as presented. Well-regulated banks are adequate to that endeavor. The Treasury, I think, is totally inadequate. The banks are associations of capitalists with resources beyond their liabilities; the Government is a chronic bankrupt with liabilities far beyond its resources. The bank-note is conclusive evidence that its maker has accumulated capital exceeding its face by at least 10 per cent. The Treasury-note is conclusive evidence that the Government has borrowed a sum equal to its face, has spent it, and has not a dollar to show for it. The bank-note cannot be issued until the bonds of the Government have been pledged for its payment. The Treasury-note is issued simply because there is nothing else to issue and consequently nothing to pay it with. The bank-note is loaned out, and the borrower himself promises to bring it or its equivalent back. The Treasury-note is paid out, and the payee takes it because the statute compels him to take it, and in the forlorn hope that the Government may sometime be prepared to take it back. The bank-note is issued because business wants in and borrows it. The Treasury-note is out because the public creditor wants payment and cannot get anything else. The bank-note is a laborer, and earns money for him who makes and him who borrows it. The Treasury-note is a mendicant, which the Government quarters upon its creditors in time of peace, simply by assuring them that when they meet a creditor they may in turn transfer the mendicant to him.

The quantity of specie required for business purposes is always inconsiderable. No one bank, to be sure, could supply it; but if the business of issuing currency was surrendered to the banks, not less than four thousand would be employed for that purpose, having a paid-up capital of at least seven hundred millions. The profit derived from issuing that currency is the sufficient consideration for undertaking to supply to business the needed coin. The coin when paid out of a bank soon returns in deposits or payment of loans. The obligation to supply coin would be a joint one, resting upon all the banks. Who can doubt their sufficiency?

But the Treasury issues but little more than half the paper in circulation. It has not a dollar of capital. More than fifty millions of its paper are found habitually in the different banks within twelve hours of Washington. More than fifty millions may be presented for redemption any day, and if redeemed would in the regular course of business get back to the same depositories in ninety days to be presented again, while a dollar of coin paid out of the Treasury would never get back. That fact must not be lost sight of. When the Government undertakes to redeem its paper in coin, it will surrender the power to collect a dollar.

Mr. SCHURZ. Will the Senator state that again?

Mr. HOWE. When the Government undertakes to redeem its paper in coin it will surrender the power to collect a dollar in coin. Now, indeed, you collect a part of your revenues in coin simply by the exercise of that most extraordinary prerogative by which you undertake to repudiate your own debts in the hands of your debtors. But when you no longer repudiate your debts, when you yourselves respect them as money, what importer is ever going to pay coin for his duties? If your law continues to require it of him, he will simply visit the sub-treasury and exchange his greenbacks for coin, then go to the custom-house and pay his duties in coin; and when the transaction is closed the funds in the sub-treasury will be increased by greenbacks to precisely the amount of the duties paid, but the coin will remain the same.

And yet it is proposed to make the Treasury, thus crippled, poor, and helpless, for the sake of saving the interest on four hundred millions, assume the obligation of redeeming seven hundred millions. Mere reason would convince me that the banks, and not the Treasury, are able to maintain a convertible currency, even if we were without the light of experience. But we have ample experience. Look around us. Capital supplies trade with all the coin it needs to-day, and has done so all through the suspension. To be sure, a premium is paid for it; but capital does not exact that premium, or profit by it. Go into any bank in Washington and ask for a thousand dollars in gold, and before they tell you the price they will look at the New York quotations. The manipulations of the gold gamblers fix the price of coin. Crucify them, and the banks can as readily supply coin at par as at a premium of 10 per cent. Take your spurious legal-tenders out of the way, and let the business of this country, made heavy with a sense of the wrongs it has endured, drop on the knights of the Gold Board, and they will disappear.

On the contrary, the Treasury has twice tried the experiment of redemption. In 1861 we authorized the issue of fifty millions in convertible Treasury-notes. We were then out of debt and in good credit.

My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] reminds me, and he is quite right, that a short time before that we had sold bonds for eighty cents on the dollar, or thereabouts. But I never could regard that as an impeachment of the credit of the United States. I thought it was an impeachment of the character of the administration at that time. The Senator says we are dealing with facts. To be sure. The fact I state is that the United States was in good credit. Does the Senator from Massachusetts deny that?

Mr. BOUTWELL. No, sir; I am not in the debate.

Mr. HOWE. He was so near the debate that he attracted my attention.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I only suggested that difficulty.

Mr. HOWE. I am not in any difficulty unless the Senator denies that statement. I say the United States, at that time, were in good credit. To be sure we were then at war; but it was only a war "for ninety days." That was well understood; that was settled. Under those conditions the Treasury continued to redeem those notes until they had got out about $40,000,000, and then took refuge in suspension. How long would the Treasury hold out now if we knock away the bulk-heads which hold back a flood of four hundred millions, having a ten-foot head on?

A more recent experiment is still more discouraging. On the 27th of October last the Secretary of the Treasury was seduced into a slight demonstration toward specie payments. Treasury-notes were then quoted at the full par of silver. The state of our foreign trade seemed auspicious. Gold was arriving with every steamer. That dear delusion known as the balance of trade was with us. The Secretary was tempted, but he was coy. He did not venture to say that he would redeem greenbacks with silver. He did not recognize the holder of a national note as a creditor to be paid in anything else. But holding all such persons fully paid, he ordered that creditors who had not been paid at all might be partially paid in silver; but he prudently required that creditors should not be hoggish, and therefore commanded that no one creditor should be paid more than five dollars in silver. On that extremely narrow gauge specie payments continued not quite thirty days. On the 22d of November the Secretary was compelled to modify the order so as to require that all creditors claiming a specific number of even dollars should be paid in paper; but that happy creditors whose claims embraced fractions of a dollar might demand the fraction in white and precious silver.

Robert Walpole is said to have remarked that he would leave the business of taxing the colonies to be tried by a bolder minister than he was. I am free to admit that whoever shall undertake to commit this Government to the task, not merely of paying off its dishonored millions, but of paying them daily in coin, will exhibit a courage to which I make no sort of pretensions. I shall regard that statesman very much in the light the New Jersey farmer looked upon his yearling heifer when she squared herself across the track of the Camden and Amboy road, fired with the ambition to engage a locomotive drawing the lightning-express train. When the farmer, who witnessed the collision, saw his poor calf stretched lifeless on the meadow about fifty yards distant from the track, he remarked that he admired her pluck, but he had not the slightest respect for her judgment. [Laughter.]

If, therefore, a convertible currency be really a desideratum of trade, you may, I think, have such a circulation if national notes can be retired. But is such a currency desirable? It is manifest that a large party in the United States—and I am not sure but a growing party—is to be found who do not desire such a currency. Some deprecate it because they fear it cannot be attained except through contraction; others decry it because they are resolved to keep the way open to expansion. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] the other day denounced this desire for specie payments as a fanaticism. I think he repeated the expression to-day. He acknowledged the other day—and I thought he seemed to blush when he made the acknowledgment—that he once had that fanaticism himself bad. I really hope the honorable Senator will not reproach himself too severely for that temporary aberration of judgment. A great many able statesmen have shared that weakness with him. Some respectable gentlemen betray it still. My conviction is that the business world will ere long yield to it again.

Mr. President, we ought not to deceive ourselves; we ought not to deceive the country if we can help it. This prepossession for a convertible currency is a fanaticism, or it is the true faith. Our duty requires us to provide for such a conversion, or to provide against it. The interest of the American people will be promoted, or it will be retarded, by achieving resumption. If a convertible paper circulation is better than one inconvertible, it may not be our duty to jump at it; but it is clearly our duty to work toward it. I agree with the Senator from Indiana that resumption is now out of our power, but it is not necessarily for that reason the less desirable. I may be entirely justified in telling my creditor that I cannot pay him now; but that is the saddest of all reasons for calling him a fanatic, merely because he desires payment.

Sir, if we please to vote to-morrow or next day that not money but promises to pay money—promises always renewed and never performed—are the true currency for business; that the whole creation have groaned and travailed in ignorance until now; that William Patterson and John Law were, after all, the world's model financiers; that true financial wisdom, begotten of a panic in October, was prematurely born in January, there is nothing in the Constitution to prevent our doing so. Suppose both Houses shall concur in such a resolution, will that act conclusively prove that the wisdom of the past was mere fanaticism, or will it show that the wisdom of the present is utter foolishness? Does any one suppose that we can repeal the lessons taught by three hundred years of unvarying human experience by a statute passed in 1874?

If the sole object of money is to pay debts, and it is none of the creditor's business in what he is paid, then I grant you should not employ gold or silver for that purpose; neither ought you to employ finely-engraved pictures like those on which your promises are inscribed. That is a useless and a profligate expenditure. You should use for that purpose in that case what the debtor least needs and most wants to get rid of. Your statute should, in the interest of economy, make old newspapers and last year's almanacs legal-tender at about a dollar for the square inch; and you might use the worn-out type on which they were printed for small change.

But the creditor has a right to be consulted about the commodity in which he is paid, and when your statute, merely to favor the debtor, enables him to pay his debt in a currency cheaper than that existing when his debt was contracted, it perpetrates an outrage as manifest, though not as great, as if it should order the sweepings of your kitchen to be thrown into your creditor's hat and call that the cancellation of his debt.

And then, be it remembered, the paying of debts is not the only function of money. That is not its highest office. Money enters upon its great priesthood only when it officiates as the prime minister of commerce, the agent of exchange, the standard of values, that common denominator in which you can accurately write the value of every fraction of the world's wealth; that subtle indicator by which the Minnesota farmer when he has thrown his wheat into the bazaar of nations can know how much tea or coffee or cloth he may take out. The most important feature of such money is, not that it should be pretty, not that it should pay the farmer's debts, not that it should be cheap, but that it shall mean the same thing when the tea and coffee are weighed out as when the wheat is thrown in. Irredeemable paper money never had that characteristic and never can have.

I represent a Western State. The West is popularly supposed to be in debt. I do not doubt that Wisconsin owes something; I have not inquired how much; but I believe I reflect her views when I tell you that she is willing to pay one hundred cents on the dollar for all she owes; and if you will leave the currency as it was when she contracted her debts, she is quite willing to account in that currency. I know I defend her interests when I tell you her pressing need is, not for a special currency in which she may adjust the inconsiderable balance which may appear for or against her after her sales and purchases are effected, but she imperatively demands at the earliest day practicable a stable currency of unvarying value into which she may convert the hundred millions of products which annually result from her industry, with some assurance that the shrinkage in that currency while it remains in her hands will not more than consume the profits of her toil. Now she is compelled to turn the vast products of her soil, her forests and her mines, not into money, but into promises to pay money. The amount of paper she gets depends upon its gold value when she sells. What she will get for her paper depends upon the like value assigned to it by the knights of Black Friday at the time she makes her purchases. Gold is demonetized, said Mr. Chase. When paper usurps the office of money coin becomes a marketable commodity; but it never ceases to be the standard by which all other commodities are valued. And when the bulletins report the price of gold to be 110 or 115, they only declare the quantity of paper requisite to obtain a dollar of coin. The more paper is required to purchase a dollar of coin the more is required to purchase a pound of tea or of any other commodity, since, the relation of supply to demand being unchanged, the same commodity will purchase the same quantity of gold one day with another. So the price of all commodities is often advanced or depreciated merely because the medium has advanced or receded. That medium fluctuates under the manipulations of the gold gamblers on Wall street, who buy and sell daily uncounted millions with as much nonchalance as the devil offered unnumbered kingdoms, and owning as few of the former as he did of the latter. In that famous den gather the bandit clans, who, without other risk than that of fortunes which they hope to make, levy their contributions on the industries of a nation.

And I beg to remind the West especially of a favorite trick of the Wall street fraternity. Year after year, as regularly as the return of the harvest season, they operate for what is properly known as a stringency in the money market. Year after year your harvests are disposed of to a market which, no matter how hungry it is, is, by the exploits of speculation, straitened for the means to buy with; and when your harvest is thus transferred to a stingy market your members come to the capital luminous with the disastrous experience, clamorous for an expanded currency, and confident in the belief that because they sold very cheap when money was made artificially tight, they will be able to buy very cheap if they make the currency artificially free. So it happens that we find men now quite urgent for an expanded circulation, although money is abundant in New York at 5 and 6 per cent., simply because in August and September last the banks piled so much money on the stock-board that they could not even pay their depositors in October.

Sir, it has occurred to me that if these urbane freebooters should, some time after locking up the money market while they purchase our crop, succeed in persuading us to flood the market while they sell it, they will be likely to make a good thing by the operation. The great apostle once said deprecatingly that he had planted and Apollos watered, but God gave the increase. We are brought to that time when we are bound to say that though Paul may plant, and Apollos may water, and God may give the increase, it depends upon the gambling in Wall street what shall be the profit of that increase.

My conviction is that the most urgent need of the producer is that gold gambling be destroyed; and I believe if this pauper Government will quit the banking business, protected labor and unfettered capital will soon break up the circle of the knights of Black Friday.

The bill I have introduced is framed upon the idea that a paper currency convertible into coin is desirable, that the existence of national notes is the only obstacle in the way of such a currency. It proposes a way of retiring those notes—a way which seems to me entirely just to both private debtors and private creditors, since it leaves the facility for paying debts and the value of the payment precisely as they now stand. It does not propose to disturb the volume of the currency, but steadily and gradually to appreciate its value.

It may be objected that the paper which the bill would retire is better than the substitute it suggests—that national notes are better than bank-notes. That is simply impossible, since the latter may be converted into the former at the pleasure of the holder. The same government which issues the one guarantees the conversion of the other, and is secured for doing so. It may be objected that funding the national notes will increase the interest account of the Government. Undoubtedly. Do you then mean to tell the holder of your deferred promises that you will neither pay them nor pay interest upon them? Only debtors who are beyond the reach of law dare say that; only the most dishonest debtors will say it. When the nation says that, it must thereafter wear the brand of repudiation above that of insolvency.

It may be objected that the bill will interfere with the banking monopoly now existing. Undoubtedly. That monopoly must be surrendered. I marvel that it has been endured so long. I am confident that the people will not submit to it much longer. I know of no heavier reproach to your laws nor to any law than is the shameful fact that communities all over the country desire additional banking facilities, capital desires to supply them, but are daily told at the Treasury, "The pool is full; you cannot come in."

The outrage is aggravated by the scandalous disproportion in the authorized circulation. Wisconsin is entitled upon the basis of wealth and population to nine millions. She is allowed three millions. I state the sums in round numbers. Rhode Island, upon the same basis, is entitled to two and a half millions, and has over thirteen millions. Massachusetts is entitled to nineteen millions, and has fifty-eight millions.

I know, sir, banking cannot with safety be free when subjected to no other responsibility than that of redemption in a medium so abundant as that of the national notes. That would lead to ruinous inflation. The freedom which the bill proposes is guarded against the possibility of inflation.

Sir, it is not every new machine which performs exactly in accordance with the anticipations of the inventor. Perhaps mine may not realize all my expectations. But in spite of all the wrecked hopes scattered along the track of invention I am inclined to warrant mine to yield the following results:

Pass the bill I have laid on your table, and,

First, you will at once have hushed the clamor against a banking monopoly, for that monopoly will no longer exist. One thing is gained certain.

Secondly, you will at once relieve the Government from the reproach of having deprived large sections of the country of needed banking facilities; for wherever capital is willing to start a bank, one may then be started.

Thirdly, every bank which is organized, while it will not aid creditors in effecting contraction, will aid in protecting them against expansion. It will be a re-enforcement of the party which opposes expansion.

Fourthly, every such bank, while it will not aid debtors to expansion, will secure them all the advantages and none of the disadvantages of inflation. It will increase the facility for borrowing without depreciating the value of what is borrowed. Every bank of issue loans more than its own circulation. Some loan several times the amount of their circulation. The aggregate of loans is ordinarily more than double the aggregate of circulation. The national banks of Boston returned, in October last, an outstanding circulation of $26,000,000 and loans to the amount of $84,000,000. Those of the city of New York returned a circulation of $27,000,000 and loans to the amount of $122,000,000. The banks of Chicago, with a circulation of $5,000,000, had out loans of $14,000,000. The banks of Wisconsin, outside of Milwaukee, with a circulation of $2,000,000, had made loans to the amount of $5,000,000. A hundred millions of legal-tenders added to the existing volume would depreciate the value as much as it would increase the facilities for loans. The same amount of notes issued by new banks, under the terms of the bill, would increase the facilities for loans as much and not depreciate their value at all.

Fifthly, it will be, not a literal but a substantial fulfillment of the promises so often made to the holders of our national notes. The bill will not give them coin in exchange for their notes, but will give them a bond, which is substantially the equivalent of coin.

Sixthly, it will set us at once on the only safe and, I think, the only practicable road to a convertible currency. We shall be drawn toward it by intelligent capital, and not by blind cupidity. Our progress will be controlled by the necessities of business, and not by the exigencies of politics. A bank will be organized whenever and wherever business warrants the step. Every such organization will remove a fragment of that partition which now separates us from specie. Every million of greenbacks retired enhances the value of the remainder, and so brings paper and specie nearer and nearer together. But the ability to dispense with national notes keeps even pace with the constantly increasing importance of them. Every time $90,000 are retired the capital which is finally to dispense with them altogether is re-enforced $100,000. The approach of paper to specie is so gradual that no one notes it, and when they meet no one feels it.

Of the national notes now outstanding $200,000,000 are required by the national banks as reserve to protect their liabilities. When $100,000,000 shall have been retired the whole remaining volume will be required for the same purpose. Thereafter, as new banks are organized, specie must come in aid of legal-tenders; the two will for a time work together. The old age of legal-tenders will linger a little to nurse the infancy of specie. When the national notes are reduced to a sum to be determined by the wisdom of Congress, when the whole amount outstanding is inadequate or not more than adequate to supply the basis of the bank circulation, when a dollar of coin must be substituted for every dollar of paper destroyed, it would seem to be safe to stop printing notes and to charge the Treasury with the duty of exchanging coin for such worn-out notes as shall be returned for that purpose. The Treasury will no longer be in danger of a raid; its notes will then be known as the twin-brother of coin and its most efficient ally. Every dollar will be guarded with jealousy and surrendered with reluctance, the holder knowing that once surrendered to the Treasury it can never return. Of course when that time comes the organization of new banks can no longer depend upon the retiring and funding of Treasury-notes. Banking will then, of necessity, be free to all who will secure their circulation by the pledge of any interest-bearing bonds of the Government.

This, then, is in brief the theory of the bill I have sent to your table; that the Government should maintain absolute and strict neutrality between those who demand more, and those who demand less, currency; that the Government is not made a capitalist by reason of its outstanding notes, but is a debtor to their whole sum; that to compel its creditors to carry its debts merely for the purpose of saving interest is a manifest wrong; that to keep the present volume in circulation and to make them convertible is simply impossible; that so long as we maintain an inconvertible paper currency, we subject the results of every man's labor to the hazards of the ceaseless battle between the bulls and the bears of the gold market; and that honesty and policy combine to urge that we say at once to the holders of our promises, "We will permit you to fund them just so fast as you can do it without disturbing the currency, and so affecting the obligations of contracts now existing."

Mr. MORTON. How fast would that be, may I ask the Senator? That is an important question.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, that is an important question. Pass the bill, and I will prove by the history of the country just how fast it will be.

Mr. MORTON. That is not answering my question.

Mr. HOWE. No, sir; and it is a question I might just as well put to the Senator. One man's opinion upon that question is just about as good as another's, and I do not think any man's opinion would sell for much in any wholesome market.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator excuse me a moment?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I think our positions are not precisely the same. The Senator is proposing a remedy, and he would retire these notes as fast as it can be done without disturbance. It becomes a very pertinent question how fast, under his remedy, he thinks that could be done, and the Senator fails to answer that. Whether it can be done in one year or two is very important.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I have heard a very animated dispute in this Chamber, since this debate opened, on the question whether we have too much money or too little. I do not undertake to discuss that question. I do not know whether we have enough or not. If you ask about my own individual condition, I will tell you that I have not more than half enough. [Laughter.] If you ask me what I think about the condition of the country, whether the business of the country has enough, I will tell you it depends a great deal upon what the business of the country is. We have not enough, I am sure, to float Erie Railroad stock to par and Northern Pacific to 200; but that we have money enough to effect the exchanges of commodities in this country I have never seen any reason to doubt. I spoke just now rather enthusiastically of the facilities this Government enjoys for making money. Put them all in requisition to-morrow, start all your mills, and you can scarcely make money enough for the use of the stock market, but I think you could make it a little faster than it is wanted for honest business. But, sir, I do not believe that it is given to Congress to know whether there is or is not money enough in the United States. I believe sagacious business men can form a pretty reliable opinion as to whether more money is needed in the city of New York, or in Milwaukee, or in any other town.

Pass the bill I have sent to your table, and wherever such men think more money is needed new banks will be organized, and nowhere else. Then you will learn what the business of the country thinks upon that question, not what politicians think; and I would rather take the judgment of the business portion of the community than the judgment of politicians on questions of that kind.

Mr. MORTON. I am very willing to leave it to the judgment of the business men of the country, taking the whole country over.

Mr. HOWE. As expressed at the polls; as expressed in the election of Representatives? Business men do not always control the results of those elections. I am speaking of business which risks something upon its decisions.

Mr. MORTON. I mean that, too.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. As the Senator from Wisconsin stated that he was unable, after the discussion, in his judgment, to determine just the precise amount of the volume of currency necessary for the country, and said that if he were interrogated himself he should say that he had not half enough, I ask if the Senator will not be as generous to the rest of the people of the Union as he is in his judgment of the wants of himself.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir; and whenever I come to the Congress of the United States asking them to make more money for my use, I will ask them to put the name of my friend from Michigan in the same bill—and all the rest of you. [Laughter.] If I ever get any more money, I suspect I have got to make it myself. I never tried to get it in any other way but once, and then I did not try it; I did get a little in the way of back pay, but it was not by any effort of my own. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. President, I should like to have the bill introduced by me referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can introduce the bill at the present time if there is no objection.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 315) to provide for the gradual withdrawal of the circulation of irredeemable national notes and the substitution therefor of redeemable national-bank notes, to remove unjust restrictions upon banks, of issue, and upon the amount of circulation; and it was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Yesterday I said, in interrupting the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ,] that the price of gold did not go down so low as 6 per cent. premium. I find by the record that there was one day when it did go down as low as 6¼. I was not aware that it had gone below a fraction under 9 per cent.

But I desire to say a single word to the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] I know that he desires nothing only what is just in relation to this matter; but he asserts that the issue of twenty-five millions of the reserve on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury has been of vast service to the country.

Now, if he will look at the bank returns of the city of New York, a little subsequent to the panic, he will find that the amount of notes held by the banks of the city of New York was reduced to $25,000,000, and that to-day they hold $50,000,000. Therefore the entire amounts of United States notes which have been issued since the panic have been taken up, and are absorbed solely by the city banks of New York, and not a dollar thereof has gone West.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.]

Mr. SHERMAN. It was not my purpose and I do not now desire to address the Senate on this proposition if any other Senator wishes to do so.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I will state to the Senator from Ohio that there are, I know, three Senators who desire to speak on this amendment, which is the pending question, and I notice that two of them are not present. I suppose the chairman of the committee would not be desirous of preventing them from expressing their views on the question now pending before the Senate. I hope, therefore, he will not press a vote at this time.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the vote is taken I wish to submit some observations myself, but I do not want to take the floor until every other Senator has had an opportunity to speak who desires to address the Senate. I wish to close the debate, and if no other Senator wishes to speak I will take the floor now.

Mr. WRIGHT. With the permission of the Senator from Ohio, I have a suggestion to make. I infer from what the Senator from Michigan has said that there are Senators who are not now present who desire to address the Senate on the subject, and probably will not be ready to do so before Monday. I had thought myself that I might say something upon the general subject. While it is not at all important, either to myself or the Senate, that I should talk, I would prefer, if it suits the Senator from Ohio as well, that we have it understood that the vote shall be taken on Monday upon this resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. The debate might go on in the mean time. If no other Senator desires to speak, I will do so myself to-morrow, and if any other Senator is prepared to go on, I will give way to him to-morrow morning.

Mr. WRIGHT. So far as I am concerned I do not know that I shall be ready to proceed before Monday; and, indeed, I do not know that I shall talk at all; but I think most likely if I do it will not be until Monday.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 193, which is a local bill applicable to Kentucky, reported by the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending order may lie aside informally for that purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the resolution go over until to-morrow at one o'clock, and then, if no other Senator desires to address the Senate, I will claim the floor.

Mr. SCHURZ. If no further discussion is to take place to-day on this subject I wish to submit a remark of a personal nature. It has been suggested to me by the Senator from Massachusetts that I did him injustice in something I said in my speech of yesterday. He referred to the following words:

> But we heard on Friday last, from the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] that the Government is not only not bound to pay its legal-tender due-bills on demand, nor even when it may be able—that is, when by its own action it may enable itself to pay—but that it is bound only by its own pleasure as to when, and even as to whether, it will discharge its obligations; and all this upon the sole ground that on the legal-tender notes no specific time is expressly stated at which they shall be redeemed in gold.

I need not assure the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senate that if any injustice has been done it certainly has not been done intentionally. I think it is due to him, as well as to myself, that I should quote the passages of his speech of Friday last which led me to make this statement; and I will say that I should have done much better had I quoted his own language in full, as I shall do now. He said:

> Whoever will look at a United States note will see that there is no obligation expressed—and I think none implied—in what is written upon the note that it is to be paid at a particular time. It is redeemable at the pleasure of the Government, but not payable at any particular moment.

Again:

> I will answer that, according to my ideas, the relations between individuals are determined by the laws. I suppose the courts would enforce the payment of a similar private obligation after the demand was made, considering the circumstances, whether they were reasonable or not; but the rule does not apply to the Government. There is no power of making the demand. These notes were issued upon an express and general notice as to the character of the obligation, and discretion as to the time of payment is left with the Government.

Again:

> The equity and the morality are to be sought for in the hearts and the purposes of the people; but a nation cannot be charged with dishonor when it has stipulated beforehand what it will do and is in the direction, as it has been for the last five or six years, of performing what it has undertaken ultimately to do; and that is to make these notes of the value of coin and redeemable in coin. But while this process is going on, and while we are under no obligation to bring the process to an ultimate and favorable result at a particular time, I do not hold the nation to be discredited or dishonored if it be acting in good faith toward a result which it has promised ultimately to perform, but which it has not agreed to perform at a particular time.

I must confess that I saw reason to construe this language as meaning that, in the opinion of the Senator from Massachusetts, the Government might, just as it pleased, redeem the greenback notes or not redeem them at all; its pleasure being the only rule of its action. That was my construction, and so I stated. I am now informed by the Senator from Massachusetts that the meaning of his language is different, and that he virtually agrees with me as to the duty of the Government to redeem the greenbacks as soon as it is able to do so. Nothing could give me greater pleasure than to make this statement as to the real intentions of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. MORTON. I desire, Mr. President, to make one statement in answer to the Senator from Vermont in regard to the disbursement of twenty-five millions of the Treasury reserve. The Senator says that did the country no good, because every dollar of it went into the banks of New York.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senator will excuse me. I did not make the latter statement that it did not do the country any good; but I said that the fact was that that currency did not go West, but went to the city of New York.

Mr. MORTON. I think my friend, who is generally very accurate and always intends to be so, is quite mistaken in his statement. That money was not disbursed in New York; only a part of it. It was disbursed in the ordinary expenditures of the Government here, at New York, in the West, wherever the Government had money to pay out. It went into the general circulation; it was not poured from the Treasury into the lap of the New York bankers; but the disbursement of that money gave confidence to some extent all over the country. Business men understood that the circulation was being increased, and that relief to some extent was being given. It gave confidence to business, more or less, everywhere; not enough to restore our business fully, but it did give relief. That the banks of New York have been making themselves strong I know very well; and that the general recuperation of business has helped them to do it I know very well; but if my friend intends to leave the impression that this $25,000,000 of the reserve has gone into their lap and has not gone into circulation, I think he is mistaken. They have increased their reserves in the way banks know how to do when money becomes easier and money becomes plentier; and the disbursement of this money by the Treasury has contributed greatly to relief from the effect of the panic.

I would add one remark further, that the very knowledge that the Government would disburse this forty-four million reserve, and was doing it to some extent, contributed to restore confidence; just as in the case of the Bank of England, when the ministry, by suspending the bank act, authorized the bank to increase her discounts $40,000,000, or £8,000,000; the very knowledge of that fact restored confidence almost in a day, and the bank was only called upon for £400,000, or $2,000,000. That has been the effect, to a certain extent, of the knowledge that the Government was increasing the volume of currency by the disbursement of a part of the forty-four million reserve.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I did not mean to express any opinion as to whether the issue had really contributed anything to the recuperation of the country or not. I merely meant to state a fact which I think is the vice of our whole paper system. As long as it is not redeemable in specie, and as long as there is no redemption on the part of the national banks, our circulation of money does not fertilize the whole country, but the tendency is for it to run at once to the city of New York, and to increase the speculation there; and that is what I condemn. Now, so far as the fact is concerned, if the Treasury Department has issued $25,000,000, there is not a dollar more in circulation in the country, because the banks of the city of New York have accumulated $25,000,000 of the same kind of money.

Mr. MORTON. Allow me to ask my friend a question in the form of a statement. I ask whether before the war under the old State-bank system there was not the same proportional accumulation of money in New York? The Western States then labored under the difficulty that their paper was not current in New York, and people in the West were compelled to buy exchange at heavy prices. The effect was that the banks in the West were kept in debt to New York, and there was the same accumulation there in a different form. Now the money goes to New York on account of its being the commercial metropolis, the general financial center; it goes in the form of currency by express from the West. Then it went in a different form; but there was the same accumulation proportionally before the war as there is now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It is impossible that that should be the case, and the facts in relation to the returns of the banks will show that it is not the case. The amount of deposits in New York has very largely increased within a few years, showing that it has become the money center of the country; and any banker will see at once that so long as there is no necessity for the national banks to keep any money at home they can use all their surplus in the city of New York, or anywhere where they can get a daily interest on their balances. But if we should return to specie payments, or even if we were to return to a system of redemption that compelled the national banks to redeem their bills at New York weekly, then the banks at home, in order to have any means to redeem their bills that they had issued, would be compelled to discount at home, to discount to those near them, who would pay them in bills of some other or neighboring banks, and thereby they would have the means to redeem the money that had accumulated in New York, which would be brought back and circulated in the local districts and keep up a healthy circulation.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend allow me one further question in regard to deposits?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. There is a defect in our national banking system allowing our banks in the country and in the West to deposit their reserves in the city of New York in a particular way. That is a thing which ought to be corrected; but I will ask the Senator what difference it would make whether the banks were paying specie or not, so far as that is concerned? If a bank is allowed to deposit her reserve in New York and get interest on the surplus there, I ask if it makes any difference whether the bank is redeeming in coin or not? If the bank has a surplus to deposit, the inducement to deposit in New York and get interest is the same that it would be now if the Government was redeeming her notes in coin and the banks redeeming their notes in greenbacks—that is, indirectly in coin. Would the result be changed by what the Senator says?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think it would, most emphatically.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] has asked unanimous consent that the pending order be laid aside informally for the purpose of taking up a bill indicated by him. Is there objection?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I should like to say a few words on the question now before the Senate. I do not propose to go into any lengthy discussion of the question, but merely to make a statement in regard to one or two points which are involved in this question of banking and currency.

I think we misjudge as to our duty, by not understanding that we are laboring under two different kinds of currency—one the currency with which we transact our business abroad, and the other that by which we transact domestic commerce. I do not hesitate to say that the currency which now passes from one end of the country to another, of equal value in all parts of the country, is the best currency that ever was devised for a people. Take it distinct from the currency with which we must settle international exchanges, simply as a currency fitted to transact domestic business, I can conceive of nothing more perfect; and therefore I should be very sorry to see any return to a system of State banking which would interrupt the value of the currency and make it unequal in different sections of the country.

I also differ from statements which have been made frequently on this floor by other Senators in regard to the amount of banking facilities our people should have, and the amount of currency which we should be permitted to circulate. I agree with the Senator from Indiana that the West should not be restricted in the privileges of banking. I fully agree also that the East should not be restricted. I think the amount of banking capital necessary to transact business in this country cannot be defined by the Senate of the United States nor by Congress. It is to be measured by the business of the country, and that business is constantly fluctuating and changing; and until you can determine how much capital can be used to advantage in banking institutions, you cannot determine how much you ought to incorporate. You can no more determine this question than you can determine the amount of capital which ought to be invested in the cotton manufacture or in any other branch of business. My judgment is that we should allow banking to be free, so that men may organize banks under your law with whatever capital they please, in whatever locality they please, provided only that they be held strictly to redemption. To allow free banking without redemption, without redeeming bank-notes in that which is of more value than the notes themselves, would be only to place us in the position suggested by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ,] and the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN.] It would place us on the downward path, precisely as we should be treading that path if we were constantly expanding. It must be by redemption that you must hold your banking institutions to proper responsibility.

Another point I would remark upon. You are afraid of expansion; you are afraid of an increase of currency. So am I. But I am also afraid of contraction; and do we not mistake when we suppose that an exchangeability of one kind of indebtedness for another is expansion? What I am against is an expansion of the indebtedness of the country. That is a step which has been taken by the honorable Secretary of the Treasury. What I ask is that the Committee on Finance will consider some measure by which we can retrace the steps that have been taken by the honorable Secretary. I believe that can be done. I believe that temporary loans can be made, payable at the convenience of the Government, and the money received by those loans need not be placed in the hands of the Treasurer to be used at his discretion hereafter, but canceled, destroyed, and then we shall not be in a position to expand our indebtedness.

Let me state another fact. We have two descriptions of indebtedness—one of bonds and one of legal-tender notes. Now, I ask if the Government is more embarrassed, more unable to meet its obligations, if a man holding greenbacks is allowed to exchange them for interest-bearing bonds? I ask if the Government is in that case in any way crippled or straitened in consequence of its ability to perform its former pledges? It has changed the form of indebtedness, but that is all. Reverse it: suppose a man holding bonds would like to have legal-tender notes; true, it would be a contraction of the currency if he should go to the Treasury and make the exchange; but would it be injurious? He would not do it unless it was for his interest as a business man, and when he had made that exchange there would be no contraction of the indebtedness of the Government.

What I ask Senators to consider is, that the great question is not whether we shall expand or contract the legal-tender notes, but whether we shall expand or not the indebtedness of the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky renew his request?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to lay aside the pending order and take up the bill which he has indicated.

Mr. SHERMAN. Informally, I suppose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Informally. The Chair hears no objection.

URIAH PORTER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 193) for the benefit of Uriah Porter.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move two amendments that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue suggests. The bill, if amended as I propose, will read:

That Uriah Porter, of Allen County, Kentucky, be, and is hereby, authorized to operate his distillery in the county and State aforesaid, without being required to procure the written consent of John H. Page, who holds a lien on the land and distillery of said Porter: Provided, That said Porter, prior to distilling, shall execute a bond to the United States, such as is prescribed by section 8 of the internal-revenue act, approved July 20, 1868, as amended, to be taken in lieu of the written consent of the owner of the fee. But nothing herein contained shall be construed as dispensing with any of the requirements of the law in this case than that of the procuring of the consent aforesaid.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

REPORTING OF THE DEBATES.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, the Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 795) making an appropriation to pay the salaries of the Official Reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House, non-concurred in by the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. MORRILL of Maine, Mr. ANTHONY, and Mr. STEVENSON, the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 1038) for the relief of the estates of Abel Gilbert and William Gerrish, late copartners in business under the style of Gilbert & Gerrish; and it was thereupon signed by the President of the Senate pro tempore.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution reported by the Committee on Finance is before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate go into executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, January 15, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

WILLIAM STEELE.

On motion of Mr. HANCOCK, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 215) to remove the legal and political disabilities of William Steele, of Bexar County, Texas, was taken from the Speaker's table, received its several readings, and was passed.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. BROMBERG said: I desire to move to reconsider the vote by which the House passed, a short time since, a bill for the removal of the political disabilities of William Steele, of Texas. I wish to amend by adding another name. I think that all amendments of that kind should be made to these bills in this House.

Mr. HANCOCK. I trust the motion to reconsider will not be made.

Mr. BECK. Let the gentleman introduce another bill.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will introduce a separate bill it would probably facilitate the object he has in view.

Mr. BROMBERG. I understand that they have stopped the consideration of all private bills of this character in the other House. [After a pause.] But I will not ask for a reconsideration against the judgment of gentlemen about me.

BIENNIAL REGISTER.

On motion of Mr. DONNAN, by unanimous consent, the bill of the Senate (S. No. 202) in relation to the printing of the Biennial Register was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

REYNOLDS POWER-LOOM PATENT.

Mr. SMART, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1216) for the extension of the patent known as the Reynolds power-loom patent; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, directed to furnish this House, at as early a day as practicable, copies of all the decisions of the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, based upon the act of Congress known as "the eight-hour law."

CHEAP TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. HYDE. I ask to submit the following resolutions for consideration at this time:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to examine and report at an early day in favor of the most effectual means for promoting cheap transportation upon the navigable waters of the United States; and for preventing combinations calculated to prevent competition upon said waters, including the tug-boat combination said to exist at the mouth of the Mississippi River.

Resolved, That the Committee on Railways and Canals be, and they are hereby, instructed to investigate and report at an early day upon the best and most practicable plans for securing cheap transportation both by canals and railways; for securing reasonable charges upon railways to all points without unjust discrimination, either for or against any person or locality; for preventing combinations among common carriers over such railways or canals calculated to prevent competition; for regulating and prescribing the duties of the officers, directors, and managing agents of railroad corporations toward the public in the management of their trust; and for punishing such officers, directors, and agents for extortion, fraud, breaches of trust, and other willful acts injurious to the public or to the stockholders or bondholders of said railways.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. What is the power proposed to be given by this resolution as to the committees' reporting?

Mr. HYDE. At an early day.

The SPEAKER. These are mandatory resolutions, instructing the committees named to examine and report at an early day in favor of, &c.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Let the resolutions be referred to the committees.

Mr. HYDE. If there be objection to the passage of the resolutions I will move that the first be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman would remove all difficulty by modifying the resolutions so as to direct the committees to inquire into the expediency of reporting bills for the purpose indicated.

Mr. HYDE. I will accept the suggestion, and make the modification as indicated.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Are the resolutions still open to objection?

The SPEAKER. They are.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I must object to anything more than a reference.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions have been modified so as to direct the committees named to inquire into the expediency, &c.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I will not object.

There being no objection, the resolutions as modified were adopted.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES, DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Mr. SENER. Upon examining the rules of this House, I find that there are committees appointed at the commencement of every session to audit the expenditures of the respective Departments, save that of the Department of Justice. To remedy that defect in the rules, I beg leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Rules be directed to inquire into the expediency of so amending Rule 102 of the standing rules of this House as to provide for a committee on so much of the public accounts and expenditures as relates to the Department of Justice.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on the Rules.

CLERK OF COMMITTEE.

Mr. ORR. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for reference to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department have leave to employ a clerk during the present session of Congress, or such part thereof as may be necessary, at the usual rate of compensation.

Mr. BUFFINTON. I would prefer that the House pass upon this resolution directly, without referring it to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. ORR. I have no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let it go to the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. That is the usual mode.

The resolution was accordingly referred to the Committee on Accounts.

COMMISSIONS TO POSTMASTERS.

Mr. ORTH. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, House bill No. 319, to provide for the issuing and recording of commissions to postmasters appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

REVENUE REFORM.

Mr. LAWSON, by unanimous consent, presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York upon revenue reform; which were referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour now begins at twenty-four minutes past twelve o'clock, and reports are in order from the Committee on Revision of the Laws.

APPEALS FROM CIRCUIT COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. POLAND, from the Committee on Revision of the Laws, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1217) providing for an appeal from circuit courts to the Supreme Court in certain cases of habeas corpus; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill provides that from the final decision of any circuit court, upon an application for a writ of habeas corpus, or upon such writ when issued, in the case of any person alleged to be restrained of his liberty in violation of the Constitution or any law or treaty of the United States, an appeal may be taken to the Supreme Court.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to have the House vote upon this bill without understanding precisely what it means. By an act passed in 1867 jurisdiction was given to the several United States courts and the judges thereof to issue writs of habeas corpus in all cases in which a person alleged that he was restrained of his liberty in violation of the Constitution or any law or treaty of the United States. That law provided for an appeal from any district court to the circuit court, and from the circuit court to the Supreme Court of the United States. By an act passed March 27, 1868, so much of the act of 1867 as provided for an appeal from the circuit court to the Supreme Court was repealed in general terms. Those gentlemen who were members of the House at that time know something of the manner in which the act was repealed.

Among the alterations proposed by the commissioners who revised the statutes of the United States was the restoration of this right of appeal. Inasmuch as the committee have decided not to include in the revision any changes of the existing law, we have reported this proposition as an independent bill to restore the right of appeal in that class of cases. I do not desire to enter into any argument in relation to the propriety of the measure; but I wish the House to understand precisely what it means.

Mr. WOOD. I think the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] should accompany his proposition with an explanation as to the fraud which was practiced in the enactment of the law which it is now proposed to repeal. Such a statement would be very interesting as a matter of history, and I think the gentleman from Vermont knows something about the circumstances.

Mr. POLAND. I had no more knowledge in reference to the matter than the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] had, and I prefer that he should make the explanation himself.

Mr. WOOD. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Vermont was a member of this House at the particular time to which I refer, when, by a combination on the part of certain members, the majority here succeeded in precipitating upon the House at an improper time the bill which was subsequently passed by both Houses for the purpose of anticipating a judicial determination in the Supreme Court of the United States, virtually in advance of the judicial decision of an important question bearing upon the reconstruction laws; we interfered by legislation after the case reached and was pending in that court. I believe the gentleman is quite familiar with the whole subject; and I think a statement of the circumstances might be pertinent as a very great argument why the bill now proposed should be passed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. POLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAX TITLES IN INSURRECTIONARY STATES.

Mr. POLAND. I am directed by the Committee on Revision of the Laws to report, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1191) for the relief of owners and purchasers of lands sold for direct taxes in the insurrectionary States. This bill, I suppose, under the rule recently adopted, must go to the Committee of the Whole, as it involves to some extent an appropriation of money out of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, on examination of the bill, finds that it contains a direct appropriation, Does the gentleman wish to ask unanimous consent that the bill may be acted on now?

Mr. POLAND. I suppose it must go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. It will, unless there be unanimous consent for its consideration in the House. Unless the gentleman asks such consent the bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE ON REVISION OF THE LAWS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nevada [Mr. KENDALL] desires to be excused from further service on the Committee on Revision of the Laws; and the Chair appoints in his stead the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. CLYMER.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1038) for the relief of the estates of Abel Gilbert and William Gerrish, late copartners in business under the style of Gilbert & Gerrish; and

An act (H. R. No. 793) repealing the increase of salaries of members of Congress and other officers.

FIRE-EXTINGUISHERS FOR THE CAPITOL.

Mr. STRAIT, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1218) to provide for the purchase of fire-extinguishers for the Capitol building; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in co-operation with the architect of the Capitol, to purchase not exceeding eight fire-extinguishers, to be placed in those parts of the Capitol and those rooms most exposed to danger from fire, the purchase to be made after a proper test of the merits of the extinguishers offered shall have been made; and payment therefor is to be made out of the contingent fund of the respective Houses.

Mr. STRAIT. I ask that this bill may be considered in the House instead of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to be a very important measure. I insist on its going to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Is it in order to move to go into Committee of the Whole now?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Does the rule adopted the other day cover bills making disposition of the contingent fund of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it does, because it expressly refers to payments of money out of appropriations already made.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. There are circumstances making it important to have this bill acted on to-day; and I hope unanimous consent will be given for such action in the House. The circumstances are these, (I beg attention to the statement I am about to make:) It has been stated that a very large amount of property, very valuable in its nature, has been stored in the various parts of this building, where, should a fire break out, there would be very great destruction in a few minutes. The purpose of this bill is to authorize the placing of fire-extinguishers in those exposed positions. In the office of the Supreme Court, for instance, are the records of that court; in another portion of the building is the Library; in other portions valuable documents are stored. It is a very small amount that is involved. It is considered necessary by the gentlemen having the charge of the building that there should be not more than eight of these fire-extinguishers, the cost of which would be only between four and five hundred dollars. As there is a great risk in the meanwhile, and as it is necessary in order to provide these extinguishers that the bill should pass the House and the Senate and be approved, I hope it will be allowed to pass without objection.

I submit, as part of my remarks, a letter I have received from the Clerk of the House and the architect of the Capitol extension.

The Clerk read as follows:

CLERK'S OFFICE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., January 5, 1874.

SIR: As directed by your committee we have examined the lofts and document-rooms of the Capitol, with a view to the better protection of their contents from loss by fire. We find that the space between the ceiling of the Supreme Court and the roof, which is used for the storing of documents by the Senate, and which is mainly made of wood, should be protected by a fire-extinguisher. There are also several document-rooms which, in our opinion, should be protected in the same manner. We therefore recommend the purchase of eight fire-extinguishers.

Very respectfully, yours, &c.,

EWD. MCPHERSON.
EDWARD CLARK.

Hon. J. H. PLATT, Jr.,
House Representatives United States, Washington, D. C.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I trust the House will pass the bill without any delay.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has made a point of order on the bill. It is for him to say whether he withdraws it or not.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the objection to this bill, although I take it that there is no imperative necessity for it, as we have got along so many years without it. I give notice, however, that I will hereafter not withdraw my objection to such bills.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STRAIT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RAILING IN HALL OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back, with the recommendation that it be not adopted, the following resolution:

Resolved, That the architect of the Capitol be directed to place a substantial railing outside the outer circle of members' seats in the Representatives' Hall.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to that.

Mr. LOWNDES. I ask non-concurrence in the resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very good.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana withdraws his objection, and the resolution is laid on the table.

APPROACHES TO THE CAPITOL.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back the following resolution, with the recommendation that it be adopted:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States of America, That the architect of the Capitol extension be authorized and directed to employ a man, at a salary of not exceeding sixty dollars per month, for the purpose of keeping the approaches to the House in good order during the session of Congress.

Mr. RANDALL. I think we have got hands enough already employed about the House.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order that the resolution should be first discussed in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Does that come under the rule?

The SPEAKER. Necessarily it does. Sixty dollars a month is money.

The resolution was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

COMMITTEE CLERK.

Mr. BUFFINTON, from the Committee on Accounts, reported back the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committees on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812 and on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, have authority to employ a clerk jointly to serve during the sessions of this Congress, and to be paid the usual rate of compensation.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is there not a sum of money involved in that resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not make the point of order. I merely call the attention of the House to the fact that an objection might be made.

Mr. BUFFINTON. It is necessary, of course, that these committees should have a clerk.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BUFFINTON moved that the vote by which the resolution was agreed to be reconsidered; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OFFICIAL REPORTERS OF DEBATES.

Mr. RANDALL. I am instructed by the Committee on Rules to report the rule which I send to the desk, and to ask for its adoption by the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the following be added to the Rules of the House, namely:

RULE —. The appointment and removal of the Official Reporters of the House shall be vested in the Speaker; and in addition to their other duties the reporters of the House proceedings and debates shall prepare and furnish for publication a list of the memorials, petitions, and other papers, with their reference, each day presented under the rule.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to offer a word of explanation in reference to this rule. On the 3d day of March last, the last day of the last Congress, these gentlemen who report our debates were made officers of this House. But an omission was made in reference to that matter, the result of which is that they are a sort of nondescript officers, under the direction of no one, although they are officers of the House; and the committee have deemed that they should be under some moderate restraint. They have, therefore, offered this resolution to give to the Speaker of the House the selection of these gentlemen.

It is proper for me to say in this connection that the Speaker of the House did not desire, but on the contrary strenuously opposed, his being the party to select them. But the committee were reminded of the fact that they were now legislating not for the present alone but for the future. And it may not be inappropriate for me to say that perhaps I, as one of the minority of the committee, was selected to present this resolution, so as to show and indicate that the Speaker of the majority did not desire this power. But it is very plain that this control over the reporters should be put somewhere. It is not in view to displace—so far as I know and believe, and I think I feel authorized to say that much—any of the gentlemen who occupy those positions at present; but it was deemed necessary for the good order of the House and the proper regulation of the reports and debates that they should be put under some one's authority.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the last clause of the proposed rule be read again.

The Clerk read as follows:

And in addition to their other duties, the reporters of the House proceedings and debates shall prepare and furnish for publication a list of the memorials, petitions, and other papers, with their reference, each day presented under the rule.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not that the rule now?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir. I will explain the matter. The gentleman is familiar with the practice of the House, which is for each member to go down to the desk and place in that box there the petitions and memorials he presents, and at the same time to make a transcript and give it to the Official Reporters of the debates. The effect would be that members would not be required to make the transcript at all. Under the present system, new members who are not familiar with the system fail to get their petitions in the RECORD at all. This rule requires the reporters to take from that box all the petitions deposited there, and to publish them in the RECORD, stating specifically to what committee they have been referred. This has never been done heretofore. There has been a general statement that "the following petitions were presented and referred to the appropriate committees." This rule will require that the reference of each petition and memorial shall be printed, so that members who are interested in the subjects to which they refer may see in the morning to what committee they have been referred.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is exactly right, and I understand the only change is that this bill requires the reporters to add to the announcement of the presentation of a petition, the reference that is made of it.

Mr. RANDALL. It only adds the reference, so that we may be enabled to trace any petition or memorial by its reference. New members who are not familiar with the practice fail to give a transcript of the petitions and memorials they present to the reporters.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I suggest to the gentleman that the resolution be amended, so as to say "for publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD."

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question. I understand that it is the well-settled exposition of the first article of the amendments to the Constitution, which provides that the right of the people peaceably to assemble and petition the Government for redress of grievances shall not be abridged by law, that Congress shall make no law abridging this right. It was designed to secure to the American people the right to petition both branches of Congress without obstruction.

Mr. RANDALL. This in no manner interferes with that right; on the contrary, it gives greater publication to the petitions.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I understand that by the rules of this House no petition can be presented to the House in open session; and there is no mode by which a petition ever can be brought to the attention of the House unless the committee to which it is referred at the Clerk's desk shall elect in the morning hour to bring it into the House in connection with some recommendation, either of legislation or against legislation. The only way now in which a petition presented can get the notice of Congress is, that a member may read in the RECORD that on a previous day a petition was presented on a certain subject.

Now I understand, further, that the Speaker rules that the reports in the RECORD are not official, and that it is not a question of privilege to make any question concerning their correction. I ask the gentleman how he reconciles this usage under the rule, even as amended by his committee, with the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. RANDALL. I will answer the gentleman. He cannot be more in favor than I am of the widest latitude of the right of petition; but the complaint he makes does not hold good at all against this rule. This rule gives a wider publication to petitions presented here than they received under the existing rule. It will enable us to trace any petition that has been presented here, and gives a wider publication to the petitions presented here, and that is the only purpose of the rule.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair in this connection. I understood the Chair to state to the House the other day his understanding of the meaning and effect of the proposed rule, as the representative of his committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it his duty to do so.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Should this rule be adopted, so far as it is applicable to petitions, would the question of their being correctly inserted be a privileged question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would not hold that a publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD was more privileged than any other publication in a journal. Gentlemen cannot bring typographical errors in here as matters of privilege, or the House would never do any business.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I hope before this amendment is adopted by the House that it will be recommitted to the Committee on the Rules, to determine whether the constitutional right of petition is not invaded by the rule of the House as it now stands, the rule which the committee propose to amend.

I think that two amendments to this rule better not be attempted when one can be made to cover all. As I understand the rule, it grew out of a purpose to abridge the right of petition of the American people, in the interest of a polity intended to abridge the freedom and personal liberty of a large portion of the people of this country. The result is that to-day, under a rule of this House, the right of the people to petition, as secured in the first article of amendments to the Constitution, is practically denied, because no petition can be presented to the House of Representatives unless the committee to which it is referred at the Clerk's desk see fit to report it to this House.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Does the gentleman understand that there is anything in the rule now to prevent him from offering the petition of any citizen of the United States in open House, and asking that it be read at the Clerk's desk?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Yes, sir; I do not understand that there is any time in any session of Congress when that can be done, unless, possibly, on the first morning of its assemblage, before any other business has come before the House.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Then the rules of the House are as much opposed to the right of petition as this particular rule is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs to say that the point at which the gentleman aims, and with which the Chair would express considerable sympathy, is not at issue in the question now before the House. The point to be reached by the proposed rule is this: at present petitions are presented at the Clerk's desk and deposited in the box provided for that purpose. Notice of the presentation of those petitions is not published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, nor formerly in the Globe, unless the member presenting them shall prepare a slip and hand it to the reporters for publication. This proposed rule is to make it the duty of the Official Reporters to themselves prepare a statement of the petitions and have it printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; and so far that is in furtherance of the right of petition.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. So I understand. But the point I make is that in amending this rule we should go so far as to cure the whole difficulty.

The SPEAKER. This proposed rule, if adopted, would not be at all in conflict with what the gentleman desires.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman admits that this is in the right direction, but complains that it does not go far enough. I am willing to go as far as the gentleman, but not in this way.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] permit me to move to recommit this report, with instructions to the Committee on the Rules to devise and report an amendment of the rules which will secure the constitutional right of petition?

Mr. RANDALL. I cannot do that, because I have not the authority to do it.

The SPEAKER. A single further remark. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] will observe that this proposed rule merely prescribes a certain duty of the Official Reporters. But it does not in any way touch the question of the presentation of petitions to the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Except that it gives greater publicity to the petitions.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to say that I have always believed, as my colleague [Mr. G. F. HOAR] believes, that when under the rule we put a petition in the box at the Clerk's desk, that is an infringement of the right of petition. I remember, better, perhaps, than he does, from being more intimately connected with the matter, the occasion and probable purpose of that rule. It was an attempt to prevent John Quincy Adams from presenting slave petitions in the House, and was regarded as a gag-law by one set of politicians, and by another as a great preservative measure to prevent slave insurrections. But all that has now passed away. And the reason for the rule passing away, I would suggest to my colleague to bring the matter distinctly before the House, and have it referred to the Committee on the Rules.

Mr. POTTER. Allow me to inquire of the Chair whether Rule 131 is not merely a permissive rule. Under it we may present petitions at the Clerk's desk. I do not understand that there is anything requiring petitions to be presented at the Clerk's desk and put into that box. It is a mere facility afforded for the presentation of petitions. Am I right in that?

The SPEAKER. Under existing rules it requires unanimous consent to present a petition in open House.

Mr. POTTER. Then I was mistaken.

Mr. COX. I was about to refer to that matter. Every gentleman in this House knows that in the last ten or twenty years, especially since the war, the right of petition has been practically nullified. I think the publicity given to our proceedings, the general discussions among the people, the diffusion of information by means of the press, have rendered the old constitutional right of petition almost obsolete, both in Parliament and in Congress. And therefore it is, since our business in Congress has increased so much—we being choked up with business of all kinds—that, in order to carry out the first amendment to the Constitution, we must seek a more convenient mode than filling up an hour here every morning by the presentation of petitions, three-fourths of which have scarcely any significance.

The reason of the rule requiring us to deposit these petitions in that box was for the convenience of Congress. It does not take away the practical right of the people to petition. I never yet knew a case when, in a matter of any importance, memorials or petitions were presented by any member from any locality, that the House did not give unanimous consent for the presentation and for the recording of the petitions.

Now, sir, as we pay our reporters for preparing our published proceedings, one object of this rule is that they shall do this work of preparing the petitions for publication, instead of the members themselves doing it. The adoption of this rule will prevent any omission of these petitions or memorials from the RECORD, thus enlarging the right of petition, if you please, in the most convenient mode for the transaction of business.

The Committee on the Rules were unanimous in the opinion that something should be done in this matter, and especially that petitions should not have the wrong direction. We desire that the RECORD shall be perfect as to the reference of these petitions, so that no question shall arise hereafter as to the reference of any petition to any particular committee; so that any member, by looking at the RECORD, may see to what committee any petition presented on the previous day has been referred. The committee think that this rule, as a matter of convenience to the House and the country, is most indispensable.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.]

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, the proposed rule now under consideration connects itself with another rule on our list that is historic in its character. Thirty years ago and more, there was a great deal of agitation in the House and the country over a certain class of petitions which were generally offered here by one of the then Representatives from Massachusetts; I refer to the late John Quincy Adams. Those petitions were in their character very offensive to the people in one portion of the country. They were presented persistently and their presentation was persistently resisted; but they were presented under this constitutional guarantee, which it was very difficult to overcome. Hence the rule was devised under which petitions should be referred at the Clerk's desk, under direction of the Speaker, being sent by him sub silentio to such committee as he might think proper. Thus they went to the "tomb of the Capulets." The right of petition was sacredly preserved! The petitions were received, and that was the end of them.

After a while, however, members began to hand to the reporters little slips, stating that Mr. So-and-so presented a certain petition. A few only of such notices at first appeared in the columns of the Globe. Gradually they increased in number, until now they probably represent the great body of the petitions introduced.

The rule now proposed is a movement toward the original practice of presenting petitions in open House, as is done in the Senate. It is, if the gentleman from Massachusetts will allow me to say so, getting back to the attitude that was occupied by the House in the time of his distinguished predecessor, by showing in the RECORD not only the petitions presented but the names of the members presenting them, with the committees to which they are referred. Hence this proposition, instead of exciting any alarm or apprehension on the part of the gentleman, should elicit his congratulation that we are getting back to what he and I conceive to be the spirit of the Constitution.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. My point is, that this amendment does not cure the constitutional difficulty; that although this is a proposition in the right direction, the committee had better make it broad enough to meet the difficulty I suggest. But as the Chair and the gentlemen having this matter in charge think it best that my proposition should have a separate consideration, I do not know that I shall press it in connection with the rule now reported.

The trouble is that even if this amendment be made, the citizen cannot get his petition before the House in the sense intended by the Constitution. His Representative takes it, drops it in silence into a box at the Clerk's desk; a memorandum of it is printed in the RECORD, which, as the Chair rules, (I have no doubt correctly,) is not an official publication. In other words, we say to the citizen, "You may exercise your constitutional right by putting a statement of your petition in a newspaper." My objection was not to this amendment, but I desire to point out that it did not go far enough.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman bear in mind that our Journal, under the practice already prevailing, shows each petition presented, the name of the gentleman presenting it, and the reference?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. But the petition is not in any way brought directly to my notice of the House.

Mr. MAYNARD. The only difference between the old practice and that which will be introduced under the rule now proposed is, that under the old practice the member would get up in his place, state orally the substance of the petition, with the reference he desired, which statement would appear as a part of his remarks in the congressional report.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. It may be that the old practice was not the best one; but it is manifest that the present rule absolutely denies in practice the right which the Constitution grants. The fact that the petition appears in the published Journal does not meet the difficulty. Take the case of a petition presented on the last day, or the last day but one, of the session; it does not appear in the printed Journal until months afterward; and as to the publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the Chair rules that to be on the same basis as a mere newspaper publication—for instance the New York Times.

Mr. MAYNARD. If a petition were presented in open House, the country might know nothing about it, though its presentation might perhaps be known to the persons happening to be in the galleries at the time.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. But that is not a question for us after we have discharged our duty in the matter.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield to my colleague, [Mr. MYERS.]

Mr. MYERS. I have heard no complaint from the country that the right of petition has been abridged. Certainly I should do nothing upon this floor which I would deem an abridgment of it. Now, what is the right of petition? The citizen has it. But has he it upon this floor? Here he has representation. What was the reason for the rule first adopted? Perhaps some of the reasons given are true; but the great prevailing reason for its continuance now was that the business of the House and of the country is increasing, and therefore it is desirable that members may file these petitions and have them set forth in the Globe or RECORD. That is done now. The member, if he does his duty to the petitioner, makes an abstract of the petition, and it appears in the RECORD, where very few of the public see it after all. If the petitions are very important, the member, by going to the Associated Press reporter, can always have them telegraphed over the United States. If they are unimportant they will not be telegraphed any more by being presented in open House than they are now.

I say, then, while this proposed rule may be good, still I should like to have it referred, in order that it may become better. It would take too much of the time of the House to read these references openly, as some gentlemen desire. If the rule is adopted in its present shape it will occupy a large portion of the time of the reporters, who I do not think should attend to this business of condensing for members petitions which I think they ought to attend to themselves, and which they at present have the privilege of condensing and recording officially.

These petitions go to committees. The member presenting them can follow them up before the committees; and there never has been any abridgment of the right of petition by the House, or by any decision of the Speaker which prevents these petitions going to the proper committees. On the contrary, the member presenting them has to a greater extent the privilege of referring them to the committee of his choice than if presented in open House.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield now to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD.]

Mr. WOOD. I am very glad that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] has brought the attention of the House to this question; because I am glad, sir, that a gentleman of his ability has seen it necessary to call us back again to the Constitution of the United States, and I will go with him, or with any other gentleman in this House, into a strict construction and a strict compliance with the Constitution. But, sir, I think the gentleman is laboring under an error; that he reflects, in his remarks upon this question, what in my judgment is a very common popular error. I deny that there is anything in the Constitution of the United States that gives to any man, woman, or child the right to send a petition to this House. The only provision in the Constitution that covers the subject at all, that I know of, is article 1 of the amendments to the Constitution, which is as follows:

> ARTICLE 1. Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

"And to petition the Government for a redress of grievances"—having expressed those grievances in popular assembly. Now, sir, are we to assume that this House constitutes the Government of the United States? It is proposed that we shall act separately and distinctly as a House, as one branch of Congress, in the consideration of this question. And therefore, to reach the conclusion which the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts has reached, it would be necessary to hold that this House—not even both Houses—constitutes the Government, the only authority to which, under the Constitution, there is the right to petition at all.

But, sir, I go a little further. I deny that there is anything in the existing rules of the House that denies to the people the right of petition. They may have the right to petition; we receive their petitions; we make a speedy and practical disposition of those petitions, or else they would incumber and take up the whole time we devote to legislation.

What do we do with them? We refer them to the appropriate committees for consideration; and if these petitions present cases that may influence, or should influence, proper legislation in the determination of bills and matters before this House, those committees properly pay due deference and respect to them.

Therefore, sir, I hold that it would be physically impossible for us to make any other disposition of the thousands of petitions that are constantly flowing in upon us than that which the rules now existing point out and direct. During my long experience here—and

I was here when John Quincy Adams fought this very question of the right of petition in reference to the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia—at least from 1850 down to 1874, I have never known these petitions to be opened in the committee-room and made the subject of consideration there. Sir, we have already in the Committee on Ways and Means enough petitions sent us during this Congress to almost fill the Chamber; and if we were to untie, to read, to ponder and deliberate upon the requests made upon us by these petitioners, why, we would never be able to report a bill to this House. Therefore, sir, in my judgment we have done all and more than all that the Constitution requires. And, in the second place, it would be impossible to carry out the views of the gentleman as to reading and acting upon the petitions here as presented. Practically, so far as relates to the legislation of Congress, these petitions might as well be kept at home. I have never known any influence exercised by them during my experience here.

Mr. SENER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me for a moment?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. SENER. I desire merely to ask a question. Under the old system, if I am correctly informed, of reporting and printing these debates, the contractors not only had the printing but had the selection of their own reporters. Am I correct?

Mr. RANDALL. You are.

Mr. SENER. Then if this report is adopted is it not a step in the direction, on the part of the House, of permanently sending this printing to the Government Printing Office, even though that printing should cost more?

Mr. RANDALL. Not in the least. On the contrary, the committee considered that very question. They did not wish to enter at all upon it. If Congress in the future shall give the contract for printing elsewhere than to the Government Printing Office, these reporters will still do the reporting, unless the law shall provide otherwise, and give to the contractors this selection, which they never should again do. These reporters should always be in the power of the House.

Mr. SENER. Then we will have to rescind this rule.

Mr. RANDALL. Not at all. The printing is now done at the Government Printing Office; and if a contract be made for the printing to be done elsewhere, these reporters will still supply a full report of the proceedings and debates of the House. The adoption of the rule does not complicate that question at all. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RIGHT OF PETITION.

Mr. RANDALL. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR.]

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I ask leave to present a resolution for the consideration of the Committee on Rules, and not for any action at this time.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think that the gentleman's resolution need go to the Committee on the Rules, for it is so plain in the direction of the right of petition that I am ready to act on it at once. In that connection I wish to say that I differ in toto with the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] in regard to the right of petition.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I ask leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Rules consider whether the existing rules of the House interfere with the right of petition secured by the first article of amendments to the Constitution, and what change, if any, is necessary in the same.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Rules.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. G. F. HOAR moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Rules; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OFFICIAL REPORTERS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say, in regard to the rule just adopted, that on the 3d of March last the House adopted a resolution "that the report of the House proceedings and debates shall be furnished by the present corps of Globe reporters, who shall hereafter, until otherwise ordered, be officers of the House, under the direction of the Speaker." The rule just adopted vests in the Chair the appointment and removal of these reporters. Whenever there is any point of doubt as to what the rule may be supposed to be it is the duty of the Chair to give his own construction of it. The Chair, therefore, now announces that he will appoint the existing reporters, and will consider that the power of removal is only vested in him for cause, which he will have entered upon the Journal. When the appointment of reporters is announced it will be for this Congress, and for subsequent Congresses until action removing them for cause may be taken by the then Speaker. The reporters, as now appointed, are to continue in office until removed for cause.

PRINTING OF BILLS.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am instructed by the Committee on the Rules to report the following:

Resolved, That the following be added to the rules of the House:

RULE —. Private bills shall not be printed except on the request of the committee to which they are referred.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Rules instructed me to offer that resolution, for the reason that the printing of bills has come to be so voluminous that, practically, the object for which they are printed is very much defeated. We are now in the second month of the first session of this Congress, and we have already printed a large number. Formerly, as gentlemen will recollect, a comparatively small percentage of the entire number of bills introduced was printed. Of the number introduced on this file in the House, of eleven hundred and twenty-six, there have been printed ten hundred and ninety; which is a very large percentage of the bills introduced. Quite a number of these are bills which in their nature relate to but a single individual. I notice one for W. H. Moore & Co.; another for the relief of a postmaster of one of the towns in my State; another for the relief of a colonel in the late war, &c. The committee thought, unless it should be deemed important by the committee to which the bill was referred, it would be better as a rule of the House it should not be printed; and they have instructed me to recommend this rule for adoption. Unless some gentleman desires to discuss it I will call the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that the rule now is that bills are only printed by order of the House. It seems clear to me that a large number of bills, in addition to private bills, ought not to be printed until a report is made on them by the committee having them in charge. I think the practice ought to be not to print bills unless the fact be reported by the committee having them in charge that they ought to be printed. I supposed, a single objection now would prevent the printing of any bill, except it be one of the general appropriation bills; and if that is the present rule we are simply narrowing the objection to printing bills and increasing the facilities for their being printed. Sir, this has become a crying evil. Not only ought not any private bill to be printed before it is reported on by a committee, but a large proportion of the other bills introduced ought not to be printed until reported on. It seems to me that the rule should go further and provide that no bill except a regular appropriation bill shall be printed until reported on by a proper committee.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MAYNARD. Certainly; I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. It occurs to me that what would be, on the whole, a very much preferable rule would be this: that no bill shall be considered by the House, either in the House or in committee, until it is in print. The money expended in printing what the House is called to act upon and makes legislation of is better expended than it could be in any other way. The reading of a bill at the Clerk's desk, if it be one of any length, gives members a very small idea of its contents or effect.

I am aware that our files get crowded by the printing of bills; and if some rule could be adopted which would limit the printing of bills on their introduction, but at the same time require all bills to be printed before they are brought before the House for final consideration, I should have no objection to the limitation of printing at the outset; but I object to any limit on the right of the House to have a bill printed before it is called upon to consider it.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I should like to say a word or two upon this question.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I have been very much in the habit of concurring with the Committee on the Rules in all the propositions they have presented, and I dislike very much to oppose one of them; but if I were to propose a change in the existing rule, instead of limiting the printing, I would provide that every bill that comes into the House shall be printed. I think the rule as it now stands ought to be changed in some manner so as to lessen the number of bills, but a bill can never be examined at any time to advantage unless it is printed. If it be not printed, only one man can see it at a time; and when it is referred to a committee, if it is not printed, nobody knows what it is; and when it comes into the House, I care not how important it may be, no member has any information in regard to it except from hearing it read at the Clerk's desk; and it may be a bill with twenty, thirty, or forty sections.

Now, in answer to this it may be said that the committee may recommend that it be printed; but suppose the committee do not recommend that it be printed. A bill ought never to be acted upon favorably which has not been printed, so that its contents may be known to others than the member who introduced it and the committee who had it in charge. If a bill is printed, members are constantly looking over their files, and if a bill be obnoxious, members will certainly find it out; they will remember it when it comes before the House and will be ready to meet it. But if a bill is not printed, it is impossible to provide for its defeat in advance; and therefore I think, if the rule be changed at all, it should be so changed that every bill introduced should be printed rather than that none should.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I hope the Committee on the Rules will not press

this amendment to the rules. In the first place, when a member of Congress has taken the pains to draw and present a bill, and states to the House, on his official responsibility, his desire to have it printed, it seems to me that that desire ought to be granted without waiting until in the multiplicity of business some committee may be able to investigate it. This is especially true with private claims. A large proportion of the private bills introduced in the House are bills for the extension of patents, or for the allowance of claims against the Government.

Now, when such a bill is introduced, we get letters from our constituents who are interested in the matter asking us to send them copies of the bill. If a bill be designed to extend a patent or to provide for the payment of a certain claim and it be printed, persons interested in it have their attention called to it, and their remonstrances come in if we oppose it. All the facts are laid before the House, and the Government is protected. It seems to me that when a private bill is introduced providing for the payment of money from the Treasury, or for putting a person on the pension-rolls, or for extending a patent-right, which may be an agricultural patent, and one in which the whole Northwest has a special interest, information of it ought to be spread as widely as possible; and that the small sum or the large sum, if it be a large sum, which is devoted to securing this publicity is well expended and is a great protection to the Treasury.

Mr. DUNNELL. Allow me to inquire of the Chair, what is the rule now in regard to the printing of bills?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that there is anything in the rule, as it now exists, that prohibits the House on Monday, when bills are introduced on the call of States for reference, or on other days when they are introduced by unanimous consent, from ordering the bills to be printed. The only ground for a contrary inference might be that the rule provides that the morning hour of Monday shall be "for bills on leave, for reference only, and without debate." That would seem possibly to exclude printing. But the practice of the House has for so many years allowed the printing of bills to be ordered on Monday morning that the Chair would rule that on Monday morning the House had the right to order the printing of any bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. I yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.]

Mr. POTTER. My views upon the subject of private legislation will probably be thought somewhat extreme. I believe that Congress should never pass any private bill at all. If I could have the Constitution so amended that Congress could never have the power to pass any private bill whatever, I would do so. The great source of corruption and abuse in the legislation of this country, in both State and Federal Legislatures, is the power of private, special, and local legislation; and those States which have reformed their fundamental law so as to put an end to special and local legislation have gone furthest toward finding the true secret of sound and honest government. In some of the Western States it is provided by their constitutions that there shall be no special legislation at all. The effect of that change in the fundamental law has been absolutely to put an end to corruption, and generally most beneficial.

I appeal to gentlemen who have served long in this House whether every measure which has excited suspicion of corruption and improper influences has not been some measure of a private character, or of local legislation, or special in its action, like the bounties afforded by the provisions of a protective tariff.

But, Mr. Speaker, if we must continue to have private legislation here, let us know at least what is proposed by these private bills, and have them all printed. Let us not allow such measures to be introduced, and then left unprinted, so that when called up for action on the last night of the session we cannot know what is before us. I am told by a gentleman near me that they have had in Alabama exactly that evil; that on the last night of the session private bills not printed were called up for action; some one would explain that the particular bill read had this or that effect, and the bill would be passed upon that statement; but after the bill had become a law it would be found to have some provision which, in the hasty reading of it by the clerk, was not appreciated. If, sir, we are to have private legislation at all, let us at the first moment possible have such measures put upon record in a printed form, so that everybody in the House, and outside of it, too, may know what special privilege is asked of us. Whatever we do, do not let us conceal from ourselves or from the world what applications are made to us for special favors. It may be that this will cost something for useless printing, but more will be saved in the avoidance of improper legislation.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think gentlemen who are debating this proposed rule have entirely misconceived its object and purpose. Before last Monday—and not counting the vast flood of bills introduced in the House on that day—there had been introduced into this House and referred to the various committees ten hundred and eleven bills, and three hundred and eighty-nine of them, almost 40 per cent., were for the relief of individuals by name—bills not for general legislation at all, but relating simply and solely to individuals whose interests and wants were known only to their own representatives, or at the most in any particular case to two or three representatives. You can see by reference to the file of bills on the desk of each gentleman here that it is absolutely impossible for us, from the mere difficulty of handling it, to make use of such a file of bills as that. There are now on this floor about fifty more members than ever before, and the number of bills has been greatly increased in consequence.

Now, what happens in regard to our printing? I hold in my hand three bills, with three different numbers, introduced on the same day by three different members, yet all the bills are in exactly the same words. In that way our files are incumbered by mere repetition. The merits of this bill are of no consequence in this connection; I refer to it simply to illustrate the way things go as we now do business.

In this connection I may refer to another thing. Here is a bill which was introduced in the last Congress for the relief of F. A. Sawyer. It was printed at that time and referred to a committee. It was afterward reported to the House and passed, with a change of just one word, and it was reprinted as changed. Then it was sent to the Senate, and that body made a change in the bill of one word, and it was again reprinted. It came back to the House, when the change of a single word made by the Senate was concurred in by the House, and the bill was printed again. Then it was printed in a little slip by itself, a single leaf, as one of the laws. And then at the end of the session it was printed in the volume of session laws, as is usually done. And a little later it was published in Boston in the volume of laws. So that you have some nine prints of one little private bill. I refer to this as objectionable, not only on the score of expense, which is something, but because our files are made cumbersome by this printing and reprinting and printing again.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Will this rule stop more than one printing of the nine?

Mr. GARFIELD. Even that would be a very considerable saving when we have several thousands of bills printed in a session.

Now, all that the Committee on the Rules mean by this proposition is that private bills shall be referred without printing, but that whenever a bill is to be brought into the House for action of course it shall be printed. A great mass of these bills never get back into the House at all. They are, as it were, so many stump-speeches of individual members, telling their constituents the good things their Representatives would do for them if they could. Bills are introduced without the slightest idea that they shall ever be heard of, except that the member may send a printed slip to his constituent to let him know that his Representative has been devising a good thing for him. And the very fact that these bills are printed increases their number by hundreds. What I ask, as a member of the Committee on the Rules, is that this phase of the evil be corrected.

I think there should be added a provision (I thought it was already included in the proposition, but I find that it is not, in the form in which it has been drafted by the Journal clerk) that whenever a bill is reported to the House for action it shall be printed. With the permission of my colleagues on the committee I will move to add to the proposition a provision that whenever any private bill is reported to the House for action it shall be printed before action is had upon it.

Mr. COBURN. Have the Committee on the Rules made any estimate as to what these bills would cost per page?

Mr. GARFIELD. We have not; we had no means at hand of making such an estimate, though possibly it might have been ascertained. Probably it would facilitate business if these private bills were kept on separate files from the general bills; but as the matter is now going on (and the country ought to know it) 40 per cent. of the bills presented in this House are for the benefit of private citizens by name.

Mr. SPEER. Of the bills now introduced what proportion is printed?

Mr. GARFIELD. Nearly all. Indeed, for some strange reason which I cannot understand, it appears that more bills have already been printed than have been introduced. For instance, I hold in my hand one of the latest bills, upon which I find this imprint, "House bill No. 1046. Printer's No. 1056."

Mr. MAYNARD. The printer's number includes joint resolutions.

Mr. BURCHARD. Often bills reported and recommitted are ordered to be printed a second time.

Mr. GARFIELD. However that may be, I find it to be a fact that of the ten hundred and eleven bills of the present session introduced prior to last Monday, every one has been printed. We have fallen into the habit of allowing bills to be printed as a matter of course. I regard this as an abuse.

Mr. LAWRENCE. In further explanation of the matter stated by my colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD,] I will state that, when a bill is reported back with a substitute, the substitute is generally printed and is numbered as a new bill.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to bring this question to a close as soon as possible. The morning hour has already expired, and I am informed that several gentlemen, who have laden themselves overnight, are anxious to talk upon the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman from Maine does not think this proposition of infinitely more consequence than the naval appropriation bill he certainly has not paid much attention to this discussion. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] argues that, because many of the bills are private bills, therefore they should not be printed. Now, sir, those private bills may propose to appropriate any amount from one hundred dollars to two or three million dollars; and does the gentleman say that because the bills are private in their nature it is of no importance for members to see them in print? If a bill is introduced and referred to a committee without printing, it goes into the hands of a sub-committee, rarely consisting of more than three members, often only one, who takes charge of the papers; so that while a bill is thus pending in committee it is impossible for the House to get any knoweledge of its provisions unless it be in print.

Mr. GARFIELD. But the gentleman will observe that by the amendment which I have offered (embodying, I think, the idea which was in contemplation of the Committee on the Rules) it is required that before any committee shall report any such bill for action they shall ask for its printing and that it shall be printed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I think it more important that the bill be printed before it comes from the committee than after it gets into the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will see, I think, that the amendment I suggest protects the House perfectly in the direction he suggests.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not propose to consume any further time of the House upon this rule. It is a matter that must address itself to the experience of gentlemen, without any great amount of debate. A gentleman here reminds me that at the time of our first service here in this House these bills were rarely ever printed.

It has been suggested here for the sake of argument that some members may introduce bills surreptitiously for dishonest purposes. Sir, I do not stand in my place as a legislator to assume any such disposition on the part of my associates here. I legislate in no such spirit of suspicion, not to say denunciation. But I say that if such instances were possible, such bills would never find their way to the printed files.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. A member presenting a bill may be imposed upon.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman from Tennessee allow me to call his attention to one point?

Mr. MAYNARD. My attention has been called so much and so often by gentlemen that I will allow it to be called once more.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from Tennessee in his remarks a few moments ago should also have stated to the House that when he first came here the passage of private bills was not thought of till they first went upon the Private Calendar and passed through the Committee of the Whole. When the gentleman from Tennessee and myself first came here there was on the Private Calendar a list of three or four hundred bills. Objection day was invented in order to get through with it, and the bills went through on objection day. Then it was altered again, so that any five men could object on every other Friday, and in that way the Private Calendar was sifted. And when I came here no private bill was put on its passage directly, but went into the Committee of the Whole, where no act could get through except it passed through two Fridays. I think the gentleman should state that to the House in connection with the other statement in order that there may be a full understanding of the matter.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am glad the gentleman from Massachusetts has referred to this, because in the rule which we adopted the day before yesterday we recurred to that old practice. We have put ourselves in the hands of my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] who will see that no private bill gets through without first being considered in Committee of the Whole and going to swell the Private Calendar of which the gentleman from Massachusetts has spoken. We are recurring to the old practice which obtained when the gentleman from Massachusetts and other old members were first here in the House. And I submit that this practice of the printing of private bills which gentlemen introduce, not one-twentieth part of which probably will ever be heard of again, will so incumber our files as to make the printing of them absolutely useless, and their volume so great that it will be practically impossible to find them. It is for that reason the Committee on the Rules in considering this matter unanimously thought we should recur to what was the common practice of not printing private bills except at the instance of the committee having them in charge when they thought and requested that they should be printed.

Mr. MELLISH. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have consumed so much time that I am afraid I cannot yield further, as I am reminded by the gentleman having charge of the naval appropriation bill that we are encroaching upon his time.

Mr. MELLISH. I desire merely to ask this: What printing is done by Congress so important and so much for the convenience of members as the printing of bills? All this debate might have been thrown out of the RECORD without much detriment to the public interest; but to do the business of the House properly we ought to have the bills in print so that we can examine them leisurely, which we could not do if they were stowed away in a room in the hands of one man. I think none of our printing is so important as the printing of bills.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is important, undoubtedly, to have some bills printed; but I think there is a vast quantity of bills that are never considered after their introduction—at least 90 per cent. of them—relating perhaps to matters that concern nobody but a single individual, which ought not to be printed. This I think applies, generally speaking, to all private bills. I will therefore, in order to test the sense of the House after this discussion, now call for the previous question.

Mr. SENER. Before the previous question is called I ask that the rule which discriminates between public and private bills be read.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee whether he accepts the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD,] that private bills should be printed before the action of the House is taken on them?

Mr. MAYNARD. No, sir. The House can always, without a rule, refuse to act upon a bill which has not been printed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule drawing the line of distinction between public and private bills.

The Clerk read as follows:

The line of distinction between public and private bills is so difficult to be defined in many cases that it must rest on the opinion of the Speaker and the details of the bill. It has been the practice in Parliament, and also in Congress, to consider as private such as are "for the interest of individuals, public companies or corporations, a parish, city, or county, or other locality." To be a private bill it must not be general in its enactments, but for the particular interest or benefit of a person or persons. A pension bill for the relief of a soldier's widow is a private bill; but a bill granting pensions to such persons as a class, instead of as individuals, is a public bill. Bills for the incorporation of companies, and whose operations are confined within the District of Columbia, have been treated as private; but where such companies are authorized to have agencies, and transact business outside of the limits of the District, they are treated as public. Bills granting lands for railroads have always been held to be public; while a bill authorizing the extension of a railroad into the District of Columbia, or conferring certain privileges upon such an incorporation, has been held to be private.

The SPEAKER. This is not a rule, but a note incorporated in the rules by the compiler of the Digest.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to have my amendment read, as I now send it to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Private bills, introduced for reference, shall be referred without printing; and whenever any private bill is reported to the House for passage it shall be printed before any action is had thereon.

Mr. COBURN. Would it be in order to move to lay this whole subject on the table?

The SPEAKER. It would. Does the gentleman from Tennessee accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not accept it, but I am willing that he shall offer it.

The SPEAKER. The rule, as reported from the Committee on the Rules by the gentleman from Tennessee, will be read, and also the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read the resolution of the Committee on the Rules, as follows:

Resolved, That the following be added to the rules of the House:

RULE —. Private bills shall not be printed except upon the request of the committee to which they are referred.

The Clerk also read Mr. GARFIELD'S proposed amendment, as follows:

Private bills, introduced for reference, shall be referred without printing; and whenever any private bill is reported to the House for passage it shall be printed before any action is had thereon.

Mr. POTTER. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to allow me to add this to his substitute:

But no bill to incorporate any company or grant any privilege to any corporation shall be treated as a private bill.

The SPEAKER. That would be the ruling of the Chair any way.

Mr. KILLINGER. I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

The question was put; and on a division there were ayes 88, noes not counted.

So the subject was laid on the table.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to move to reconsider the vote just taken, and to make one suggestion which I think will meet this difficulty; and it is that the proposed amendment be recommitted to the Committee on the Rules, and that they report a rule providing that the committee to which a bill is referred may order that it be printed at once, without bringing the matter before the House.

The SPEAKER. That matter can be taken up afterward; there is no necessity of recommitting this resolution.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Very well, sir; I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. PACKER, by unanimous consent, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads were discharged from the further consideration of bills of the following titles; and the same were referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (H. R. No. 955) for the relief of J. L. Tedrow, of Clarke County, Iowa;

A bill (H. R. No. 842) for the relief of Charles W. Pierce, of Nebraska, and Jacob C. Brubaker, of Maryland;

A bill (H. R. No. 865) to provide for the payment of William Brook for services as mail-route agent; and

A bill (H. R. No. 593) for the relief of Josiah Jones.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. E. H. ROBERTS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1013) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1875.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out from line 240 of the bill the following words, "and general maintenance of the Navy."

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman will allow me to say that that matter was considered in the Committee on Appropriations this morning; and I was authorized, in accordance with the suggestion made by the gentleman, to move to substitute for the words "general expenses of the Navy," these words, "the care and protection of the Navy in the line of construction and repairs." I presume it was the gentleman's view that the Secretary should have authority to use that fund for the general care and protection of the Navy in the line of construction and repair.

Mr. HOLMAN. I apprehend that that language will still authorize the Secretary of the Navy to build ships with this money.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. If the gentleman can suggest any other words that will accomplish the object at which he and I are both driving I will accept them.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not know but that these words may be sufficient to meet the case; but the Secretary of the Navy may desire to divert a portion of this fund to the building of new ships instead of repairing them, contrary to the desire of Congress. However, I withdraw my motion to strike out.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Then I offer the amendment I suggested.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. In lines 240 and 241 the words "incidental expenses" seem to me to be unnecessary. It is in the paragraph relating to the Bureau of Construction and Repairs. Those words are certainly unnecessary if incidental expenses are intended simply to include the words which follow, to wit, "advertising and foreign postages."

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That is the intention.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then those words are unnecessary.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The word "namely" might be inserted after "expenses," as it is in some other clauses of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to that, and I move to insert that word after the word "expenses" in line 241.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

Bureau of Steam Engineering:

For repairs and preservation of boilers and machinery on naval vessels, and for fitting, repair, and preservation of yard machinery and tools; and for labor in navy-yards and stations not before included; and for incidental expenses; and for purchase and preservation of oils, coal, iron, and all materials and stores; and for completing and erecting on board vessels compound engines with boilers, $1,500,000.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I move to strike out the last word of the paragraph just read, for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] a question. I notice that in the naval appropriation bill of last year this appropriation was divided into its separate items—so much for fitting, so much for repair, so much for labor, so much for purchase and preservation of oils, &c. I would inquire if there is any particular reason why that should not be done here?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I am glad to answer the gentleman. Last year, as the gentleman has suggested, the appropriation was divided into the several subject-matters and applied in detail. This year the appropriation has all been put in a lump, and the same objects and purposes in the last bills are included in this. The appropriation is put in one lump, for the reason that in the present condition of the Bureau of Steam Engineering, in erecting the engines already built and paid for under the appropriation made last year, and in the conduct of the Bureau generally, it may well happen that the Secretary may consider it necessary to spend a greater or less amount for some particular items. Therefore the amount of the appropriation is all put together; but all the purposes for which the money is to be expended are named in the bill, as the gentleman will notice.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Of course I notice that. But the point I make is, that last year the appropriation was divided up, so that for each one of the items no expense could be incurred greater than the proportion of the appropriation set apart for that particular item. As I understand it, under this bill the whole of this appropriation might be expended for any one of these items.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. If the exigencies of the Department, running through the year, would require it, that could be done. But I do not see any serious mischief to come from that.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Only the mischief that always comes from leaving these appropriations in that general way, so that they may be diverted from one purpose to another. I do not know that there is any serious objection to this paragraph as it stands; and as the gentleman from Maine seems to consider it all right, I will withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk proceeded to read the paragraph in relation to the Naval Academy, and read the following:

For pay of watchmen and others, $36,659.50.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I move to strike out the words "and others" for the purpose of inquiring what is comprehended under that term.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It refers to those who may be employed for special purposes on any great occasion, as that of an examination, when an extra force in the nature of police is employed. The number varies at times, because the occasion for the employment varies.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. How much of the appropriation is to be expended for watchmen?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Four-fifths or more.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I wish to ask the same question in regard to succeeding paragraphs: "for pay of mechanics and others;" "for pay of employés in the department of Steam Engineering, for machinists, boiler-makers, and others." Who are the "others" there?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I cannot tell the gentleman what the force of the words "and others" may be, for I have not examined them in that connection as I have in regard to the other matter. I do not know precisely what it is.

Mr. CROOKE. Laborers in the navy-yards.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman from the Brooklyn district suggests that it may mean laborers; I do not know.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Then there is an appropriation for the "pay of employés," which is a very comprehensive term.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That is restricted to the particular department in which they are employed.

Mr. MYERS. There are, for instance, in the navy-yards persons known as "helpers;" not so dignified as mechanics.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. In reference to these navy-yards and the Naval Academy, words that with us have a general significance, with them have a certain technical significance and a limited application. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] says, "mechanics" has a technical meaning.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. My reason for making this suggestion is, I notice that in the first paragraph of the appropriations, under the head of "Naval Academy," there is much detail in respect to the persons to whom this money is to be given, commencing with the professor of drawing and running down to second-class musicians, drummers, and fifers. It seems to me that if there is anything gained by that detail in that paragraph there would be equal gain to have the same detail in the other paragraphs. But if the gentleman thinks it necessary for these words to remain in the bill, of course I will not oppose him, as he has examined the subject.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not think any evil will result from it. The first part of the appropriation in relation to the Naval Academy was particularized because, as gentlemen will see, it refers to officers and employés paid at particular rates and designated by particular titles. I do not think that can be very well done when we come into the mechanical detail.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] that the only way to inform the country what all this money is spent for is to embody in the bill the detail of the estimates. The whole country is astonished at the rapid growth of expenditures in connection with our Naval Academy. The expenses there increase more rapidly than in any other branch of the naval service, however rapid may have been the increase in those other branches. I therefore suggest to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] that if he does not press his motion to strike out the words "and others," he should move to add to the paragraph the particularization of the estimate.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I will withdraw my amendment and allow the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to move the one he has indicated.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Can the gentleman do that at this stage of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. Why not? I simply propose to strike out the general provision and insert the details for which this appropriation of $30,659.50 is to be made.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have no objection to its being done.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Let it be done in the other cases.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. Does the gentleman from Maine mean to say that four-fifths of this amount of $30,659.50 is for the employment of watchmen?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It is for the regular force there. Whenever they reach a certain limit they put the additional force under the head of "attendants." But the regular force employed there, according to my recollection of the report of the Naval Academy, is four-fifths of the whole. This extra number are employed, for instance, on the occasion of the graduation exercises.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. Then four-fifths of this appropriation of $30,000 is paid to watchmen of the regular force?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not think they are all watchmen. The money is used to pay the regular force in all the different departments of the Naval Academy. I suggest that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana should apply as well to the next paragraph as to this.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well. I ask that my amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the following:

For pay of watchmen and others, $30,659.50.
For pay of mechanics and others, $17,462.75.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

Pay of watchmen and others:
Captain of the watch, at $2.50 per diem, $912.50.
Four watchmen, at $2.25 per diem, $3,285.
Foreman of the gas and steam-heating works, at $5 per diem, $1,825.
Twelve attendants at gas and steam-heating works of Academy, at new quarters for cadet midshipmen, and at school-ships; one at $3.50, three at $3, and eight at $2.50 per diem each, $11,862.
Three joiners, two painters, and two masons, at $3.50 per diem each, $8,942.50.
One tinner, one gas-fitter, and one blacksmith, at $3.50 per diem each, $3,832.50.

Pay of mechanics and others:
One mechanic at workshop, at $2.25 per diem, $821.25.
One master-laborer, to keep public grounds in order, at $2.28 per diem, $832.20,

Fourteen laborers to assist in same, three at $2 per diem each, and eleven at $1.75 per diem each, $9,216.25.

One laborer to superintend quarters of cadet midshipmen, public grounds, &c., at $2.28 per diem, $832.20.

Four attendants at recitation-rooms, library, chapel, and offices, at $20 per month each, $960.

Twenty servants to keep in order and attend to quarters of cadet midshipmen, public buildings, &c., at $20 per month each, $4,800.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingent expenses, $30,000.

Mr. ARCHER. I move, pro forma, to amend by striking out the last word of the clause just read. I wish to put a question to the gentleman who reported this bill. The appropriation recommended in the estimates for contingent expenses is $61,000, while for this item the committee report but $30,000. Now, one of the items embraced in these contingent expenses is $19,000 for coal alone, to heat the navy-yards; $2,000 for the Board of Visitors; about $30,000 for repairs; and several other items are named. Now, I wish to ask whether the committee, in this appropriation of $30,000 for contingent expenses, have provided anything for the repair of the various Government buildings for naval purposes—buildings which are so numerous and extensive?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That is all provided for, as the gentleman will notice, in another part of the bill. The committee did examine into this matter, and made up its mind that, upon this item of contingent expenses for the Naval Academy, $34,000 could be saved; therefore the appropriation of $64,000, made last year, has been cut down to $30,000—a saving of $34,000. Of course the general expense for heating will not vary. But as to one of the large items of the contingencies in the bill of last year, being for the purchase of gas and steam machinery, steam pipe, fixtures, &c., the committee believed that a large saving could be made; that all this amount did not need to be expended next year. So, in the exercise of its best judgment, the committee cut down this contingent from $64,000 to $30,000, believing that the Academy can be run through the coming year with an appropriation of the latter amount for contingent expenses.

Mr. ARCHER. Is not a large portion of the $34,000 recommended simply for the purpose of completing the gas-fixtures of the Naval Academy and grounds, which are partially under contract and the work in progress?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not understand that a large portion will be needed during the next year for this particular object. Before the works are entirely completed in a satisfactory manner larger sums will, probably, be required; but the works are, I believe, in such a state now that during the next year this fund of $30,000 will be sufficient to carry them along in good condition.

Mr. ARCHER. Then, as I understand the gentleman, this bill provides elsewhere for keeping the buildings of the Naval Academy in repair.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Repairs and improvements are in another part of the bill.

Mr. ARCHER. Does the gentleman mean repairs and improvements for the Naval Academy, or only those under the Bureau of Equipment?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. For the whole Academy—everything. We make a distinctive appropriation for that.

Mr. ARCHER. Then I withdraw my formal amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of two thousand privates, and no more, $270,000.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The words "two thousand" in the clause just read are an error in the print. I move to amend by striking them out and substituting "fifteen hundred."

Mr. ARCHER. I make the point of order that that is a proposition to change existing law.

Mr. GARFIELD. This should not be regarded as an amendment. It is simply putting the bill in the form in which it was actually agreed upon by the committee.

Mr. ARCHER. Adopting that view the point of order would still be good, as the right to make points of order on the bill itself was reserved when the bill was reported. The existing law fixes the number of marines at two thousand; and it strikes me the Committee on Appropriations go very far in proposing to change the existing law in this respect by making an appropriation below that which the law requires.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not understand, Mr. Chairman, that the limitation with regard to the force of the Marine Corps is such that it prevents us from legislating in an appropriation bill by way of limitation; that is, that whatever we appropriate shall be applied to the expense of sustaining fifteen hundred as the rank and file of the Marine Corps. I have no doubt about the point of order myself, nor do I think that the limitation of two thousand—not the minimum but the maximum—is such as to prevent Congress at any time, if it chooses, from appropriating for a less number. Now, upon this point, let me say here, as the question has been raised, that I believe, and the committee believes——

Mr. ARCHER. I do not wish to interrupt the remarks of the gentleman, but I wish it to be understood that I still reserve the point of order.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I would be glad to have the ruling of the Chair upon that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that this changes the existing law; that, particularly by the words "and no more," it contravenes existing legislation.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Will the Chair allow me to make a suggestion? I do not think the words "and no more" add anything to the legal force of the amendment, except as a reminder to the corps. It is simply that we appropriate for fifteen hundred, and no more. Now after this appropriation, if those who have charge of the Marine Corps believe that they are authorized to maintain two thousand men, and choose to run the risk of a deficiency, that brings up the question of the law. But has not Congress the right to appropriate and limit its appropriations?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I should like to have the existing law relating to this matter read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ARCHER] will be kind enough to send to the Chair the existing law, that it may be read by the Clerk.

Mr. ARCHER. I cannot at this moment lay my hand on it; but I think it is familiar to gentlemen here.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. It is asking a great deal of the Chair to ask him to decide that a paragraph changes existing law when the law is not before him.

Mr. ARCHER. I can get it in a few minutes if the gentleman wishes it. Meanwhile I ask that the point be reserved.

Mr. BECK. Before we pass from this, I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine a question. According to the bill, $319,760 are necessary for the pay of the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and others; and $270,000 for the pay of two thousand privates. I would like to know why it is that the officers cost so much more than the privates, and how many officers there are.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that I believe that there are altogether too many officers in this Marine Corps. So far as I know, they are very excellent and worthy and accomplished gentlemen. But they have got a list from brigadier-general nearly down to corporal, running, in some grades, up as high as twenty captains, thirty first lieutenants, thirty second lieutenants, and so on it runs, and I believe that is too large. I believe that this corps, first and foremost, is larger than it need be, and therefore the committee, believing it has the right under the law, sought to cut down the force to fifteen hundred.

Now, so far as the officers go, they are fixed by the direct letter of the law just as they are in the regular establishments, and the committee cannot, unfortunately, touch them. That is a subject-matter that my friend from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, should take under his cognizance and see if the Marine Corps cannot be reorganized and cut down, so that its force of men shall bear a proper proportion to its entire force and its expenses.

Mr. BECK. Could we not cut it down by withholding appropriations for some of these officers?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman must know, from his own experience here, that if we fail to appropriate for an officer who has a distinctive rank and distinctive pay by law, all he has to do is to prefer his claim against the Government and he can receive it. It is different, sir, with the force; because if any of these Bureaus or Departments have any regard for a monition from Congress, and if Congress says they shall have but fifteen hundred men, instead of two thousand, they will at once cease to enlist and in a few months the reduction desired by Congress will come about; the force will fall down to the figures we fix.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask the gentleman just one more question. There is an item here of $3,000 for "forage for horses belonging to field and staff officers." We have heard people talk about the "horse marines." Has this anything to do with them? [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] having run out of all his good speeches on the appropriation bill, is now trenching on the ground of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] by referring to this forage paragraph on which the gentleman from New York has every session since I have been here made a gallant raid and a pretty witty speech.

Mr. BECK. I take back my question on that. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I would be glad to think that the gentleman from Maine coincides with me. If he is really desirous of economy he will.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I always think better of the gentleman's wit than of his political sentiments.

Mr. COX. The gentleman ought to be better in his wit and in his political economy. [Laughter.] I send to the desk to be read an amendment to come in after line 302.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Is there an amendment pending?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no amendment pending. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ARCHER] raised the point of order on the paragraph at line 305, and his point of order was by unanimous consent reserved until the gentleman should present the law.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I understood that that being reserved we were now proceeding with the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That from and after the term of the present incumbent as general, no other appointment to that grade shall be made in the Marine Corps.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I must make the point of order on that amendment, because I have not examined it sufficiently to be willing to legislate on that point. I would prefer that the matter should be under the control of the proper committee, who should report some measure in reference to the reorganization of this force, cutting it down, but to strike down a particular officer is not, I think, the right thing to do.

Mr. COX. The same thing was done by the House in reference to the General of the Army and in reference to the Admiral of the Navy. If I were to move to amend by striking out their pay, I might make some remarks, but the remarks would be of no consequence, for I have already made them on this floor.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I would remind the gentleman that the law which he refers to in relation to the Admiral of the Navy was never passed

Mr. COX. It is the general impression that it was.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The Committee on Naval Affairs endeavored to pass it through the House, but they were defeated finally by an amendment put upon it in the Senate, and the bill was lost.

Mr. COX. I would inquire if the Chair rules the amendment out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is new legislation, and therefore not in order. At what point does the gentleman move the amendment?

Mr. COX. At line 302.

The CHAIRMAN. There is another point of order raised; which is, that we have passed that portion of the bill. The bill has been read down to line 307.

Mr. COX. Then, sir, I offer a formal amendment for the purpose of saying only one thing. I have pursued for a couple of years a line of duty with respect to saving, as I conceive, about $1,000,000 on this Marine Corps; but my efforts have been entirely fruitless. Gentlemen have joked the matter down; talked about horse marines, and all that kind of thing. They have not looked to the origin of this corps, or to the question of its necessity on land or sea, or on both, for they are a kind of amphibious corps. But, sir, I will make no further argument as to its utility on land or sea, but I will call the attention of gentlemen who argue for economy to this point, that at certain times, without infringing on anybody's vested rights, the general of this corps might be dismissed honorably. I have therefore proposed only to make the change prospective; I do not want to tear from the Marine Corps a man who has been long associated with it. Nor do I wish to embarrass the members of the committee. I stand with them. But if gentlemen are in earnest about economy they have had an opportunity in this case to make a saving of perhaps some one-half or three-fourths of a million of dollars; and, if I mistake not, the gentleman from Maine who has charge of this bill, and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, do already agree with my own views as to the necessity of getting rid of this remarkable and anomalous corps. Sir, the French navy has no such corps; and although the English navy has one it does not care much for it. It originated there in the time of the old system of press-gangs, in early days, when men were impressed into the naval service in the cities and coast towns of England. It is an old remnant of tyranny. The only excuse offered for it is that it is for police purposes on shipboard. The marines cannot handle a marline-spike or tie a knot. They do nothing but stand around as butts for the sailors. Gentlemen of the dominant party who are in favor of economy have an opportunity to economize now; and I give notice that if they do not choose to do something in this line I will pursue the matter no further.

I do not think this an extravagant bill. I think it is rather in the interest of economy. I think the shrewd gentlemen on the other side have brought in this bill first, because it is rather an economical bill. I think, nevertheless, that the objections of my friend from Maryland [Mr. ARCHER] as to the deficiencies it will incur will prove prophecies.

I expect to vote for the bill; but I trust and hope that gentlemen on the other side of the House will, in every conceivable case, strike down these expenditures as much as possible.

Mr. MYERS. Of late years it has become fashionable, when the naval bill is under consideration, to attack the Marine Corps; and I believe the gentleman who just spoke, every year, when representing a constituency either in Ohio or in New York, has got off his jokes at that corps.

Mr. COX. O, no; that is a mistake; for until I came down to salt water I never knew there was such a corps.

Mr. MYERS. I do not think my friend has much information on the subject now, for I understood him to state that neither France nor England had such a corps. Now, it so happens that England has fourteen thousand marines, besides a large force of marine artillery, and that France has fifteen thousand marines and four thousand "artillerie de marine," who have a right to ride their horses as much as the gentleman, who so often mounts his Pegasus on this floor.

I shall make no factious opposition to this portion of the bill, but I do think the reduction of five hundred men in the marine force an unwise one. The complement of marines on the ships of our several squadrons and on receiving ships is fully thirteen hundred, while to guard all our naval stations, seven in number, and for the drill and discipline so necessary to fit men for the service, only two hundred are allowed, should this reduction pass, and that, too, while in rapid construction of the eight new sloops of war ordered by Congress.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] says that marines have nothing to do on board ships. This is a great mistake. He seems to think the need of this arm of the service has passed away with the days when close encounters at sea were more frequent—the days of cutlasses and small-arms, like those of the Constitution, when the gallant seamen and marines repelled the boarding attack from the Guerriere; but I point him in reply not only to the importance attached to it in the countries I have named, but to the views of our most distinguished naval officers in this era of steam and long-range artillery.

Admiral Farragut said:

I have always deemed the marine guard one of the great essentials of a man-of-war for the preservation of order and maintenance of discipline. * * * They work and fight their guns well.

Admiral Wilkes says:

Since the introduction of steam into our Navy, the necessity of a marine guard on board such vessels is greatly increased. They are the most efficient part of the crew of a steamer, and are regularly called upon to perform duties appertaining to the great guns, at which they are as proficient as sailors and landsmen, besides their ordinary duties, and are essential at all times in guarding the public property.

Vice-Admiral Porter wrote:

If the marines are abolished half the efficiency of the Navy will be destroyed.

Commodore Turner added:

If you please, disband or transfer it, and but a short time will elapse before there will be a clamor from every quarter for its restoration to service.

There are but eighty-seven officers in this corps, or one to thirty men, while in the Army, which is less subject to being broken into detachments, the proportion is almost double. As to the men, when on board ship they keep watch and watch with the sailors; they do guard and relief duty; they pull and haul; they fight the guns in time of war; they are sent on shore to reconnoiter; they are frequently called to fight. We all remember what their services were in the war of 1812 on Lake Erie and Lake Pontchartrain, and, above all, at Bladensburgh; nor can I forget to-day, when the veterans of the Mexican war are meeting in this city, the part they bore in it. Only last year I was able to pass a pension bill for the mother of a brave boy—Lieutenant Welsh, of the marines—who died on the march to the city of Mexico. In the war of the rebellion the marines did their duty, from the boat attack on Fort Sumter all through the engagements of Admiral Farragut, under Dahlgren at Charleston, and Porter at Fort Fisher. Everywhere their record has been good. As Rear-Admiral Stewart said, "If we refer to the past services of the Marine Corps they will be found to be among the most distinguished." If you reduce their numbers then you must employ that many more landsmen.

Their record has been a good one. Their force is but small, and if not employed they must be replaced by others, on land as well as on sea. It costs seventy dollars per month per man for watchmen to guard the stores and the navy-yards, and they are not held to as strict responsibility as a marine, whose cost to the Government is now half that sum. I think the proposed reduction unwise. We should in my opinion have at least two thousand marines, which is five hundred less than now allowed by law; and time will illustrate whether these views are correct.

Mr. COX. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. ARCHER. I renew it for the purpose of saying, in addition to what my honorable friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] has said, that of the number of marines now in service fourteen hundred and forty are now on board ships if the ships have anything like the complement of marines that should be on them. I believe there are now that number on board ships. In the marine barracks here in Washington there are at this time, and are generally, about three hundred marines. They are here for the purpose of drill and instruction, in order to prepare them for sea service. The others making up this full number of twenty-five hundred of which the Marine Corps consists are, as my friend from Pennsylvania said, on duty as watchmen and as guards in the navy-yards, at really about one-third the expense of watchmen proper. They are found to be on all occasions much more serviceable than ordinary watchmen.

Now, with regard to the number of officers being larger in this corps in proportion than in the Army. It arises from the fact that the Marine Corps is divided up into small squads of men to be taken on board ships; and it is necessary to have an officer with each squad to command them. They do not stand in full companies as in the Army, because of the necessary division of the force into squads, for police duties and other duties on board ships.

The duties of the marines are very much greater than my friend from New York [Mr. COX] and others in this House are disposed to give them credit for. I know the old adage, "as lazy as a marine." But they are the fighting crew of the vessel; upon every movement of every gun on board ship the marines are always called in, and are necessary in fighting the guns. They are necessary in effecting landings. About one-half of all the duties they perform are duties which would otherwise pertain to seamen, and would have to be performed by others in the service, if not performed by them.

Really, in looking at the economy of the service alone, I think that no better economy can possibly be used by this House than to preserve the corps as it now stands. With regard to the general at the head of the corps, I think myself that he should not be continued beyond the service of the present incumbent. The office of General of the Army, I believe, has been abolished upon the vacation of the position by General Sherman. I think the office of Admiral of the Navy has been abolished in the same way. I know our committee reported such a provision to the House at the last session. My friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, tells me that it failed in the Senate. I had forgotten that, and thought it had become a law. I think that both with regard to the Admiral of the Navy and the general commanding the Marine Corps such a provision should be made, so that after the present incumbents shall cease to hold their offices no promotions shall be made to those grades. In regard to the proposition to reduce the number of the Marine Corps from two thousand to fifteen hundred, I am sure the Committee on Appropriations are in error in an economical point of view. I have handed to the chairman the law, which fixes the number of marines at twenty-five hundred.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. One word of explanation of the action of the Committee on Appropriations in reference to this Marine Corps. I think the point of order will not stand, on consideration; but that I will not discuss now.

I believe that here is an opportunity within the law for retrenchment. In the view of the committee fifteen hundred men in the Marine Corps, their duty being to patrol and guard naval vessels and establishments, is a sufficiently large number. The whole force of private seamen in the Navy is only eighty-five hundred men as fixed by law. Here it is proposed to keep two thousand men on guard duty, being nearly 25 per cent. of the entire force of seamen in the whole Navy. Does not that proposition settle the matter in the mind of this House? Can there be any need for more than fifteen hundred men in this Marine Corps? If we now fix fifteen hundred as the number, Congress giving its word of direction to the Department, and the enlistment of additional men being stopped, I am by no means certain but that next year it may be found that three hundred or five hundred more may be dispensed with. But the committee has not desired to be so radical in its recommendations for reduction upon any part of this bill as to imperil the fate of the measure or to arouse a spirit of revolt against the committee as having gone too far.

In respect to this Marine Corps, the committee have made reductions in pay, in provisions, in clothing, and in other regards; so that while the bill of last year appropriated for this corps something more than $1,000,000, (I have not the precise figures before me,) the committee have been able to make a reduction of $267,670—a little more than a quarter of a million of dollars saved in this corps alone. In this respect certainly there is, I think, a creditable exhibit. I see that our proposition in this matter has aroused opposition, just as our proposition for a reduction in the civil establishments aroused some opposition; but the Committee of the Whole, passing upon the former question, sustained the Committee on Appropriations, as I hope it will do upon this question, should the chairman, on final consideration, rule the amendment to be in order. Let us see whether, for the year to come, with enlistments stopped, this Marine Corps cannot be cut down to fifteen hundred men. I certainly do not wish to cripple the American Navy; but I think the reduction proposed by the committee can safely be made.

Mr. ARCHER. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. Does the gentleman withdraw his point of order?

Mr. ARCHER. I do not.

Mr. WHEELER. I desire to say to my friend from Maryland that I do not think his point of order well taken. This amendment proposed by the committee does not and cannot affect the force of the Marine Corps as fixed by law. The words "no more" in this clause are simply a limit on the appropriation of money. This bill, in other words, appropriates money enough to pay fifteen hundred privates, and "no more."

Mr. ARCHER. The gentleman will allow me to suggest that the Committee on Appropriations propose to change the bill as reported by making the number fifteen hundred. It is upon the amendment that I make the point of order.

Mr. WHEELER. I am speaking of the amendment proposed by the committee, as I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Maryland be good enough to state again his point of order?

Mr. ARCHER. It is this: the bill as it is before us in print provides for two thousand men for the Marine Corps. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations moves to strike out "two thousand" and insert "fifteen hundred." I make my point of order on that amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. I desire to say to my friend from Maryland that the amendment relates simply to the amount of money which this bill shall appropriate. It does not at all affect, and cannot affect, the force of the Marine Corps as fixed by law. Non constat that this very Congress may appropriate a sum sufficient to pay the remainder of the corps. These words "no more" simply make the limit of the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Maryland to make the point of order that the change from "two thousand" to "fifteen hundred" cannot be made?

Mr. ARCHER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is bound to rule——

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Before the Chair announces the decision on this point of order I would like to say a word in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER.] I cannot understand how a limitation of this kind in an appropriation bill does not change an existing law. The law certainly provides that the Marine Corps shall consist of a certain number of enlisted men. The Committee on Appropriations propose to limit the amount of money appropriated by Congress so that it shall suffice only to pay a smaller number of men.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Might we not, if we chose, strike out the whole appropriation?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Yes, sir; but that is a very different matter.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me put this test question to the gentleman from Virginia. Suppose this Congress should withhold all appropriations for the Marine Corps; is the corps established by law thereby dissolved?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. No, sir; nor is the existing law changed. But when we make an appropriation, and in the same paragraph which makes the appropriation undertake to say what number the Marine Corps shall consist of, I do not think there is any lawyer in the House who will take the amendment and consider the question who will not believe, if we do adopt any such proposition, it will in effect change the existing law. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, whether he does not believe the adoption of the amendment proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations would not compel the Secretary of the Navy to reduce the Marine Corps to fifteen hundred men? Even if that be not his construction, will not that be its effect?

Mr. SCOFIELD. That is not the point before the Chair. The question is whether the amendment limiting the amount of money to be appropriated is in order. The gentleman from Virginia will recollect that for a number of years we struck out of the appropriation bill the salary of the minister to Portugal, because the House did not approve of his conduct in some way or other; but that did not change the law. It did not abolish the office of minister to Portugal.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. In that case neither did the law say that there should be no minister to Portugal.

Mr. SCOFIELD. It did not prevent the President of the United States from appointing a minister to Portugal. The House only would not make an appropriation to pay his salary. Some years afterward, however, when we got sensible, or less so, whichever way it may be considered to be, we appropriated the whole amount for years back, and paid the minister to Portugal his whole salary.

Mr. MYERS. Was not that action or non-action deemed unwise, and did we not admit it was so by our subsequent conduct?

Mr. SCOFIELD. But that has nothing to do with the point of order whether it was wise or unwise.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I cannot yield further, but insist on holding the floor; and if gentlemen have anything to say they can answer in their own five minutes. I wish to say that it would be as lawful, according to the reasoning of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to abolish the Government and all the Departments of the Government. While I admit it is possible for the committee and for the House to make appropriation of any sum they please, I do not think it in order in an appropriation bill to limit in express terms the number of men of which the Marine Corps is to consist, and thereby change the number which is authorized by existing law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say one word in reply to what fell from my friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. COX. I will renew the amendment. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] will concede there is a reform in this bill to the amount of about $380,000.

Mr. CLYMER. About $280,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. Two hundred and sixty-nine thousand dollars on this particular item of the Marine Corps.

Mr. COX. Now, I suppose you gentlemen claim credit for that when you have abused me for years for calling attention to the Marine Corps. [Laughter.] I wish you to give credit for this reform where the credit is due, and modesty forbids me to say who is entitled to that credit. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The committee had the gentleman in mind—it had him in mind, and nobody else—because we wished to satisfy him in order to see if we could not keep him from talking on the Marine Corps, at least on the naval appropriation bill, for this year.

Mr. COX. I suppose the gentleman from Maine never talks himself, or never shows himself here on any subject.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not, unless I have a bill in charge.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, who undertook to take off my colleague from Brooklyn on a matter which transpired yesterday, had better himself inquire whether there are not more ignoramuses than one in connection with our Navy. And that is all I have to say on that subject.

Mr. MYERS. The gentleman from New York must not be so touchy.

Mr. COX. The gentleman has had his time, and I am now making a speech myself. As I said a moment ago, it has always been the reproach of all reformers like myself never to have anything but discredit. [Laughter]. I tell this House confidentially, so it will not go to the reporters' gallery or even to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, that the gentleman who is chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and the other cunning gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] are both friendly to all my propositions on this subject. I convinced them of it two years ago. They are gradually working up to it. They are not fully in accord with all the high ideas of conduct which belong to a statesman. [Laughter.] But we must give them time. Let the House be patient with these men; they are perhaps in some stress. [Laughter.] Elections perhaps have gone awry.

Mr. GARFIELD. We have given the gentleman credit.

Mr. COX. Why did not the gentleman speak in Ohio last fall to support his party? Why did not gentlemen go to New York to save their party there? Why do they not go out with hay-seed in their hair to save their party in the West? [Great laughter.] Now they are going all for economy. There never was such a corps of economists. Last year and the year before they were for every thing like prodigality. They imposed taxes of every conceivable kind, and made appropriations of almost every conceivable character.

But there has been a halt called somewhere. It began out West; it worked its way here; so we have gentlemen coming here on this bill claiming special credit, when everybody knows the humble member who addresses you on this marine business is the man to whom the credit is due. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say only a word on the point of order, and then another word in reply to my friend from New York, [Mr. COX.] I understand it to have been the uniform ruling, since I have known anything of parliamentary law, that Congress can fix any limit to an appropriation that does not change existing law. Any limitation that relates to the particular sums of money appropriated in a particular bill can always be put off. If it goes beyond the bill, and beyond the year, and changes the law generally, it will be out of order. Now what does this do? We simply say that by this bill we will appropriate only enough to pay fifteen hundred marines. We do not know what the Congress may do hereafter, whether they may not appropriate enough to pay for ten thousand marines; but we simply say in this bill that we will appropriate enough money to pay for fifteen hundred marines, and no more, at the rate provided by law. It does not change one line of existing law.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. The law provides that the Marine Corps shall consist of twenty-five hundred men. That is the law—the judgment of Congress.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not that it "shall," but that it "may."

Mr. SCOFIELD. No, sir; the word is "shall."

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the gentleman then say that the Secretary is violating the law?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I do not say that he violates the law. I say the law provides that the Marine Corps shall consist of so many men. The word "shall" does not require that we shall always have precisely that number; but that is the composition of the corps according to the judgment of Congress, the law of the land.

Now, I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio if the Committee on Appropriations has come to the conclusion that fifteen hundred men is all that the country needs, or that the service needs. If they have examined into that question and deliberately come to that conclusion, then of course I suppose they ought to make an appropriation for only fifteen hundred. But as long as the law stands as the judgment of Congress I do not see why they should attempt to overrule the law in that way; not violating the law exactly, but really making it of no account by only appropriating for fifteen hundred. I have not myself examined that question. I am not prepared to say that we ought not to have more than fifteen hundred in the Marine Corps. But what I am asking now of the gentleman is whether his committee has examined into the question, and has come to the conclusion that fifteen hundred is all we need.

Mr. BURCHARD. I desire to ask the gentleman, what is the date of that law?

Mr. SCOFIELD. The Chairman has the law before him. Will the Chair please to answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] as to the date of that law?

The CHAIRMAN. It is the 12th of January, 1858.

Mr. GARFIELD. Now I have spoken only on the point of order, and not at all on the merits of the amendment. I take it I have the support of my friend from Pennsylvania on the point of order; for in his remarks a moment ago I think he took the same ground.

Mr. MAYNARD. Before the gentleman proceeds further, will he allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he thinks this is a statesman-like, fair, and proper mode of changing laws? If we thought six judges of the Supreme Court were enough, would we attempt to change the law by appropriating only for six?

Mr. GARFIELD. Gentlemen are constantly desirous that I shall leave the point of order and discuss the question on its merits; and with the leave of the Chair I am ready to do that.

Mr. MAYNARD. I thought you were doing that now.

Mr. GARFIELD. No, sir. But I will come to that. For several years the missionary from New York, or from Ohio, has been pressing this point on the attention of the House, and we would be poor and dull heathen indeed if we had not taken some notice of the discovery he has made. The committee looked over the question of the Marine Corps with a good deal of care. The law, as the chairman has said, authorizes twenty-five hundred men in the Marine Corps; that is twenty-five hundred officers and men.

Mr. ARCHER. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to the words of the law? They are these: "twenty-five hundred privates."

Mr. GARFIELD. Privates, is it?

Mr. ARCHER. That is the law.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then if the number is below what is provided by law, I am so much the more pleased. But I will tell the gentleman, from the Book of Estimates, what we are asked to appropriate for. We are asked to appropriate for ninety-nine commissioned officers, commencing with one brigadier-general, and going on with one colonel, three lieutenant-colonels, six majors, one adjutant and inspector, one paymaster, one quartermaster, three assistant quartermasters, twenty captains, four captains, (retired,) thirty first lieutenants, thirty second lieutenants, two second lieutenants, (retired.) And then for musicians and non-commissioned officers, to the number of four hundred and seventy-three; then for nine clerks to the brigadier-general commandant and the other officers; then for three messengers and one hospital steward, making a total of twenty-four hundred and eighty-six persons estimated for in the book before us, at an expense, with the forage for horses and with the $30,000 for wood to burn and for all other purposes together, $1,146,767 for the Marine Corps. More than one-fifteenth of all we appropriate for the American Navy is asked for the Marine Corps in this Book of Estimates.

Well, sir, as we are endeavoring to reduce the general expenses of the Navy, we think it would be very unjust to allow this portion of it to hold its present vast proportions. We do not wish to enter upon the question of law. We felt that that was beyond our reach and ought to be taken up by the Naval Committee. But we do have control of the question of recommending appropriations, and we therefore determined to recommend that one-quarter of the strength of the enlisted force should be left out of the account for which we would appropriate money, and by an amendment pending that a deficiency should not be called for or incurred. Now if this is done we can test the working of a plan to reduce and save over a quarter of a million dollars in this single item. But if, by the ruling of the Chair, or the vote of the committee, this should be thrown out, we shall feel compelled to move into the bill a quarter of a million dollars as the result of such ruling or vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has taken counsel with a number of the oldest members of the House, and finds that the practice is to permit limitations upon appropriations which are themselves in order. The Chair feels therefore compelled, under the language of the law before him, to rule that the clause as reported by the committee is in order, and the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] to change the number from two thousand to fifteen hundred, is also in order.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I hope we shall have a vote upon it.

The question was taken on Mr. HALE's amendment; and it was agreed to.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I move, pro forma, to strike out the last word. I have not the slightest desire, Mr. Chairman, to occupy the time of the House in discussing a subject with which I am not familiar. But I desire to say a word in reply to what fell yesterday from the gentleman from Pennsylvania who is chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. His speech yesterday seemed to convey the impression that I was making charges of fraud against the Committee on Appropriations, and he added that it was unwise and impolitic to make such charges without specifications. I desire to say that I had no such intention. I was making inquiries, desiring to be satisfied as to what will be the effect of this bill. The gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. GARFIELD,] in the remarks which fell from him a few moments afterward, used this language:

> The only thing under which I am restive is vague, general, clawing, sweeping charges, to which it is no more possible to reply than it is to kick a cloud with your big toe. If any man comes here and makes a specific charge I welcome him.

Now, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman who has charge of this bill to this fact, that but a few moments ago he stated that there were too many officers in the Marine Corps, and that the number ought to be cut down. The point I make is this: Some time ago I had the honor of offering a resolution for the consideration of the House, which was pertinent to the very matter now under discussion, and which was objected to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania who is chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. I think it would be proper, in order that an opportunity may be given to those gentlemen who think that the Marine Corps is too largely officered, and that economy demands that it be cut down, that that resolution shall be read to the House as a part of my remarks. I therefore send it to the Clerk's desk in order that it may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution of inquiry of the Secretary of the Navy.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, requested to report for the information of this House the names, if any, of all officers now in the United States Marine Corps who, having been appointed to the United States Military Academy, or Naval Academy, were dropped, dismissed, or who failed to graduate at either institution before receiving their appointment in said Marine Corps; also, the names, if any, of all officers now in the United States Marine Corps who failed to pass the examination for admission into said corps, and by what authority of law said appointments, if any, were made.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Chairman, I have had that resolution read merely for the purpose of calling it to the attention of the gentlemen of the Naval Committee, and of the gentleman who has charge of this bill on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations, and that I may ask them whether, if the spirit of economy which they profess to entertain in regard to the appropriations in this bill be really sincere, they will help me when I have an opportunity to present that resolution to the House for consideration and passage in obtaining the information set forth in the resolution.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I think, Mr. Chairman, there is nothing in the resolution that bears upon the question of expenditures of any kind. It was said that some boys who had failed to pass an examination at the Naval Academy had afterwards been appointed, and the information the gentleman sought only tends to bring out the fact that some boys who had at one time failed in that examination had afterwards been appointed. It was designed to disgrace them, probably without the knowledge of the gentleman from Maryland, and the resolution was prompted by some persons in the Navy who wanted to injure some of their fellow-officers in the service. Sir, the resolution would not turn anybody out of the Navy nor affect anybody in it.

Mr. O'BRIEN. If that were really the spirit of the resolution I would have been the last member on this floor to offer it.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I thought that was what prompted it, and therefore I objected to it; at any rate it could have no economical result.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I rather think it would. This information has been given to me; of course I have no personal knowledge of the facts; but if there is any information of this character in the possession of the Secretary of the Navy as to the officers of the Marine Corps, I think we ought to have it; and, sir, if the number of officers in that corps is too great, it would only be proper that that fact should be known and the country saved the expense of the appropriation required to pay the surplus officers. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I now ask that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] that was pending and was passed over informally, may be considered at the end of the bill, where it would come in more properly than at the point where he offered it—after line 7.

Mr. RANDALL. I am not particular about what place in the bill it comes in.

The Clerk read Mr. RANDALL's amendment, as follows:

And any person holding any office or appointment under the authority of the United States who shall contract for, authorize, or consent to any expenditure within any fiscal year over and beyond the appropriation for such year for the purpose for which such appropriation may have been specifically made, or who shall at any time contract for, authorize, or consent to any expenditure over and above appropriations made before such time, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than $1,000 and not more than $10,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to say one word only upon this amendment before it is acted upon. I offered the amendment to this bill because it was the first appropriation bill that came up for action. I did not select the naval appropriation bill for any other reason, nor did I desire to cast any reflection on the administration of the Navy Department in connection with this subject.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. By consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] I move that the word "specifically" be struck out of his amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BECK. I desire to move to further amend the amendment by striking out the words "less than one hundred thousand and not more than," and inserting "exceeding," so that it will read "shall be fined not exceeding $10,000." I do not like these minimums of penalties.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That is right.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to either of the amendments proposed, and will modify my amendment accordingly.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

But that in case of any sudden or extraordinary emergency involving actual war or threatened war or civil commotion, requiring an immediate expenditure beyond and in excess of the amount of appropriation that may be legally used for such purpose, and when the public interest and safety might suffer materially for want of such expenditure, the President may in his discretion, upon the written application of the head of the proper Department, in which application the facts and reasons therefor shall be stated, authorize in writing such necessary expenditure as the exigencies may require, and shall report such action to Congress within the first five days of the next session.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] objects to that amendment.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I agree most fully with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] as to the necessity for the amendment offered by him. If there is any one thing that has demoralized the civil service of the country for the last few years it is the deficiency appropriation bills that are brought in here every session of Congress. It seems to me that something of the kind offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is absolutely necessary.

In the debate upon this bill reference has been made to the deficiencies in regard to the service of erecting public buildings. These deficiencies are not confined entirely to that service. In every Department of the Government the officers are creating deficiencies. Let me refer, for instance, to the Indian Department, and go back a few years. For the fiscal year 1868–'69 the regular appropriation for the Indian service was $2,214,000, while the entire amount expended for that year was $6,900,000, or three times the amount of the appropriation. In 1869–'70 the appropriation was $2,400,000, and the expenditure $3,400,000. In 1870–'71 the appropriation was $3,100,000, and the expenditure $7,456,000. In 1871–'72 the appropriation was $4,000,000, and the expenditure $7,000,000. Therefore, in almost every year, the entire expenditures have more than doubled the appropriation for that service. I say, then, that something of this kind is absolutely necessary in regard to the civil service.

But the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, without the amendment I have offered, it seems to me would place the Government, in case of war or threatened war, in a very precarious position. I think that when we make it a crime, punishable by fine, for an officer to exceed the appropriation, we ought to except the case of war or threatened war. A case in point is that of the Secretary of the Navy just before the meeting of this Congress, when he was required to make some expenditure of money, perhaps, beyond the appropriations. The amendment I have offered has received, I believe, the general approbation of the committee. It has seemed necessary to make the amendment, and I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania will accept it.

Mr. COX. This bill is almost finished, and I beg leave to say but one thing. I have not taken part in the discussion of the details of this bill. Although reference has been made to our Spanish relations by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. SWANN,] I have made no remarks in relation to it. I think one thing should be said about our Navy, and our foreign relations connected with our Navy, and there is no other opportunity except upon this bill to say what ought to be said in this connection.

I do not desire to renew the discussion that came up the other day in respect to the four-million exigency bill. We understand all about that now. I want to vote for this bill, because I do not want to be placed in the predicament of refusing to make our Navy strong and at the same time criticising the policy of the Administration. But if things continue as they now seem likely to continue, I prophesy that before this Congress is over we will have the Virginius affair over again—the same old trouble. I believe it to be wisdom for this Congress to at least acknowledge the independence of Cuba. In that way I believe slavery in Cuba would be abolished. The other side of the House should remember my words in this regard if they would retain a certain class of voters. I believe that free institutions would be encouraged by our independent action here with reference to Cuba. I believe that in this way the assassination of our citizens as well as of English subjects might be properly avenged, and that thus the murderers might be driven from that island.

It may not be necessary to declare war. But our people demand from the Government something which shall be more satisfactory upon this question than anything which has been done heretofore. They do not look with complacency on the fact that the United States minister at Madrid, when his life was threatened, was protected by the interposition of Mr. Laird, the British minister. They do not look with satisfaction upon the fact that the life of our consul, Mr. Phillips, was preserved in Santiago by the British vice-consul, Mr. Ramsden. Why, sir, American missionaries, prisoners in the hands of the brutal Theodorus of Abyssinia, were protected by the interposition of British power. With respect to foreign affairs, our people desire that their nation shall be as strong, as defiant, as thoroughly patriotic, as the British nation.

I think that this Congress owes it to itself to make, by resolution of thanks, some acknowledgment of the gallant conduct of the commander of the British man-of-war Niobe, who by his interposition in behalf of our citizens, before our vessels were able to reach Santiago, prevented the massacre of one hundred and one passengers on the Virginius, who would have been shot on the 7th of December but for his timely arrival and noble demand for the cessation of the brutal executions. The detailed facts as to the gallant conduct of this British officer deserve record. I read from one of the published accounts of the transaction:

An English man-of-war, the Niobe, arrived in port. The captain, on coming into the harbor, did not salute the Spanish forts. He was in his boat before his anchor touched the bottom, and on landing, proceeded straight to the governor's house and peremptorily demanded that the executions should cease. The governor at first declared that he had no right to interfere, but the captain said that in the absence of an American man-of-war he would take the responsibility of protecting American citizens and guarding the honor of the American flag. It is said he gave the governor-general his choice between yielding to his demands or having the city bombarded, and the governor accordingly gave way. Only for the arrival of the Niobe there can be no doubt but that the fifty would have been shot that afternoon. All the Americans in port were loud in praise of the manner in which the captain of the Niobe acted. A few days after his arrival he stated that he came in answer to a telegraphic message from the American consul, sent after the massacre of Captain Fry and the crew, asking to have an American man-of-war dispatched to Santiago de Cuba. There happened to be no American man-of-war at Kingston at the time, but the commander of the Niobe immediately got up steam, and even though he had not his full complement of men, many of them being on shore, without delay started for Santiago de Cuba. One of his first acts was to compel the Spaniards to remove the American flag from the place on the deck of the Tornado, where it had been thrown about and trampled upon for days more like a rag than a flag. He also compelled the governor of Santiago to furnish him with five copies of the official proceedings in regard to the trials—one for himself, one for his commodore, one for the American Government, one for the British, and the remaining one for the American commodore.

Humanity and international comity demand that this Congress should make some acknowledgment of the noble conduct of this British officer who, leaving his station in the British islands, went to Cuba and rescued our citizens from the hands of assassins.

This matter of the Virginius, although it is said to be settled, is not altogether ended. Either the Virginius was an American vessel or she was not. If General Grant tells the truth in his message on this subject she was an American vessel, and the proper consequences of that fact should have followed. If the Virginius was not an American vessel then the Administration is responsible for all the expenditure and humiliation consequent upon our bungling diplomacy.

Sir, I give notice in this House that, on every occasion when I have an opportunity, I shall press my proposition for the recognition of Cuban belligerency or independence. If I cannot get a vote on that, I want a vote expressing, on behalf of the American people, the indignation of this Congress against the inhumanity enacted at Santiago, and a vote of thanks to the gallant commander of the Niobe for saving at least one hundred of our citizens from that terrible massacre.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. This House is supposed to be discussing the naval appropriation bill. I had hoped that we might get through without lugging in Cuba and the Virginius; and I hope now that no gentleman will undertake to deliver upon this bill a speech on the repeal of the bankrupt act, or the disposition of western lands, or the construction of additional railroad facilities, or the salary bill. If any gentleman has a speech on either or all of those subjects, I beg that he will postpone it until we take up some other appropriation bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I have served in Congress some eight or ten years longer than the gentleman from Maine; and Gamaliel does not take lessons from Paul who sits at his feet. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I wish to suggest an amendment which I understand is acceptable to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE.] It is to strike out the words "and civil commotion," and insert "or insurrection."

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I have no objection to that modification.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Now let the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] be read in connection with that of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE.]

The amendments were read.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is the proposition just read liable to a point of order as proposing new legislation upon an appropriation bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It has been admitted by unanimous consent.

Mr. MAYNARD. Then I have this to say upon that amendment; on the one hand it vests a great deal of power in the Executive—entirely too much—or, on the other hand, it is liable to have the effect of arraigning as offenders, men who have no improper intent. There is already a provision of law that no money shall be expended that has not been appropriated. That enactment has been incorporated in our statutes I do not know how often, and we shall again have it presented in the fortification bill. If that provision of law is ever violated with a criminal intent, so as to constitute a misdemeanor on the part of a public officer, then, instead of proceeding against him in this form, articles of impeachment should be reported to the House and preferred against him at the other end of the Capitol. Such a violation of law is a matter to be punished by impeachment, not by indictment, as for a misdemeanor.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I ask the Clerk to read the provision of the existing law to which, I think, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] refers.

The Clerk read as follows:

It shall not be lawful for any Department of the Government to expend in any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or to involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations.

Mr. MAYNARD. If that or any similar provision of law be violated with a criminal purpose, the officer guilty of such violation should be proceeded against under the highest authority we have for the punishment of such offenses—the power of impeachment.

Mr. GARFIELD. The law as it stands at present provides no penalty.

Mr. MAYNARD. There is no need of any penalty. It is a well-understood principle of administration that where an executive officer willfully, knowingly, designedly, violates the law, he should be arraigned at the other end of the Capitol, under the most serious proceeding known to the Constitution.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania eminently proper, notwithstanding the law which has just been read. I see no penalty provided for in that law; and if there was, that applies generally to all appropriations for a Department. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] provides that no officer of the United States shall consent to any expenditure within the fiscal year over and beyond the expenditures for such year for the purpose for which such appropriations may have been made.

We make appropriations that go to the War Department, and when we say what purpose they shall be applied to under this provision no officer of the War Department has the right to transfer them from that purpose to any other; and if he does he shall be liable to such penalty as the court may impose. Before this amendment there was no such mode of punishment provided. I therefore think that is right.

But the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] goes way beyond that; and to that amendment I object, because, under it, I see no reason why the President of the United States should not, on the 5th day of March, when we adjourn at the short session, if you please, increase the Army, increase the Navy, and draw out of the Treasury whatever he may see fit, on the recommendation of the heads of these Departments, to carry on any purpose he sees fit short of actual war, and I am not sure even up to the point of actual war, without the consent of Congress, simply requiring him, five days after we meet, to report the facts to us. These expenditures should be made by Congress alone, and under authority of law, and no power ought to be given to any executive officer of this Government either to increase the Army or Navy or to take a dollar out of the Treasury of the United States without the consent of Congress. The expense of calling Congress together may be great, but it is not anything in comparison to the charges which will follow whenever we empower executive officers to do what the law does not authorize them to do. Therefore, in a few words, I shall vote against it; and if the yeas and nays can be had in the House, when we go back there, I hope they will be required.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I trust the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit me to offer an amendment in line 8, inserting after the word "time" the words "knowing the same to be an expenditure not authorized by law." This amendment, as it is proposed, creates and defines the crime which it punishes. Therefore a crime is committed whenever the phraseology of the statute is satisfied, and an indictment following the statute would be good, the result of which is that no scienter, no knowledge on the part of the parties transgressing the law, is required to be found as a fact by a jury in order to procure conviction. I think, under this proposition, the President of the United States, the head of any Department, or any other public officer authorizing the expenditure of a dollar, under what may be deemed a mistaken construction of a doubtful phrase in an appropriation bill, is liable to be convicted of a misdemeanor and fined at least $10,000. The object of the amendment is to require guilty knowledge to be proved.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Is it not a maxim of law that every person should know the law?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. That does not apply to the case where the statute defines the crime without requiring the scienter, or guilty knowledge.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit to the gentleman from Massachusetts whether it is not the duty of every officer to know the law.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The insertion of the word "willful" would accomplish the whole thing.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that it is the duty of every executive officer of the Government who is clothed with the power to spend the public money to know exactly what the law is.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. There is not probably an appropriation bill ever passed by Congress in regard to which a great many members of the House that passed it would not honestly differ as to the precise meaning of some of its provisions. A Government officer is obliged to act; he cannot say "I will not spend any money," because it is his duty to make such expenditures as the law requires. The jury is not required to have proved the fact of guilty knowledge.

Mr. RANDALL. I would rather leave that to the judgment of the jury than to put it in here, for it would produce great difficulty in enforcing punishment upon the guilty officers who spend the public money without authority of law.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. This provision as originally drafted subjects the President of the United States perhaps, and the head of every Department and Bureau without any peradventure, to a trial, liable to be held and convicted as criminals, subject to heavy fines, provided they honestly err in expending an appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] accept the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR?]

Mr. RANDALL. I do not.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to oppose the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Two amendments are already pending, and debate is exhausted upon them. The question is upon the amendment moved by the gentleman from Iowa to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Here the committee informally rose.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed the bill (S. No. 29) to authorize the Secretary of War to ascertain the amount of expense incurred by the territorial authorities of Dakota for arms, equipments, military stores, supplies, and all other expenses of the volunteer forces of the Indian war of 1862.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments to the bill of the House (H. R. No. 795) making appropriations to pay the salaries of the Official Reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MORRILL of Maine, Mr. ANTHONY, and Mr. STEVENSON conferees on the part of the Senate.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa will be adopted. The amendment originally offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is, I think, in the right direction. I could have wished that it could have been put on some other appropriation bill, because the Navy Department is exceptional in this matter of deficiencies, and, as I have frequently said before, does not expend more money than is appropriated. But the gentleman offering the amendment has declared that he has only offered it as an amendment to this bill because it is the first appropriation bill, meaning to make no reflection by implication on the Secretary of the Navy or his Department.

The amendment meets, for all time to come, what has been a pernicious thing heretofore—that executive officers at the head of Departments and Bureaus do not heed the warnings of Congress as to the amount of money to be expended. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania seeks to cut out, to extirpate, that wrong practice, and provides a penalty wherever it can be done. So far so good. Now the gentleman from Iowa, recognizing that there may be such an emergency when Congress is not in session, and where prompter action is needed than can be furnished by the assembling of Congress, puts into the hands of the President of the United States, the highest executive power, this authority: that in case of sudden emergency involving war, actual or threatened, or insurrection, the President may authorize, upon written application from the head of the Department, in writing, expenditure necessary and such as the needs of the country demand; and provides that that shall be reported immediately to Congress on its assembling.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this proposition of the gentleman from Iowa, joined to the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, presents a matter of some difficulty. I recognize that it strikes down, more profoundly than we can go here, into considerations which we cannot wholly enter into. But is there any real objection, provided that it is admitted that there may be contingencies such as may arise in any year in the administration of the Government, to giving this power to the President? Why, sir, it has been said that under it, as soon as Congress adjourns, the President may increase the Army and the Navy. The human imagination may devise more terrific things than that. But is it likely to occur? Is it a real objection in the path of our legislation? If we adopt the amendment, with the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, any President who shall rankly violate the letter of the law fixed by this amendment, by doing what has been suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky, would be tenfold over liable to impeachment. No President, sir, would venture upon that. If war was threatened or imminent, as may have been the case in the month of December, temporary measures could be taken. But so far as any increase of any of the military establishments of the country goes, the moment that Congress assembles it is entirely in the hands of that body to discharge or reduce the force, and to bring it to the old figure; so that the difficulty raised by the gentleman from Kentucky does not seem to be a practical difficulty.

The legislation itself is undoubtedly, I will not say extreme, but marked in a very great degree with rigidness. Something of the kind is needed. Now if we legislate in that direction, let us so limit it that in any sudden needs, such as are constantly arising, and of which we had an instance recently, power to make it somewhat flexible may be left with the highest officer of the Government. I hope both amendments will be adopted.

Mr. RANDALL. On reflection I will interpose no objection to the use of the word "willful."

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I think the gentlemen must see that the word "willful" does not meet the point. The point is that the officer expending the money must know that it is an excess of appropriation. I have made a phrase which covers that.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 8, after the word "time," insert these words: "Knowing the same to be an expenditure not authorized by law;" so that it will read:

Or consent to any expenditure over and above appropriations made before such time, knowing the same to be an expenditure not authorized by law, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, &c.

Mr. RANDALL. I would suggest a modification of the language, so as to make it "knowing the same to be in excess of the appropriation," instead of "not authorized by law."

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I have no objection to that change, if the gentleman likes it better.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. It seems to me that our generous friend from Pennsylvania should not at this time have introduced his amendment. By the law of the land no Department of the Government can exceed its appropriation; but the learned gentleman says by the practice of the land they do it every year. Now, if by the practice of the land they do it every year, there is a method of righting that otherwise than by a petty indictment in a criminal court.

In all civilized governments, while the power of making war rests with the crown, the power of making appropriations rests generally with the parliament. Now, here the war-making power and the appropriating power are both combined in the legislative body. Now, sir, in this state of circumstances it seems to me that when we recur to what has so recently taken place with reference to the responsibility assumed by the Secretary of the Navy, and when we remember the gallant response of the whole country to that action when it was found that the honor and dignity of the nation had been maintained, it seems to me that this amendment which the generous gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has offered is improper. The power of impeachment exists in all governments, and I think the House would be wiser to let the law in reference to this matter remain as it is.

Mr. RANDALL. In answer to what has been said by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SCUDDER] I will only say that I presented this amendment to this bill merely because it was the first appropriation bill offered.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. Why not, if necessary, pass a general law upon this subject?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I think this debate shows the wisdom of the rule that we should not undertake general legislation in an appropriation bill. We have had no better example of the viciousness of that practice than this. I dislike both the amendment and the amendment to the amendment, in this place at any rate; but lest there should be danger of their passing here, I wish to say a few words, especially against the amendment to the amendment. It seems to confer certain dim and indistinct but very large powers upon the President of the United States. It involves the question of conferring upon one person the power of peace or of war, and the expenditure of millions, that power to be exercised at the will and at the judgment of the officer in whose hands they are placed. Sir, I can understand that there might be circumstances under which the President, or a Department of the Government would be bound by patriotic considerations to go beyond the limits of the law. I suppose, sir, that President Lincoln did it during the war, and Congress justified him in it. But in doing it he took his life, so to speak, in his hands.

Sir, I would rather that the President should do it in that way than that we should confer upon him certain dusky, dim powers, making him practically a dictator. I prefer not to clothe him with powers that might be dangerous to the country in the hands of a bad man. We are legislating for all time, and I do not think we ought to rashly and hastily place upon a general appropriation bill a provision of this kind. The subject is one of sufficient importance to demand that it should be placed in a separate bill, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for that deliberate consideration which its importance demands. I shall vote against both the amendment and the amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the amendment to the amendment, offered by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. I ask the Clerk to read two lines, which I have marked with pencil, in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa; and I wish the committee would listen to the reading of those two lines.

Mr. BECK. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry, and it is, whether there is any amendment pending to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa?

The CHAIRMAN. The first amendment pending is that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] to which the gentleman from Iowa moves an amendment; which is, of course, an amendment in the second degree and terminates the power of amendment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Let us now have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will first read the two lines of the amendment marked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. I hope the committee will listen to the reading, so that they may know exactly what we are voting on.

The Clerk read as follows:

And when the public interests and safety might suffer materially for want of such expenditures.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Now, sir, that authorizes the officer to determine when the public interests would suffer, and then he may violate the laws which we have made, as well as the proposed amendment offered by my colleague, [Mr. RANDALL.] If he determines that the public interests would otherwise suffer, then, under this amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, he would be authorized to put his hands into the Treasury of the United States and take money from it to any extent he might see fit. He may do it in case of threatened war, or in case of threatened insurrection, or when in his judgment the interests of the country demand the expenditure.

Mr. RANDALL. I think if the gentleman will let the whole amendment be read he will see that that construction cannot be put upon it.

The amendment of Mr. LOUGHRIDGE, as modified, was read, as follows:

But that in case of any sudden or extraordinary emergency involving actual or threatened war or insurrection, requiring an immediate expenditure beyond and in excess of the amount of appropriation that may be legally used for such purpose, and when the public interest and safety might suffer materially for want of such expenditure, the President may, in his discretion, upon the written application of the head of the proper Department, in which application the facts and reasons therefor shall be stated, authorize in writing such necessary expenditure as the exigency may require; and shall report such action to Congress within the first five days of the next session.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let me suggest that by the omission of the word "and" at the beginning of the clause referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] the construction the gentleman suggests will not be possible.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I have no objection to that modification, and will make it.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say one word. If the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] is to be passed at all—and I hope it will not—then I suggest that there should be inserted before the last clause these words, "and if the President shall make such expenditures as is herein provided for, he shall call Congress to convene at the earliest practicable moment;" so that portion of the amendment will read:

The President may in his discretion * * * * authorize, in writing, such necessary expenditure as the exigency may require; and if the President shall make such expenditure as is herein provided for, he shall call Congress to convene at the earliest practicable moment, and shall report such action to Congress within the first five days of the next session.

I think it is the most dangerous power possible to place in the hands of the President—I do not allude to any particular President, for we are making laws for all time—to make such expenditures as he may see fit six or eight months in advance of the meeting of Congress. He might involve the country in war long before Congress could convene and take action in the premises.

Mr. RANDALL. I would certainly accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] were it not that the amendment is not mine, but one proposed to mine by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE.] However, for the purpose of giving the gentleman an opportunity to offer it, I will accept the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, and make it a part of my own, and then yield to the gentleman from Kentucky to move his amendment.

Mr. BECK. Then I move the amendment I have indicated.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Is that in order?

Mr. RANDALL. I understood that it was not objected to by the gentleman from Iowa and those who think with him in this respect. Therefore I accepted the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa as a part of my own, in order to allow the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to move his amendment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I think we had better take the question first on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. RANDALL. As the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] in charge of this bill desires to have a vote taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, and as the gentleman from Kentucky can move his amendment to that if it shall be adopted, I think I will withdraw my acceptance of that amendment.

The question was then taken on the amendment moved by Mr. LOUGHRIDGE; and upon a division—ayes 33, noes not counted—it was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the modified amendment of Mr. RANDALL.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Of course it is not competent in Committee of the Whole to move to refer this whole matter to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Then I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I hope not; let us remain in committee till this bill is finished.

The motion that the committee rise was not agreed to upon a division—ayes 49, noes not counted.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that my amendment, as modified, be again read.

The amendment, as modified, was read, as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

And any person holding any office or appointment under the authority of the United States who shall contract for, authorize, or consent to any expenditure within the fiscal year over and beyond the appropriations for such year for the purpose for which such appropriation may have been made, or who shall at any time contract for, authorize, or consent to any expenditure over and above appropriations made before such time, knowing the same to be an expenditure in excess of the amount authorized by law, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not exceeding $10,000.

The question was taken upon the amendment; and upon a division there were—ayes 60, noes 86.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. RANDALL called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. RANDALL, and Mr. PLATT of Virginia, were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 71, noes 82.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move that the committee now rise and report the bill and amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. E. H. ROBERTS reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the special order, being House bill No. 1013, making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1875, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, and to recommend that the amendments be concurred in and the bill, as amended, passed.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I call the previous question on the bill and amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments were concurred in.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE, of Maine, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 202) to remove the legal and political disabilities of William Steele, of Bexar County, Texas.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Petitions, memorials, &c., were introduced and referred under the rule, as follows:

By Mr. ARCHER: The petition of John R. Bond, for relief—Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. ARTHUR: The memorial of Dr. William H. Curran, of Harrison County, Kentucky, late assistant surgeon of the Twentieth Regiment Kentucky Volunteers, asking for his pay from the 1st day of October, 1862, to January 1, 1862—Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BANNING: The petition of Michael Coloty, asking to be placed upon the pension-roll—Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CESSNA: The petition of citizens of Bedford County, Pennsylvania, for the repeal of the second section of the act of June 6, 1862, which made a reduction of 10 per cent. of duties on cottons, woolens, iron, steel, and other commodities, and remonstrating against increased taxation on tea and coffee, or the revival of internal taxes—Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CHIPMAN: The petition of Mary Barry, for relief—Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. CLAYTON: Petition of John A. Plummer & Co., of California, asking increase in duty on salt—Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, memorial of J. H. Carroll, of California, asking that duty on chiccory be increased—Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. COX: Several petitions of citizens of New York State, for appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the liquor traffic—Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, the memorial of E. D. Morgan & Co., in relation to "$20,000 acceptances of John B. Floyd, Secretary of War," 22d August, 1860—Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. FARWELL: The petition of Henry A. Edwards, for a pension—Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GARFIELD: A petition of citizens of Cleveland, Ohio, in relation to the appropriation for the harbor of Ashtabula, Ohio—Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. HANCOCK: Memorial and petition of A. J. Cotten and M. S. Cotten, relating to French spoliations—Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut: The petition of James B. Cleaveland and other citizens of Bloomfield, Connecticut, asking the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the liquor traffic—Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HURLBUT: The petition of D. K. Cook and other citizens of Illinois, praying an amendment to the Constitution appropriating all incomes of individuals over $5,000 a year to the payment of the public debt, &c.—Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MARTIN: The petition of George Young and others, for pensions—Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of George Young and others, for back pension—Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MELLISH: The petition of William Gallaudet, Peter Smith, and others, of New York City, requesting Congress to provide for the appointment of a commission to inquire in regard to the results of prohibitory legislation, &c., and to recommend what legislation on the part of Congress would be beneficial to suppress, in the sphere of national authority, the traffic in alcoholic liquors—Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. NEAL: The petition of Elizabeth Wolf, widow of John T. Wolf, of the Maryland volunteers, for pension—Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. NIBLACK: The memorial and proofs of Nancy C. Marlette, widow of John C. Marlette, late deceased, for relief as a pensioner, &c.—Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PLATT, of Virginia: The memorial of William Falls, of Alexandria County, Virginia, asking damages for property taken and destroyed by the United States Army during the war—Committee on War Claims.

Also, a petition from citizens of Southampton County, Virginia, for the establishment of a post-road from Wakefield, Virginia, to Assamoosick, Virginia—Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

By Mr. RANDALL: The petition of George W. Puttman, for a pension—Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SMITH, of New York: A memorial from the laboring men of Elmira, New York, praying for protection against the evils resulting from the cooly trade—Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SMITH, of Ohio: The petition of 137 citizens of the third district of Ohio, asking for the establishment of an international court of arbitration for the settlement of disputes between nations—Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. SPRAGUE: The petition of Moses Smith and other members of Company B, Thirty-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, for the extension to them of the provisions of the bounty act of April 22, 1872—Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SWANN: The petition of Susan Wheeler, Sarah W. Scott, and others, of Baltimore, Maryland, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the liquor traffic—Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SYPHER: The petition of W. W. Handlin, for relief—Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WHITTHORNE: The memorial of Columbia Lodge No. 31, for compensation for destruction of Jackson College, Tennessee—Committee on War Claims.

Also, the memorial of Judge C. B. Davis and other officers of the State of Tennessee, for compensation for the destruction of the jail of Lawrence County by the United States forces—Committee on War Claims.

Also, the memorial of Mrs. W. H. Polk, for damages done to and use of certain real estate by the United States troops—Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin: The petition of the General Lodge of Good Templars of Wisconsin, signed by its officers, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the liquor traffic—Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WOODFORD: Petitions of P. P. Page and others, and of Stephen Valentine and others, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the liquor traffic—Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, the petition of Stephen Valentine and other citizens of Brooklyn, New York, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the liquor traffic—Committee on the Judiciary.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 16, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SCOTT presented the petition of the firm of Dialogue & Wood, of Philadelphia, praying compensation for extra labor, work, and materials furnished in building a coast-survey steamer for the United States Government; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of Samuel Whitson and many other citizens of Penningtonville, Pennsylvania, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SCOTT. I also present the petition of William Wheeler Hubbell, asking for an improvement in the currency, with elasticity in volume for local necessities determinable by local or State authority, and suggesting how those ends may be accomplished. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of 500 citizens of Oregon, asking for the establishment of a mail-route from Eugene City, Lane County, Oregon, to Upper Ochoco Post-Office, Wasco County, Oregon; a petition of citizens of Susanville and North Fork in Grant County, and Willow Creek in Umatilla County, Oregon, praying the establishment of a post-route between Cañon City and Scott's Post-Office, on the Dalles and Walla Walla road; a petition of citizens of Linn County, Oregon, asking the establishment of a weekly mail-route from Scio, bearing northeast to Mount Pleasant, Jordan Valley, and Fox Valley, in that State; a petition of citizens of Cole's Valley and French Settlement, Douglas County, Oregon, praying the establishment of a post-route between the Umpqua River and Looking Glass, in that county; a petition of citizens of Wasco and Umatilla Counties, Oregon, praying for the establishment of certain mail-routes and post-offices in those counties; the petition of Z. B. Moss, of Crawfordsville, Oregon, praying the establishment of a mail-route from Lebanon to certain places to intersect the Brownsville, Mohawk, and Eugene mail; and a petition of citizens of Grant County, Oregon, and of citizens of Nevada, praying the establishment of a mail-route from and between Cañon City, Grant County, Oregon, and Winnemucca, Humboldt County, Nevada; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented a petition of citizens of South Boston, Massachusetts; a petition of members of the Neponset-avenue church of Boston, Massachusetts, Rev. James F. Morton pastor; and a petition of 115 citizens of Bridgewater, Massachusetts, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TIPTON presented a petition of citizens of the State of Nebraska, praying for the establishment of a mail-route from Orton in Seward County, to Clarksville in Merritt County, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented the petition of the Park Presbyterian church of Newark, New Jersey, signed by its pastor and officers, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALLISON. I present the petition of the Chicago, Clinton, and Dubuque Railroad Company, and of the Chicago, Dubuque, and Minnesota Railroad Company, praying that such action be taken by Congress as will compel the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad Company to open the bridge across the Mississippi River at Clinton, Iowa, to the use of these companies and such others as may now or hereafter desire the use of the same; and also the concurrence of the Board of Trade of the city of Chicago in this petition. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented a petition of Hiram Carlton and others, citizens of Vermont, praying that a pension be granted to Fanny Newcomb, of Waitsfield, Vermont, on account of services rendered by her son, Irenus P. Newcomb; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SPENCER presented the petition of Mrs. Alme D. Brooks, widow of General W. T. H. Brooks, late of the United States Army, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BOREMAN presented a petition of citizens of West Virginia, praying the establishment of a mail-route from Webb's Mills, Ritchie County, to Big Bend, Calhoun County, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, presented the petition of O. H. Makensie, jr., and other citizens of Woodstock, Vermont, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LEWIS. I present the petition of Guerdon Chapin; and I deem it my duty to remark that this petition has been adversely reported upon, but there is some other evidence which the petitioner desires to bring before the Committee on Claims. I had a conversation with the chairman of that committee, the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTT,] and he told me that it would be necessary to introduce new evidence. The petitioner asks leave to go before the committee again and make an explanation and bring additional proof before the committee. I do not know whether it is exactly in form or not, but I present the petition.

Mr. SCOTT. I did not hear the statement of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. LEWIS. I present the petition of Guerdon Chapin, a retired officer of the United States Army, a resident of Culpepper, Virginia, a disabled soldier, whose property was destroyed in 1861 in Arizona Territory. The Senator will recollect that I called his attention to this matter a few days ago, after he had made a report upon it. Colonel Chapin has since drawn up another petition, and asks to be allowed to introduce before the committee additional evidence.

Mr. SCOTT. Does the petition set out the evidence upon which he now relies that was not before the committee when the matter was considered before?

Mr. LEWIS. I have glanced over it hastily, and I do not think it does. That is the reason I call your attention to it.

Mr. SCOTT. I shall feel bound to object to any case which does not come within the spirit and the letter of the forty-ninth rule of the Senate, so that when a petition is presented and new evidence set forth in it, the committee will be able to ascertain by looking at the new evidence, without going over the whole case, whether it ought to be reviewed. I trust the Senator from Virginia will give his attention to that rule, and see whether the petition comes within it, before it is presented.

Mr. LEWIS. I do not think there is any new evidence in the paper, though I glanced over it but hastily.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator withdraw the petition for the present?

Mr. LEWIS. Let it lie on the table, and I will examine it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will lie on the table.

Mr. LEWIS presented a petition of D. L. Santee and other citizens of Richmond, Virginia, and the petition of Charles W. Logan and other citizens of Richmond, Virginia, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I present the petition of Elizabeth Montgomery, heir of Captain Hugh Montgomery, praying compensation for the services of her father in the revolutionary war. These are the same papers for the withdrawal of which from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims I obtained an order a few days ago, my object being to get from among the papers a private paper which had no relevancy to the case, and which was important to the party to whom it belongs. I therefore present the petition again, and move its reference to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented papers supplemental to the petition of Joanna W. Turner, praying for a pension; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to Senate resolution of January 5, 1874, the papers in the case of W. T. Cheatham, distiller, in the second district of Kentucky; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. SPENCER, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Charles W. Biese be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. SPENCER, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of M. Von Entress Fuersteneck be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Have there been any adverse reports in those cases?

Mr. SPENCER. Not that I am aware of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If adverse reports have been made copies of the papers will be retained, and these orders will be entered.

On motion of Mr. FENTON, it was Ordered, That George S. Wright have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. FENTON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Martha G. Vaughn and Louisa Jackman be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of William M. Cooper, praying compensation for supplies furnished to soldiers in Philadelphia during the war, reported adversely thereon; and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 211) to amend the charter of the Columbia Railway Company of the District of Columbia, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Elizabeth F. Thompson, praying for a pension, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 316) granting a pension to Elizabeth F. Thompson.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No 218) to enable the Secretary of the Interior to make final settlement with the Pottawatomie Indians of Michigan and Indiana under treaty stipulations existing with them, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Henry C. Smith, late second lieutenant Sixteenth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, praying for arrears of pay, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 317) for the relief of Henry C. Smith, of Indianapolis, Indiana.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PATTERSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Captain George W. Jackson, praying for a pension for services in the war of 1812, reported adversely thereon; and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Amelia Ferguson, praying to be allowed a pension, reported adversely thereon; and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Hannah W. Vreel, of New Jersey, praying for a pension on account of the services of her father, Jonathan Barbrick, in the revolutionary war, reported adversely thereon; and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

PUBLICATION OF DEBATES.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 718) to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1873, to report back the same without amendment, and recommend its passage. It relates to the current business of both Houses of Congress, and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, which proposes to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1873, by adding to the proviso in the clause of the act relating to the public printing and binding the following words: "and of the House of Representatives."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the bill explained.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, at the close of the last session of Congress the contract for printing the debates of Congress expired by its own limitation; and hence on the 4th of March there would be no provision made for publishing the debates of Congress. There was to be, as was well-known, a special session of the Senate, and there would be no session of the House of Representatives; and in order that the debates might be printed this proviso was inserted in an appropriation bill, which is to be amended by the bill under consideration:

Provided, That until a contract is made, the debates shall be printed by the Congressional Printer, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing on the part of the Senate.

There was to be no committee on the part of the House, and therefore it was necessarily confined to the committee on the part of the Senate. The House of Representatives is now organized, has a Committee on Printing, and it is proper that it should share in the responsibility of the work.

Mr. HAMLIN. Before my friend takes his seat, I should like to put a question to him, which he may or may not be able to answer. I think there can be no objection, under his explanation, to the bill; I make none; but at the time that proviso was adopted, according to my recollection, we had estimates of the Public Printer as to what would be the cost of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The question I want to ask is, whether the debates are published within those estimates, or whether the cost of publication does not greatly exceed those estimates? Can the Senator inform me?

Mr. ANTHONY. Of course the RECORD has not been printed long enough to enable me to answer that question with entire accuracy. Here is what the Congressional Printer says in his report:

Under a resolution of Congress, passed March 3, 1873, the important and laborious work of printing the proceedings and debates of Congress was transferred to this Office, and on the 5th day of March, 1873, the first copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in quarto form, containing a full report of the proceedings and debates of the first day of the special session of the Senate, made its appearance. The change in the form and style of this publication from that previously followed by the Globe was induced by a desire to secure comeliness, convenience, and economy for the work; and I am gratified in the assurance that it meets the hearty approval of the Senate and such members of the House of Representatives as have given the matter their careful attention.

The publication of the proceedings and debates during the special session of the Senate gave fair opportunity for testing the capacity of this Office for the work; and I am fully convinced, under that experience, that promptness and economy are secured by the transfer. The facilities of the Office are so extensive that prompt publication of the proceedings and debates of any day's session, no matter how extended or voluminous, will be assured the following morning without a peradventure, if the copy thereof is promptly furnished the Printer. Of the economy of performing this service at the Government Printing Office there can be no doubt. Its resources are so manifold, and its economy of labor and material is such, that at least 30 per cent. of the money heretofore expended in accomplishing this work will be saved to the Government through the present arrangement, which places it under the superintendence of the Congressional Printer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That does not answer the question at all.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the only answer I can make to the question. I have not investigated the matter personally, but the Congressional Printer is a sworn officer of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He does not say it is within the estimates. He says it is economically done.

Mr. ANTHONY. He has told me that it is printed within the estimates.

Mr. HAMLIN. It seems to me that that answer, if it is to be taken as it reads, tells us that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is printed at 30 per cent. less than what we formerly paid for the publication of the debates. The last clause read, if it means anything, means that. Will the Senator please read it again?

Mr. ANTHONY. "Its resources"—those of the Government Printing Office—"are so manifold, and its economy of labor and material is such that at least 30 per cent. of the money heretofore expended in accomplishing this work will be saved to the Government through the present arrangement."

Mr. HAMLIN. Thirty per cent. less?

Mr. ANTHONY. I so understand it.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am very glad to hear it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So am I.

Mr. ANTHONY. At the same time it must be manifest that the question cannot be fully decided until we have gone through a whole session of Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BUSTS OF FORMER CHIEF JUSTICES.

Mr. HOWE. The Joint Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 61) providing for busts of the late Chief Justice Roger Brooke Taney and Salmon Portland Chase, to be placed in the Supreme Court room of the United States, have instructed me to report it back with amendments; and as it is in reference to a couple of busts for the Supreme Court room, if there be no objection, I should like to have it considered at the present time.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendments reported by the Committee on the Library were, in line 4 of section 1 to strike out after the word "authorized" the words "and required to contract with a suitable artist for the execution in marble, and delivery," and to insert in lieu thereof "to procure and place;" and in section 2, line 4, after the word "appropriated," to strike out the words "for the purpose and paid," so as to make the bill read, if amended:

That the Joint Committee of the two Houses of Congress on the Library be, and they are hereby, authorized to procure and place in the room of the Supreme Court of the United States busts of the late Chief Justice Roger Brooke Taney and of the late Salmon Portland Chase.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of carrying this act into effect the sum of two thousand five hundred dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BOUTWELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 318) to provide for the appraisement of merchandise in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 319) making retirement in the Army and Marine Corps after a certain age obligatory; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 320) to increase the Pay Department of the Army; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 321) authorizing appointments and promotions in the Medical and Ordnance Departments of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPENCER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 322) granting a pension to Mrs. Alme D. Brooks; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 323) for the relief of Charles W. Biese, late second lieutenant of the Eighty-second Regiment of Illinois Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 324) for the relief of M. Von Entress Fuersteneck, late second lieutenant of the Sixty-eighth New York Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LEWIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 325) to remove the political disabilities of Van R. Morgan, of Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ROBERTSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 326) for the delivery to James M. Betts, receiver, of certain bonds now in the Treasury of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. LEWIS. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. MORTON. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion for the present. We ought to dispose of the resolution in relation to the finances this week. There is a great deal of important business pending. Unless it is very important to the Senator, I hope he will withdraw the motion.

Mr. LEWIS. I withdraw it for the present.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of the post-route bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 798) to establish certain post-routes.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President——

Mr. MITCHELL. Before the Senator proceeds I wish to correct an error. Yesterday an amendment was inserted, on my motion, after the word "Ohio," in line 321. I find, on consultation with the Postmaster-General, that there was a mistake. One of the points I intended to insert was omitted. I move now to reconsider——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion will not be in order until the pending amendment is disposed of. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PATTERSON.]

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, the postal service is one which directly benefits the people, and reminds them that the Government has some other dealing with them than mere taxation. The advantage to the citizen of being able to send for three cents a letter all over the country, to any part of the United States, is certainly a great boon. As I say, it is one of the ways which the Government infrequently takes of reminding the citizen that it is disposed to labor for him as well as to extract money from him; and I think, in our discussions upon measures of this kind, we ought to keep this principle in view: that it, like some few other features of Government administration, is designed rather to benefit the people than to afford revenue to the Government.

Now, sir, the increase which has taken place within a few years past in the expenses of the Post-Office Department has not arisen in any great degree from the increase of mail-routes. As I remarked yesterday, the increase of the population of the United States has been 25 per cent. in each decade, or two and a half per cent. per year, and the increase proposed by this bill (and it is the annual bill, and will embrace nearly all the increase for the current year) is only about 2 per cent. It is not the cause of the greater cost, for the reason that very many of the mail-routes which are named in the annual bill are simply changes of routes, frequently shorter distances between important points, as new roads are made, new wagon-roads, or other means of communication, and as new settlements are made, by which, in fact, sometimes the expenses of the Government for carrying the mails are decreased rather than increased. But were it otherwise—were it true that every additional mail-route which is declared by this and all similar bills added expense to the Government—nevertheless, by means of these added miles, by these additional communications, there is access to the new States and Territories, and the people in the old States, as well as the new, are benefited by this extension of postal service.

If the amendment should be adopted which was proposed yesterday by the Senator from Vermont, and referred subsequently in the form of a resolution to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, that every post-route should be cut off which did not pay one-half of its expenses, it would very seriously reduce, and perhaps reduce by one-half, all the postal service in the Northwestern States, and in the Southwestern States, and in California. It would probably abolish the whole mail service in the State of Nevada, except to Virginia City; in the State of Oregon, in Utah, in Colorado, in Arizona, and in the Territories generally, unless there were an exception in the case of those which are traversed directly by the Pacific Railroad.

No such consequence as this should be contemplated by the Senate. But an opposition to a mere mail-route bill like this, on account of an increase in the expenses of the Post-Office Department, is in the same direction, because there are movements of population; there is this great increase of population which I speak of every decade. They increase not only in the cities like New York, Boston, and Chicago, but they move out West. There they make new communities. And it is just as necessary for the citizen in Boston to be enabled to write to his agent in Colorado, who is selling goods there for him or managing his mine or his mill, as it is for that agent, or any citizen of Colorado, to write to the citizen of Boston. The advantage is alike to all parts of the country.

Now, sir, there has been, I confess, a considerably large increase in the percentage of the cost of administering the mail service over the amount of revenue; but that is not owing in any large measure to the extension of the service by means of new mail-routes, but is owing to several causes to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate, hoping that the chairman of the Post-Office Committee, or the committee, or some one who has this matter particularly in charge under the rules of the Senate, will see if it is not possible to amend the general post-office laws, so that we may bring the expenditures of the Post-Office Department down within some reasonable degree, and yet make the post-office service what it was designed to be by the Constitution and the ordinarily understood policy of our laws—merely a medium for the transmission of intelligence.

One reason why there is such a large increase in the expenditures each year is that you have by your postal laws, and notably by the codified code recently enacted, an iron system for the increase of the salaries of postmasters, whereby the first class, as it is called, ranges from three thousand to four thousand dollars, and that amount is applied to a city of twenty thousand inhabitants or to a city of a million inhabitants. The only exception in favor of a large city is that of the postmaster of the city of New York, who receives $6,000 annually and gives bonds for $600,000. Probably his compensation, considering the magnitude of his office, is not too much. But by the section to which I will briefly call the attention of the Senate it will be perceived that the law in this respect is not flexible enough; and when the Postmaster-General comes in and estimates this year for $6,500,000 for salaries of postmasters, he cannot avoid doing so, because your law requires it. Your law requires the money to be paid out, and it is necessary that he should have the money in order to pay it out.

For the current year the amount appropriated for salaries of postmasters was $5,700,000. For next year the estimate is $6,500,000; making an increase of $800,000. Do we complain of that? Do we cavil at the Post-Office Department or with the service? I admit that the increase in the number of post-offices accounts somewhat for the $800,000. But there is another difficulty, that towns are gradually growing up from five to ten thousand population and from ten to twenty thousand, and when they get to twenty or twenty-five thousand they come within the three or four thousand dollar limit, and then the postmasters have to be paid this large salary. I have no doubt that one-half that increase could be economized and the postmasters in the small cities who now receive $3,000 or $4,000 be adequately paid; and out of that half saved an amount could be expended to recompense the postmasters of Chicago, of Saint Louis, of San Francisco, of Cincinnati, of Boston, of Philadelphia, and bring them to $6,000—a salary somewhat adequate to the bonds which they have to give and the amount of duties which they have to perform. But the trouble is that it is inflexible at the other end of the line. The Postmaster-General is compelled by your codified law to give a price that is too great to the smaller postmasters, where the labor is light and the bonds which they give are small.

By section 80 of the postal code it is provided—

That the compensation of postmasters shall be a fixed annual salary, to be divided into five classes, exclusive of the postmaster at New York City, whose salary shall be $6,000 per annum. The salary of the first class shall not be more than $4,000 nor less than $3,000; of the second class, less than $3,000 but not less than $2,000; of the third class, less than $2,000 but not less than $1,000.

And so it goes on to the end, there being five classes.

Section 83 provides the manner of readjustment of the salaries, and these readjustments have to take place, and the salaries of the postmasters brought up to the increase of the business of their office.

That in readjusting the salary of a postmaster, the amount thereof shall be ascertained by adding, to the whole amount of box-rents, commissions on the other postal revenues of the office at the following rates: On the first $100 or less, 60 per cent.; on all over $100 and not over $400, 50 per cent.; on all over $400 and not over $2,400, 40 per cent.; on all over $2,400, 15 per cent. And in order to ascertain the amount of postal receipts of each office, the Postmaster-General shall require postmasters to state, under oath, at such times and for such periods as he may deem necessary in each case, the amount of stamps canceled, the amount of box-rents received, the amount of unpaid postages collected, and the amount of postage on printed and other mailable matter.

Thus you see that by our law we require the Postmaster-General continually to raise the salaries of these officers to three or four thousand dollars, when twenty-five hundred, probably, would be adequate for three-fourths of them, and the difference might be saved and some portion of it be applied toward increasing the salaries at the more difficult offices in the Department.

But another reason for this increase is the increase of the railroad service. The railroad service last year was 57,911 miles; this year it is 63,457 miles—an increase of about 11 per cent. By this same postal code it is provided that whenever a railroad is built, no matter if it is out in the wilderness where there is no patronage, you are compelled to put on railway service there. The old mode of carrying the mail may be cheaper, but, nevertheless, the Postmaster-General is required to recognize the railroad as a postal route and put service on it. I do not know but that this may operate well, but it certainly goes to account for the increase in expenditures on account of this enormous increase of the service. Perhaps on account of the panic which has been raised through the past few months, perhaps on account of the threatening demonstrations of public opinion against the capital which is invested in railroads, decreasing the value of the securities of railroads, lessening the value of their property and making such enterprises hazardous, and lessening the security of that kind of property, the building of railroads for the next few years may be extremely limited in amount, and consequently the increase of the postal service in this direction may be not so great; but as fast as it is increased by law the Postmaster-General is required to put service upon it, and this accounts for a large portion of the increase in the percentage of expenses.

Next, there is the postal-car service, which has only been put on within a few years. In 1867 it was first employed; and there were then put on 4,435 miles. These miles have increased to 14,866—10,000 miles added in that time. Last year by a special law we provided for a readjustment of the compensation to the railroad companies for carrying the postal cars. I do not decry the value of these postal cars. I know that with the enormous mails that are being sent off by the great post-offices of the country, and all along the mail-routes, into these postal cars, the mails could never be distributed; they would block up and overflow the land if they were dammed up by the withdrawal of the postal cars from the service. In these postal cars there are clerks who receive the unassorted mail-bags—necessarily unassorted—and distribute the letters, and drop them out to the different towns and cities as they go along, thus methodizing the business, by which really more than one-half of the whole distribution of letters is done, not in the post-offices, but in the postal cars as they progress. The great increase of the service (and this increase is absolutely necessary) accounts for the increase in the percentage of expenses. I ask gentlemen who have observed the beneficial effect of these postal cars running into the city of New York, or the city of Boston, or Chicago, &c., whether they think they can be dispensed with; whether you have not, rather, got to dispense with your post-office entirely and with your system of mails; whether the enormous number of letters would go off from these centers of population, running to a million and some exceeding that in population; whether they could be disposed of otherwise than by economizing the time in mail-cars as they are being transported from point to point?

But before the estimates of this year were made, on account of the general complaints—the sturdy, continued, stubborn complaints—of the railroad companies, that they were carrying at the highest rate of speed on all their fast trains the enormous weight of mail matter at a less rate than they received for the lowest class of merchandise on their slowest trains, Congress listened to them and provided that the matter should be weighed and differently classified, the result of which was that there was an increase in their compensation for this kind of service. I was one of those who, although it was popular to deny the railroad companies any rights at all, were disposed to think they were right in their demand and that some reasonable concession should be made to it. By the act found on page 135 of the Post-Office Laws and Regulations of 1873, any Senator will find the classification and the amount of compensation. But the result was a very large increase in the expenditures of the Department; and certainly where we ourselves, having the power, require the post-office to weigh the mails and to make additional compensation if they come to a certain weight, we ought not to cavil at an increase of expenses, provided the cause of that increase be so apparent.

Another element of increase, and necessary increase, in the expenditures of the Post-Office Department has been the establishment of twenty-three hundred and eighty-one new post-offices during the past year. Of course, every post-office makes a new expense. These are small post-offices, and probably in a large majority of cases the salary of the postmaster will not amount to more than thirteen dollars per annum; but there are necessary expenses connected with each office, and some of the offices rapidly grow into importance, and the salaries in the aggregate make a considerable amount.

Another element of additional cost is the free-delivery system, which is the luxury of mail service in the larger centers of population. I do not object to it, but ask Senators who enjoy the privilege of having their constituents' letters delivered at their door-steps, to be paid for by the appropriations for the general service, not to grudge the weekly or tri-weekly mail of the pioneer, or blame the Department if these new inventions and additional cost go together.

But, sir, the great fault of the postal service, as shown in the codified law, as shown by every day's operation in the Department, is that it is ceasing to a certain extent to be a mail system for the transmission of intelligence, and has become a rival of express companies. Why, sir, the list of articles which can be carried in the mails is singular; it is peculiar; and for many of these articles there can be given no intelligent reason whatever. You can send seeds, and cuttings, and bulbs, and roots, and scions, and you can send samples of merchandise of every kind, except glassware or liquids, samples of merchandise of the most incongruous nature. You can send metals and ores, and mineralogical specimens. You can send bound books, and you can send those bound books without limit as to weight if they are printed by Congress. You can send specimens of woolen, cotton, or linen clothing not exceeding two pounds, where they are sent to an officer or soldier in the Army; and my friend from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] who is always well posted, reminds me that that has been increased to four pounds. I concede that in the time of the recent war, when the Army had no certain means of always, as anxious friends might have thought, receiving supplies of clothing adequate to their wants, the post-office might have been allowed temporarily to carry the contributions of clothing to the soldiers in the field; but it ought to have ceased when the war was over. There is no more reason now why they should be sent through the mail to the soldier than to any other class of the community, because he is now within reach of express companies; he is now measurably located in particular places where his whereabouts can always be ascertained, and there is no necessity of hunting him up through the mails by these extraordinary packages.

Now, as I say, (and I wish to emphasize the remark,) so far as we depart from making the post-office a mere medium of transmitting intelligence and make it an express company, so far we increase its expenditure beyond the receipts we can get from it, and so far depart from its legitimate object. Now, where is the necessity of sending a package of clothing to the soldier, or sending metals or mineralogical specimens by the fastest train and with all the necessary increased expense to facilitate its passage which are employed in the postal-car system? Express companies do not adopt this method; they divide up their freight into different classes; they have slow freight and they have fast freight, and they certainly do not send ores and mineralogical specimens and articles of the kind which I have enumerated, as fast freight; or, if they do, they charge extraordinary prices for doing so.

Now, sir, I believe, as I say, that it should be made a medium of intelligence. I know that the mails are terribly burdened by the vast amount of newspapers which are thrown into them by our great cities and by all the little towns along the route, all of which have their local journals. But I would not object to that, although there may be some inconveniences, for I think the newspaper of modern times has become as necessary to a man as his business letters, a necessity to all our families. Although there may be too great license in the press, nevertheless there is great benefit from the press, and in many notable instances, in crises in the country's history, the press has been sublimely instrumental in carrying alarm to the people, in rousing them to a sense of common danger, which was impossible before the invention of the telegraph, before the invention of the modern printing-press with its multiplied papers going out with the rapidity almost of lightning through all parts of the country.

And therefore, though these great heavy bundles of papers roll in and thereby somewhat obstruct the flow of the letter mail, I would be willing to make this exception in their favor and give them, if they see fit to use the mails in preference to the expresses, the opportunity to do so. But I would stop there and with the ordinary letter mail. I would not send bound books by the mails. Where is the necessity of it? They are merchandise and they can be readily sent by express. They can be sent as freight all over the country; the communications are ample and good enough. Why send them by the mail? Why burden down the mail? Why have it continually choked up by merchandise of any kind? If this is intelligence, it is, at any rate, not that species of intelligence which requires to be instantly read in order to be appreciated and be of any value. It is the mature thought, long time elaborating, slowly printed, and finding its way gradually out into the country; useful in its way, but yet can take ordinary methods of getting access to the country, without being sent through the mails and causing a stagnation in the business of the mails and the extraordinary cost which we see mounting up year by year.

Now, sir, I hope that the Post-Office Committee, or some other gentlemen who take an interest in this matter, and having official relations with the subject under the rules of the Senate, will prepare amendments which will cut out from the mail this enormous quantity of miscellaneous articles under the head of merchandise and other articles which I have mentioned, which now burden the mail and increase its ordinary expense. And I know that this is not my opinion alone, but that of other Senators; and it is also the opinion, I believe I have a right to say, of the head of the Department. I am sure he thinks if it were simply made an intelligence circulating system, and that only, excluding the articles of miscellaneous merchandise from the mails, the Department would soon become self-sustaining, and that it would be possible to keep up with the growing business of the country, and rapidly and cheaply dispatch the vast amount of letters and newspapers which are continually coming in upon him.

There is another element of increase which I think ought not to be charged to the Post-Office Department, and that is the ocean mail service. In one sense it is part of the service of the Department, but Congress determines whether it shall go on or cease; whether it shall remain at a fixed limit or be increased; and consequently a year or so ago the service on one ocean-steamship route was doubled, making an increase for the next fiscal year, and for which we have got to appropriate this year half a million dollars. Ought not that to be estimated when we talk of extravagance in the Postal Department? I think that was a beneficial measure; but whether beneficial or not, we are entitled to the credit or the blame for it. During the past year we had to appropriate on that account one-half of the $500,000, or $250,000, because the service commenced in October last, and it becomes complete and requires the whole appropriation of $500,000 additional for the next year.

Now, sir, I am in favor of extending the postal service in the directions in which it is beneficial to the people. I am in favor of new mail-routes, because our people going out to the West form new communities and require this postal service. It may be true that any particular mail-route may not pay its share of the expenses; but that which it does pay goes into a common fund, and the letters which pass everywhere come from all parts of the Union. Therefore, I am in favor of that, and I am in favor of this bill; but, further, I am in favor of lopping off excrescences which have grown up—for instance, the transmission through the mails of seeds, scions, roots, &c. The proposition to allow that to be done perhaps came from the Committee on Agriculture, or some person supposing it would please the grangers to have these seeds, &c., carried through the mails. Then some other gentleman, perhaps thinking of the manufacturers, and not disposed to have his constituents at a disadvantage, proposed that samples of general merchandise should go through the mails; and so, perhaps, by a too courteous spirit on the part of Senators, not desiring to oppose the pet ideas of some other Senators, or some class of Senators, these things are allowed to pass, and gradually, instead of a good system that shall answer its original purpose, and which is constitutional in all its parts, we get a monstrosity. We should take it in hand and lop off its excrescences and reduce it to its pristine simplicity, and then it will best answer the wants of the country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. PRATT. I should like to have that amendment reported.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was on page 14, after line 316, to insert under the head of "South Carolina:"

From Rock Hill to Lancaster Court-House; also, from Chester to Lancaster Court House.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think I can say what I have to say during the minute which remains of the morning hour. This discussion is suggestive of the reduction of the expenses of the Post-Office Department. I certainly have no objection to reductions in that direction.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I do not wish to interrupt him, but I have been waiting for some time to offer an amendment, and I hope he will permit me to offer it now. There is a letter from the Assistant Postmaster-General showing the necessity for it. I merely wish to offer it so that it may be before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois gives notice that he will offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have no objection to reductions being made in the expenses of the Post-Office Department, if they are wisely made; but I do object to the mode of reduction that has been proposed by at least one Senator on this floor. I think I can best illustrate what I have to say by drawing in my own unskillful way a little sketch. Fancy, if you please, the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL]—and I only mention him for an illustration—in his elegant Washington home, with his slippers on his feet and his morning-gown around him, wending his way from his pleasant sitting-room to his front door, there to receive from the hands of a uniformed postman his daily mail. That is a very comfortable picture. But, upon the other hand, fancy the hard-handed pioneer of the West at the expiration of his weekly labor in clearing up his little patch of ground for his corn or his wheat, wending his way over rough, and perhaps dimly marked roads, four or five miles to a little country post-office, there to receive, through the magnificent agency of Uncle Sam, his weekly mail, carried behind a boy on the back of a pony or a donkey. That is not quite as pleasant a picture. And yet, sir, these proposed routes are nearly all intended for cases of that kind. They are intended to be extended through the sparsely settled portions of the country, for the benefit of those persons who have emigrated from eastern homes, perhaps from Vermont, to the West.

Mr. President, if we are going to commence to cut down the expenditures of the Post-Office Department, in my opinion the best place to commence is in the free-delivery system. I do not say that we ought to do that; but if you are going to cut down, do not deprive the poor pioneer of his little chance of getting a weekly mail from a mother or a father or a brother, away off in his New England home perhaps, or a chance to get a weekly paper with which to solace himself on a Sunday afternoon. If we must cut down the expenses of this institution, let us commence right here in Washington; let us commence in every city and town in the United States of over twenty thousand inhabitants, for in every city and town of this country of that magnitude every man may receive at his front door his daily mail, and it is carried there at the expense of the United States. If we are going to cut down these expenditures, I suggest to my friend from Vermont that perhaps that would be the best place to commence.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I agree with the Senator in relation to the free-delivery system; that is to say, my impression is that the free-delivery system is costing very much more than the receipts. I do not know how that may be, but I suppose the cost is much larger than the receipts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. RAMSEY. If there is no objection on the part of the Senate, I hope we shall be allowed to complete the pending bill, and let that resolution go over informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to laying aside informally the resolution reported by the Committee on Finance?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we had better go on with the regular order. Indeed I think the Senator from Minnesota had better allow this bill to go over until the post-office appropriation bill comes here from the House of Representatives, and then both can be acted upon together.

Mr. RAMSEY. What bill from the House?

Mr. SHERMAN. The post-office appropriation bill. The Senator must see that on this post-route bill, which is usually passed without discussion, there is a disposition to discuss proposed reforms in the postal service, and I am rather inclined to think that it is a good idea.

Mr. RAMSEY. I take it that debate has almost exhausted itself on this matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think not. My friends around me tell me not.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. SPENCER. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

SALE OF PROPERTY AT HARPER'S FERRY.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution, calling for information from the Attorney-General in reference to the Harper's Ferry property, in West Virginia:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be directed to furnish the Senate, at as early a day as practicable, a detailed statement of all the information in his office relative to the sale of the Government property at Harper's Ferry, West Virginia, and all suits in relation to said property, whether for purchase-money or otherwise.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That resolution involves an inquiry into private business matters between the Government and other people, some of which it may not be for the interest of the Government to make public. I therefore move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, who, I can promise my friend, will report it presently, one way or the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 1217) providing for an appeal from the circuit court to the Supreme Court in certain cases of habeas corpus;

A bill (H. R. No. 1218) to provide for the purchase of fire-extinguishers for the Capitol building; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1013) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1875.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 202) to remove the legal and political disabilities of William Steele, of Bexar County, Texas; and it was thereupon signed by the President of the Senate pro tempore.

J. D. FARREN.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That J. D. Farren, an old and faithful officer of the Senate, be continued as messenger and doorkeeper under the authority of the Sergeant-at-Arms until the further order of the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. I move the reference of that resolution.

Several SENATORS. O, no; let it go.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. It seems to me there can be no objection to the resolution, and I hope it will not be referred.

Mr. STEVENSON. I beg to inquire what is the necessity of that resolution? Has not the Sergeant-at-Arms now authority to employ all the requisite employés of the Senate? I move its reference to the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I hope it will not be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky moves to refer the resolution to the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Connecticut what is the reason for this departure from what I understand to be the ordinary custom and practice in regard to the officers of the Senate? My impression always has been that the Sergeant-at-Arms had the authority and control in relation to the appointment of his subordinates; and if there are any good reasons why that custom should be departed from in this instance I should like to be informed of them.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I suppose the Sergeant-at-Arms has the authority to fill almost every subordinate office, and perhaps every one, in the Senate; but I understand this man has been an officer of the Senate for many years—a faithful and devoted officer—but in consequence, if you please, of the claims of the Senators from the State from which he comes, another man has been placed in his position, not in consequence of any objection to Mr. Farren, but simply because another Senator presses a claim for the appointment of another man. I think it is a reasonable thing that Mr. Farren should be continued. He is a faithful officer.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is a single objection the resolution cannot be considered to-day; and two or three objections have been made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection has been made to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. I object to its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has entertained the resolution, and a motion has been made upon it and voted down, to wit, to refer it to a committee. It is too late now to object to its consideration.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to hear it reported again.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

Mr. HAMLIN. I voted against referring that resolution. I did not understand it at the time. I think now it will be in order, after other action, to again submit that motion, would it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion was made to refer the resolution to the Committee on Contingent Expenses. The Senate voted that motion down.

Mr. HAMLIN. Debate has already taken place since that motion was acted upon, and therefore I think in another stage of the proceedings it would be in order to move to refer it to the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make that motion?

Mr. HAMLIN. I do; and I will state in a word my reason for it. I did not at first understand the resolution. It is a direct interference with the duties of the Sergeant-at-Arms. If we undertake to discharge his duties in one instance we shall be called upon to discharge them in another, and where will it end? Where will you draw the line? You have got a committee to take care of all this matter, and the best way is to send the resolution to that committee.

Mr. STEVENSON. In addition to that this resolution would put this officer beyond the control of the Sergeant-at-Arms. We hold the Sergeant-at-Arms responsible to the Senate. It is certainly a bad innovation from the established rules of the Senate to put any officer over him when all the others are under him, or to appoint one who is not responsible to him. I do not know this gentleman, and I have no earthly objection to him, but I think the resolution is an innovation upon what is due to the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the reference of the resolution to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1013) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1875, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill (H. R. No. 1217) providing for an appeal from the circuit court to the Supreme Court in certain cases of habeas corpus, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 1218) to provide for the purchase of fire-extinguishers for the Capitol building, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

THE CURRENCY—SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution reported by the Committee on Finance in relation to the currency and specie payments is before the Senate, the question pending being on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, it was my purpose not to address the Senate until I had the benefit of the opinions of all Senators who wished to express their opinions; and then I proposed, in closing the debate, to state the general reasons that influenced the Committee on Finance to report this resolution. But as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] tells me he is not very well to-day, and other Senators are not prepared, I prefer, rather than cause delay, to state as best I can those reasons now.

And, sir, at the outset of my remarks I wish to state some general propositions established by experience, and the concurring opinions of all writers on political economy. They may not be disputed, but are constantly overlooked. They ought to be ever present in this discussion as axioms, the truth of which has been so often proven that proof is no longer requisite.

The most obvious of these axioms, which lies at the foundation of the argument I wish to make to-day, is that a specie standard is the best and the only true standard of all values, recognized as such by all civilized nations of our generation, and established as such by the experience of all commercial nations that have existed from the earliest period of recorded time. While the United States, as well as all other nations, have for a time, under the pressure of war or other calamity, been driven to establish other standards of value, yet they have all been impelled to return to the true standard; and even while other standards of value have been legalized for the time, specie has measured their value as it now measures the value of our legal-tender notes.

This axiom is as immutable as the law of gravitation or the laws of the planetary system, and every device to evade it or avoid it has, by its failure, only demonstrated the universal law that specie measures all values as certainly as the surface of the ocean measures the level of the earth.

It is idle for us to try to discuss with intelligence the currency question until we are impressed with the truth, the universality, and the immutability, of this axiom. Many of the crude ideas now advanced spring from ignoring it. The most ingenious sophistries are answered by it. It is the governing principle of finance. It is proved by experience, is stated clearly by every leading writer on political economy, and is now here, in our own country, proving its truth by measuring daily the value of our currency and of all we have or produce. I might, to establish this axiom, repeat the history of finance from the shekels of silver, "current money with the merchant," paid by Abraham, to the last sale of stock in New York. I might quote Aristotle and Pliny, as well as all the writers on political economy of our own time, and trace the failure of the innumerable efforts to establish some other standard of value, from the oxen that measured the value of the armor of Homeric heroes to the beautifully engraved promise of our day; but this would only be the hundred-times-told tale which every student may find recorded, not only in schoolbooks, but in the writings of Humboldt, Chevalier, Adam Smith, and others of the most advanced scientific authorities. They all recognize the precious metals as the universal standard of value. Neither governments, nor parliaments, nor congresses can change this law. It defies every form of authority, but silently and surely asserts itself as a law of necessity, beyond the jurisdiction of municipal law.

Other mediums of exchange have been devised and are in general use, but their value is measured every moment by the true standard of the precious metals. And this standard will measure the value of your three sixty-five convertible, elastic, irredeemable bonds, and of any currency we may issue, before they are issued, the moment they are issued, and at every hour while they are in circulation. The ignorant and the credulous will measure their labor, their productions, and their property by that or any other standard you may devise; but the sagacious and prudent will test it by the specie standard. The barometer in Wall street will quote it by the specie standard, and every banker and broker will have more to do with fixing its daily changeable value than any of you. If we will only now recognize and act upon the fundamental truth that there is and can be but one true standard of value, and that the specie standard, we will have advanced a great way in the solution of the question upon which we are called upon to act.

The reasons for this are obvious. The innumerable wants of every civilized man, however moderate his income, demands the labor of thousands of persons. The slave who toiled for his daily bread and scanty clothing consumed more or less of the products of the labor and capital of an army of farmers, artisans, and capitalists, and the exchanges of all these productions can only be made by some recognized standard of value which will measure the value of a pin as well as of the highest production of art. This standard must be of intrinsic value, durable, divisible, easily transported, of universal use, and of the same qualities wherever found. Gold and silver alone unite all these qualities. To use the language of another:

Though far from invariable, the value of these metals changes only by slow degrees; they are readily divisible into any number of parts, which may be reunited by means of fusion without loss; they do not deteriorate by being kept; their firm and compact texture makes them difficult to wear; their cost of production, especially of gold, is so considerable that they possess great value in small bulk, and can, of course, be transported with comparative facility; and their identity is perfect, the pure gold and silver supplied by Russia and Australia having precisely the same qualities with that furnished by California and Peru. No wonder, therefore, when almost every property necessary to constitute money is possessed in so eminent a degree by the precious metals, that they have been used as such from a very remote era. Their employment in this function is not ascribable to accident, to the genius of any individual, or to any peculiar combination of circumstances. It grew naturally out of the wants and necessities of society on the one hand, and the means of supplying them possessed by these metals on the other. They became universal money, as Turgot has observed, not in consequence of any arbitrary agreement among men, or of the intervention of any law, but by the nature and force of things.

Of late years much difficulty has grown out of the slightly varying value of silver and gold, as compared with each other, and the tendency of opinion has been to adopt gold alone as the standard of value. The United States has twice changed the relative value of these metals, and other modern nations have been driven to similar expedients. At the Paris monetary conference, held in 1867, which I had the honor to attend, the delegates of twenty nations represented agreed to recommend gold alone as the standard of value. The United States, and nearly all the commercial nations, have adopted this standard, and reduced the use of silver to a mere token coinage of less intrinsic value than gold, but maintained at par with gold by the right to be converted into gold at the will of the holder. So that for all practical purposes we may regard gold as the only true standard, the true money of the world, by which the value of all property, of all productions, of all credits, and of every medium of exchange, and especially of all paper money, is tested.

Specie, in former times, was not only the universal standard of value, but it was the general medium of all exchanges. In modern times this is greatly changed. Specie is still the universal standard of value, but it has ceased to be even the usual medium of exchange. The failure to distinguish between the standard of value and the medium of exchanges occasions many of the errors into which so many fall, and nearly every Senator who has spoken on one side of the question has fallen into this error. Specie has lost a portion of its sovereign power, for with the enormous increase of exchanges it was found that, valuable as it is, it is too heavy to transport from place to place as a medium of exchange. The perils of the sea, the dangers of theft and robbery, led to devices to substitute promises to pay gold in place of the actual gold.

In this way bills of exchange, drafts, promissory notes, checks, and like commercial paper came into use, so that now, even in this age of paper money, it is computed that fully 95 per cent. of all the exchanges in commercial cities is made by such promises to pay. Only 5 per cent., or one-twentieth part, of the payments in New York are made in money, and this chiefly in paper money and not in gold. If gold were now the only legal standard of value it would not be used as a medium of exchange for 1 per cent. of the transactions of daily life. The convenience, the portability of commercial paper and paper money has superseded gold as a medium of exchange, but has left it as the fixed, the only true standard of value, by which the value of all mediums of exchange is tested.

In England, where the specie standard of values is jealously maintained, and where no Bank of England note can issue beyond a prescribed limit except upon a deposit of an equal amount of gold, specie is not used as a medium of exchange to an amount exceeding 2 per cent. of the aggregate payments. Ninety-eight per cent. of all payments is in commercial paper or bank-bills, but the fixed and unalterable standard of value of all this paper money was gold coin. Sometimes the daily payments in London alone exceed all the gold in Great Britain, but only about 1 per cent. is actually paid in gold, and about 5 per cent. in Bank of England notes. In France, until the recent German war, gold and silver were used more as a medium of exchange than in any country of our day. She had from 1868 to 1870 in circulation an amount of gold and silver greater than the aggregate of gold and silver of Great Britain, the United States, and Prussia. Her specie circulation amounted to $700,000,000. Driven by the necessities of that war she has substituted paper money amounting to $520,000,000 as a medium of exchange for the gold and silver formerly circulated, but with wise statesmanship she now maintains her present vast volume of paper money at or near par in gold. She has adopted another medium of exchange, but she maintains, in harmony with reason and experience, the gold standard of value.

All modern experience teaches the importance of the division of labor. Indeed that is the favorite topic of every writer on political economy. Every man to his trade, and if the trade can be subdivided into many specialties, then every man to his specialty. I was in the celebrated manufactory of steel pens of Mr. Gillott, and saw that it required the labor of thirty men and women to contribute to the making of this implement. Each one was skillful in his part, and this part was perfectly done, and this subdivision of labor and skill gave increased wages and value to the work of each laborer, secured a fortune to the owners, and a perfect pen to the world. The same law which demands a division of labor is applied to professional and scientific pursuits. The law has many specialties. The honors of science are only won by those who devote their mental faculties to one branch of study. The same law extends to all leading productions, as cotton, wool, wheat, corn, and gold.

The purposes for which each of these commodities is best fitted are established by experience. In this way the experience of centuries in former generations established gold both as the standard of value and the medium of exchange; but modern necessities have now established paper money, credit money, whether in the form of bills of exchange, checks, bank-bills, or notes of the State, as the best medium of exchange, leaving gold, however, as the best and only true standard of the value of all paper money, as well as of all commodities.

Now, it has often happened, not only in the United States, but in other countries, that credit money has proved worthless. This is an unavoidable incident of such money. So far as this money consists of checks or like credits it must depend upon the voluntary contracts of individuals. Each person is at liberty to accept or refuse all such mediums of exchange, and if he suffers a loss by the failure of a banker or broker it is his misfortune, for which the Government is not responsible, and can give him no relief, except the laws for the collection of debts. But a different rule applies to paper money issued by a State or by a corporation authorized by the State to issue money. Whether this money is a legal-tender or not, it is, by usage and custom, money, and its receipt and payment are practically as compulsory as if it was gold coin. No man can refuse it unless he is a capitalist, who may resort to the law to enforce payment in legal-tenders. The laborer must take it from necessity or get no employment. The merchant must take it or keep his goods. Usage in such matters is stronger than law. It is this kind of money that it is the duty of the State to protect from depreciation and loss. It must secure it by the best security possible, and that security in every well-ordered government is the "public faith." Upon this principle Great Britain, France, and the United States have founded their financial systems.

But one other duty rests upon the government undertaking to issue, or to authorize the issue of paper money, and that is to maintain this paper money at the gold standard. Great Britain and France recognize this duty, and perform it. The United States recognizes its duty, but does not perform it. Our currency is founded upon the public faith. The public faith of the United States is pledged to pay United States notes in coin. The national-bank notes are amply secured by bonds more than sufficient to redeem them in coin; and yet they are all depreciated; now at 10 per cent. discount, to-morrow at 11, and yesterday at 8. It is the depreciation of our paper money that is the standing reproach of our financial system, which lies at the foundation of all our troubles, and to remedy which is now the most important and difficult duty of Congress.

Mr. President, thus far my remarks are founded upon the experience of ages, applicable to all countries and to all commercial nations of our time. I present them now as axioms of universal recognition. And yet I have heard these axioms denounced in this debate as "platitudes," useless for this discussion in the Senate of the United States. The wisdom of ages, the experience of three thousand years, the writings of political economists, are whistled down the wind as if we in this Senate were wiser than all who have reasoned and thought and legislated upon financial problems—that all this accumulated wisdom consists of "platitudes" unworthy to influence an American Senate in the consideration of the affairs of our day and generation.

Sir, I do not think so. If we disregard these "platitudes," we only demonstrate our own ignorance and punish our constituents with evils that we ought to avoid. I purpose now to pursue the argument further, and to prove that we are bound both by public faith and good policy to bring our currency to the gold standard; that such a result was provided for by the financial policy adopted when the currency was authorized; that a departure from this policy was adopted after the war was over, and after the necessity for a depreciated currency ceased; and that we have only to restore the old policy to bring us safely, surely, and easily to a specie standard.

First, I present to you the pledge of the United States to pay these notes in coin "at the earliest practicable period." In the "act to strengthen the public credit" passed on the 18th day of March, 1869, I find this obligation:

And the United States also solemnly pledges its public faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin.

Without renewing the discussion in regard to the nature of these notes, or quoting the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, or the declaration of the various acts of Congress from 1862 down, I rest upon this pledge of the public faith. Under what circumstances was it made? The condition of our currency, the obligation of our bonds, the nature of our promises, had been discussed before the people of the United States in the campaign of 1868; various theories had been advanced; and the result was that those who regarded the faith of the nation as pledged to pay not only the bonds of the United States, but the notes also, in coin prevailed, and General Grant was elected President of the United States. On the eastern portico of the Capitol on the 4th of March, 1869, he made this declaration:

A great debt has been contracted in securing to us and our posterity the Union. The payment of this, principal and interest, as well as the return to a specie basis, as soon as it can be accomplished without material detriment to the debtor class or to the country at large, must be provided for. To protect the national honor every dollar of Government indebtedness should be paid in gold, unless otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract. Let it be understood that no repudiator of one farthing of our public debt will be trusted in public place, and it will go far toward strengthening a credit which ought to be the best in the world, and will ultimately enable us to replace the debt with bonds bearing less interest than we now pay.

The Congress of the United States, in order to put into form its sense of this obligation, passed the act "to strengthen the public credit," and the last and most important clause of this act is the promise which I have just read, that these notes should be paid "at the earliest practicable period" in coin.

What was the effect of this promise? Why, sir, I have here the daily register of the sales of our greenbacks in New York, because that is the legal effect of transactions in gold. We have called our false standard the true standard, by calling the dollar of our broken promises the standard of value, when every man of intelligence who bought and sold anything, even our own domestic products, knew that gold was the true standard, and measured our greenbacks by it. I have here the daily sales, and what do they show? On the day we made that promise, the 18th of March, 1869, the greenbacks, the notes of the United States, were worth 75¼ cents in gold; or, in other words, gold was at a premium of 32 per cent. That was the measure of the credit of these notes when we made this promise. It took nearly four dollars of greenbacks to buy three dollars of gold. What was the result? After you enacted that law—the faith of the people of the United States that you would redeem this pledge—the value of your greenbacks advanced, not rapidly but gradually, and in one year, to within 12 per cent. of par in gold.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator permit me to ask him whether he does not consider, as a far more potential fact in producing the approximation of the paper issues to gold and silver, the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, made early in 1870, than the act which he has just referred to?

Mr. SHERMAN. On the contrary I could show my honorable friend, if it was necessary to go into the quotations, that this rise occurred before the decision was made.

Mr. BAYARD. I merely suggest, as a matter of historical truth, that the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, made by a majority of five to three of its judges, declaring that the issue of paper, and creating it a legal tender by Congress, was an unconstitutional exercise of power, had more to do with approximating the value of paper issues with gold than any resolution or act passed by the Congress of the United States, merely reiterating the faith which every one knew was pledged and existing when the notes were issued.

Mr. SHERMAN. Since my friend asks me a question, I am bound to answer it; and I say that I do not believe that decision had the slightest influence on the matter. We must judge of causes by results, and results show that the rise in the value of our notes occurred before the decision was made. The causes of the rise are not material to my argument. The fact is, that in one year from the time that promise was made the value of our greenbacks was over 89 cents in gold. I have here the quotations of the 18th of March, 1870, which give gold at a premium of 11⅛, so that a greenback in market value was worth over 89 in gold. Thus, in a single year, from the 18th of March, 1869, to the 18th of March, 1870, the credit of the United States rose, so that the barometer of the money market, which you cannot control, measured the depreciation of your note at only 11 per cent. instead of 25 per cent. the year before.

Mr. President, we see, then, the effect of this promise. And I here come to what I regard as a painful feature to discuss—how have we redeemed our promise? It was Congress that made it, in obedience to the public voice; and no act of Congress ever met with a more hearty and generous approbation. But I say to you, with sorrow, that Congress has done no single act the tendency of which has been to advance the value of these notes to a gold standard; and I shall make that clearer before I get through. Congress made this promise five years ago. The people believed it and business men believed it. Four years have passed away since then, and your dollar in greenbacks is worth no more to-day than it was on the 18th of March, 1870; and no act of yours has even tended to advance the value of that greenback to par in gold, while every affirmative act of yours since that time has tended to depreciate its value and to violate your promise.

Mr. President, these are simple facts, although it may be painful for us to discuss them. I do not say that Congress, in this matter, disregarded the will of the people, because there was a public feeling against any measure which tended to advance the value of the greenbacks to the gold standard. I am not complaining of Senators or Members who represent their constituents, but I do say that the fact stands out as clear as light, that the Congress of the United States which made this promise has done no single act the tendency of which even leads one to suppose that it will ever redeem its promise.

Sir, let us see what has been done. We have paid $400,000,000 of the public debt, and we boast of it—of debt not due for years. We have paid to redeem that debt a premium of $40,000,000. In other words, we have paid $440,000,000 to redeem four hundred millions of debt not yet due, and we have not redeemed a single debt that was due in March, 1869; but, on the contrary, we have increased the kind of debts then due more in proportion than the increase of our population. And, sir, while our promise did advance the credit of our bonds and of our notes alike, and while the execution of that promise as to our bonds has advanced our bonds to above par in gold, yet we have done nothing whatever to redeem the second clause of that pledge; but, on the other hand, all we have done has been done with the intention and with the effect of depreciating the value of our notes.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senator to state what that pledge is.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will come to my construction of it in a moment. I have read it in full.

Mr. MORTON. I mean practically.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer your construction that emasculates our pledge in due time. The Senator will find that I shall not evade his question.

Mr. President, I am not here to find fault with individuals; but I do say that the Congress of the United States in the measures which have been adopted has not done what it ought to have done to redeem the pledge of the public faith to pay these notes in coin "at the earliest practicable period." Why, sir, at this moment we are living in daily violation of this pledge. I said a moment ago that instead of adopting measures looking toward specie payments we have increased the volume of our currency in every branch of it. Now let us see if this be true. I have here a statement taken from the official report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the amount of the currency on the 30th of June, 1869. I cannot find a statement for the 1st of March, 1869, but it was the same, because it was fixed by law. I find on the 30th of June, 1869, we had three hundred and fifty-six millions of greenbacks, the same amount that we had on the 18th day of March. That was the maximum amount, as it was supposed, fixed by law. When the act of the 18th of March, 1869, was passed no one dreamed that there existed a power to issue forty-four millions more.

Our greenbacks were then $356,000,000. On the 1st of January, 1874, according to the last statement of the public debt, they were $378,481,339. We had, then, increased this form of our currency $22,481,000. And that is not all. Since that time, and up to the 10th of January, according to a New York newspaper—and I suppose it is correct—I find that the amount of legal-tender notes outstanding was $381,891,000, or an increase since the 1st of January of something like $3,400,000, or at the rate of $400,000 a day. Every dollar of this new issue of paper money directly tended to depreciate that outstanding and was in violation of the spirit and the provision of the law of 1869. I am not now speaking of the legal power of the Secretary of the Treasury to make this issue, because I have already given my opinion fully on this subject in an official report, but only to call your attention to the fact that by our acquiescence we have actually watered, debased, and depreciated by new issues the very notes we promised to pay in coin at the earliest practicable period.

Nor is this all. Under authority clearly conferred by law to the Secretary of the Treasury, we have increased the fractional currency from $27,508,928, at which it stood on the 30th of June, 1869, to $48,554,792, or an increase of fractional currency of $21,036,000. Again, sir, driven by a local demand which we could not resist, founded upon a palpable injustice growing out of the mistake of an officer of the Government long ago in the distribution of the national-bank circulation, we did authorize by law an increase of the bank circulation to the South and West to the amount of $54,000,000. The amount of bank-notes issued at the time we made this pledge was $299,789,000; and to-day the amount outstanding is $339,081,000, showing an increase in this kind of notes of $39,300,000, or an increase in the currency since the promise to pay it in coin at the earliest practicable period, and all legal tender in effect, of $82,317,000; and now this process of inflation is going on daily, first, by the issue of the balance of the forty-four million reserve, and secondly by the issue of new bank-notes as banks are organized under the act of July, 1870; and yet there is a cry for more, more.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me a word right there?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senator if the act of 1870, authorizing the increase of national-bank circulation $54,000,000, did not contain a provision that those national-bank notes should not be issued faster than the 3 per cent. certificates were retired, being confined to that limit; and if the 3 per cent. certificates at that time were not held by the banks as a part of their reserve, instead of greenbacks; and when the 3 per cent. certificates were retired in accordance with that act the greenbacks did not have to take their place, so that there was no increase, but, in fact, a contraction, equal to the amount of reserve the new banks would have to hold of the old greenbacks?

Mr. SHERMAN. Undoubtedly it is true that the bank-notes could only be issued as the 3 per cent. certificates, another form of Government indebtedness, were retired. But, sir, at the time the law of March 18, 1869, was passed, it was just as well known as at a later period that these 3 per cent. certificates were a demand indebtedness which the Government was expected to pay at its pleasure and its will. The Government could have paid the 3 per cent. certificates at any time with the money that was used for paying the bonded debt of the United States, and thus have advanced toward a specie standard.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator was speaking about inflation.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am speaking of the violation of the faith we plighted at the earliest practicable period to pay these notes in coin. We never have paid a dollar of them. We never have made provision for the payment of one of them. We have issued more of them, and compelled the people to take them. That is what I am getting at.

My honorable friend asked me a while ago what was the nature of the pledge made by the act of March, 1869, as to the time of payment of United States notes in coin. If I was defending a person charged as a criminal for violating this law, or one like it, I would claim, as the Senator from Indiana does, that as no time was fixed no man could be convicted for a penitentiary offense for a violation of the law. But what is this pledge? Let me read it again:

> And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the payment of the United States notes in coin.

What is the meaning of that? Does it not mean that the United States shall apply its means, its power, its energies, its revenue, its money, to redeem these notes? Does it mean a vague promise, such as party platforms sometimes use to deceive and mislead the people? Does it mean only a vague, indefinite promise by which business men are to be gulled and deluded into basing their contracts upon an artificial standard? No, sir; it is the promise of a great, proud, and rich people, who mean what they say—that every practicable means shall be used to that end.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Unless I misunderstood the Senator, the idea which he seemed to convey was this, that instead of applying the funds of the Treasury to the redemption of the 6 per cent. bonds, they should have been applied to the redemption of the 3 per cent. certificates.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not say whether the Department acted wisely or not; I did not discuss that question; and I again say to the honorable Senator that I am not here at all to discuss whether he did the best thing that ought to have been done by paying the bonds as he did. On the whole the people are satisfied with what he did, and he will not dispute that the power to apply the surplus revenue to the payment of these 3 per cent. certificates existed every day and was a perpetual right.

Mr. BOUTWELL. But in the light of history may I be allowed to ask the Senator whether now he thinks that ought to have been done?

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope my friend will not press me, because I might express some opinions which would get up a controversy as to what might have been done by the executive authorities to advance our notes toward a specie standard. I am willing to take my share of the responsibility of results, for I certainly am guilty of aiding in the passage of the law to equalize the distribution of bank circulation by which there was an increase of bank-notes. I have no criticisms to make upon what was done by the executive authorities. What I say is, that Congress has not sufficiently kept in its view that obligation approved by the people in 1868, and declared by Congress in 1869—that the United States would redeem, at the earliest practicable period, these notes in coin.

Now, sir, I ask, has it not been practicable at any time in the last four years to advance in some degree these notes toward the specie standard? My honorable friend from Indiana says that for the last four or five years we have had a time of unbounded plenty and great prosperity; we have built thousands and tens of thousands of miles of railroad; we have built furnaces; we have expanded our enterprises and proven our energy. Yes, sir; all this we have done. We have gone through a period of prosperity almost unexampled; but it seems we never were prosperous enough during all this time, according to the Senator from Indiana, to fulfill any part of this obligation which we made on the 18th of March, 1869. Sir, when will it be practicable? Was it when the Treasury was overflowing and we were seeking new outlets, new modes of expending money, new modes of paying debts not yet due? When will it be practicable, according to the Senator's construction? I press that question upon him, not for answer now, but let him say to the business men of the country when it will be practicable to restore the gold standard. If it cannot be done in seasons of plenty, of prosperity, of overflowiug revenues, shall it be done in times of adversity and trial and tribulation? What condition of affairs would justify us in redeeming the sacred obligation which impels us to do it at the earliest practicable period?

Mr. MORTON. If the Senator will allow me, I will ask whether it is practicable to enter upon the work of resumption under the pressure of a panic, or whether it should be in good times?

Mr. SHERMAN. Was my friend from Indiana willing to do this when we had good times, and the Treasury was overflowing, and we were paying debts at the rate of one hundred millions a year? Was he ready a year ago to do it, when an earnest effort was made in the Senate in that direction? Can he state under what circumstances or conditions he will be ready to do it? I am of opinion that at any time since the promise was made steps could have been taken to have redeemed it, and that now, under the pressure of panic, when debts are greatly diminished, is a favorable time for entering, by decisive measures, upon the policy of resumption. But I suppose, according to the Senator's ideas, we are to issue more paper money, make more good times, start the ball of inflation, with a view that some time, may be, in the dim future, we will undertake to perform our promise.

But now let us come to the specific question of the time for resumption. Shall the redemption of this pledge be postponed until the public debt is paid? Why, sir, one-tenth of the money we have used to pay the public debt not due would have brought us to a specie standard. No one supposes that under an ordinary state of affairs the currency of the country—the greenbacks—need be reduced below three hundred millions in order to bring us to a specie standard. I have heard some of the ablest and most experienced business men of the country declare that whenever the right to convert greenbacks into gold or its equivalent was secured so that prudent men would see that the Government had the power to maintain its specie standard, there would be no reduction of the currency to any appreciable extent. But whether that be so or not, no one has claimed that the amount of greenbacks need be reduced below three hundred millions in order to bring that remaining three hundred millions up to the standard of gold. That would be a reduction of $56,000,000. Fifty-six millions of the money that we have applied to the payment of debt not yet due would have brought all the remaining greenbacks up to par in gold, would have made our bank-notes convertible into the standard of gold, and we would have had, almost without knowing it, specie payment—a solid, safe, and secure basis. The forty millions of greenbacks we paid as premium for our bonds would have accomplished this result. Thousands of men who have been ruined by the false ideas that sprung from this fever-heated, depreciated paper money would be now useful, able, and successful business men, instead of being ruined by bankruptcy.

Sir, we gain nothing by postponing the fulfillment of our promise with a view to reduce the public debt. We have to pay the debt in coin anyway, and the same coin that pays it now would pay it after our currency has been restored to par. If the old idea of Mr. Pendleton had prevailed, that these bonds should be paid in greenbacks, then there would be a motive for us to depreciate the greenbacks in order to pay off our bonds at the cheapest rate. But this promise to pay in coin extended to the bondholder. We promised to pay the bondholder gold for his bond and the people gold for their greenbacks. We have fulfilled our promise to the bondholder. We have paid him in gold. We have bought the gold. We have paid him at a premium of 10 per cent. on our currency. Not a single effort, not a single measure, has succeeded in either House of Congress that looks to the redemption of the promise to the people who hold these greenbacks, and which measure their daily toil in their productive avocations. We cannot postpone this obligation until the payment of the public debt, because, although we have rapidly advanced in the payment of the public debt, it will be many long years before that "consummation most devoutly to be wished" will be reached.

Shall we postpone the redemption of our greenbacks until we can accumulate enough gold in our Treasury to pay them? We know the effect of that policy. Any attempt to accumulate great masses of gold in the Treasury will not only excite popular opprobrium, by holding idle in the vaults of the Treasury money that ought to draw interest, but it will create a stringency in the gold market. It will advance the value of the very thing we wish to get. Accumulate gold in great masses, and it will advance the price of gold all over the world. We could not now, with all our teeming productions, draw to this country $200,000,000 in gold without disturbing the Bank of France, the Bank of England, and all the money centers of the world. Therefore the idea of postponing the day of specie payments until we can accumulate enough gold to redeem the greenbacks would be the idlest, vainest delusion and the most foolish hope.

What then? Shall we postpone the payment of our notes in coin, shall we put off the fulfillment of our promise until the mysterious "balance of trade" is in our favor? There never was a greater humbug in the world than this idea of the balance of trade. Why, sir, the balance of trade is now largely in our favor, and according to this theory we ought now to be prosperous, happy, glorious. The balance of trade is in our favor; our exports exceed our imports; now we ought to be supremely happy. But a year ago the balance of trade was $100,000,000 against us. We sent our exports to Europe, it is true; but we imported silks and satins and wines. All the luxuries of the Orient, all the rich goods of every clime, came pouring into this country. The balance of trade was against us; and yet, according to the argument of my friend from Indiana yesterday, the last two or three years, when the balance of trade was against us, was a happy time, halcyon days, when we had prosperity in all branches of industry, and were building many thousands of miles of railroad every year.

Mr. President, this fallacy of the balance of trade ought not to enter into the calculations of prudent men. When the balance of trade is in our favor, it indicates thrift and economy. It shows we are exporting our surplus products and getting a fair price for them, and taking solid gold or paying debts in exchange for them, instead of silks and satins. But this is not conclusive evidence that when we are importing more than we are exporting we are necessarily carrying on a losing trade. These imports may be, in actual wealth-producing property, such as capital, machinery, or the like, more valuable to us than the burden of the interest we pay on the balance of trade. The whole theory depends upon the nature of the imports for which we run in debt. In this respect the balance of trade is precisely like the balance of trade between the merchant and the farmer. If the farmer buys less than he sells, he is surely on a safe footing. If he buys more than he sells, the result will depend entirely upon what he buys, whether luxuries consumed in the using or materials for actual productive improvements on his farm. If the latter, he is prosperous and happy, though "the balance of trade" may be against him. It is not a question of "balance of trade," but a question of prudence and judgment in the trade itself. Only a year ago I had a controversy with a fellow-Senator, who is now present, about this balance of trade. He insisted that when the balance of trade was against any nation it was an evidence of decay. I said this was a fallacy. He replied that no country could be prosperous unless the balance of trade was in its favor. I asked him if he thought Great Britain was a prosperous country, and he said it was a very prosperous country, and that the balance of trade was always in favor of Great Britain. We made a friendly bet on the subject, and it turned out that the balance of trade was against Great Britain to the tune of over $300,000,000 per annum, and had been for twenty years. By the fallacious theory of the "balance of trade" Great Britain was on the high road to ruin. Yet the whole of this balance of imports was in commodities sent to pay interest on English investments of foreign countries—profits of trade, and so forth. The profits of the trade were all in favor of Great Britain, which imported raw articles and exported high-priced productions, while the balance of trade only represented increased and increasing wealth, instead of ruin and poverty; so that all this talk about the balance of trade is the sheerest humbug.

Sir, there is no time unfit to fulfill a sacred obligation, and there has been no day since this obligation was declared by Congress when we should not have directed our attention toward redeeming it. The only question for Congress is to say with what rapidity they will advance toward specie payments. When you tell me you have the right to choose the time and the occasion, I say you have done nothing. You have buried your talent and are an unfaithful steward. I ask the honorable Senator from Indiana what single act of Congress, since this pledge was made, has even tended toward specie payments? Let him look over the statute-books, examine them all, and he will answer, none. I have sought in vain for any legislation, to show that Congress has been mindful of this obligation; I cannot find a single measure that even tended toward specie payments.

Now, sir, we are told that we are all for specie payments. Even my friend who now occupies the chair [Mr. FERRY, of Michigan] tells us he wants to issue one hundred millions more of paper money to prepare us for specie payments. He looks to specie payments as the ultimate result of his one hundred millions. We are all for specie payments some time, may be. We are not in favor of it in times of plenty. We are not in favor of it in times of great prosperity. We are not in favor of it in view of the panic. When will we be in favor of it? That is the question that Senators ought to be prepared to answer to the business men of this country. There is not a man who buys and sells, who deals in exchanges, a banker or a broker, but measures daily the depreciation of your notes. He is compelled to take them, and he eagerly asks you, as you have promised to redeem them at the earliest practicable period, if you cannot fix the time, to state under what circumstances, under what condition of trade, under what condition of plenty, under what condition of surplus revenue, you will pay them.

Why, Mr. President, the very uncertainty of such an obligation, as it is now construed, would prevent the richest man in the city of New York from borrowing a dollar upon it. Mr. Astor, with his untold wealth, could not borrow a thousand dollars of any gentleman who now hears me upon a promise so vague and indefinite as you seek to make this. And yet the people of this country have been compelled to submit to a forced loan, and the business men of this country are compelled to take such paper as the standard of their values and of all values, when no living man can guess the time when, or the circumstances under which, this promise will be redeemed.

I say, therefore, that if the ideas of these gentlemen are to prevail in the Senate, they ought to tell the country when and under what circumstances they will redeem this promise. I say to Senators that if now, in this time of temporary panic, a great part of which, as I shall show you, has already passed over, we yield one single inch to the desire for paper money in this country, we shall pass the Rubicon, and there will be no power in Congress to check the issue. If you want forty millions now, how easy will it be to get forty millions again? If you want one hundred millions now, convertible into three sixty-five currency bonds, how soon will you want one hundred millions more? Will there not always be men in debt? Will not always men with bright hopes embark too far on the treacherous sea of credit? Will there not always be a demand made upon you for an increase? And when you have passed the Rubicon and have fulfilled the pledges you have already made to the people of the United States, where can you stop? Where our ancestors stopped at the close of the Revolution; where the French people stopped in the midst of their revolutionary fervor!

Sir, I regard it as the proudest achievement of the American people that so soon after the war they so faithfully and honorably redeemed their obligation to the bondholder. I demand the same honorable fulfillment of your promise to the note-holder. Now is the time to make the stand, not only to prevent any further violation of law and of our promise, but to retrace our steps and to give some decisive token that you will pay our paper money in coin, as we agreed to do.

This is all I desire to say in regard to this pledge of the public faith. But I wish to go a little further. I wish to show you that the policy of the country, adopted at the time these notes were issued, contemplated that they should be maintained at par in gold; that that policy was only temporarily abandoned under the pressure of war. The act of February 25, 1862, is the fundamental constitution of our present financial system. It was passed after the greatest deliberation in both Houses of Congress. It contains every principle and element of our whole financial system. There is not an idea advanced during the war that operated successfully that is not contained in the act of February 25, 1862. That act provided for the issue of five-twenty bonds; it provided for the issue of the greenbacks; it provided for the issue of certificates of indebtedness; it provided that your internal taxes be paid in paper money and that your duties should be paid in gold; it established your sinking fund; it secured the interest on the public debt always to be paid in coin; it set aside the coin from customs-duty to pay it. That act provided that the greenbacks issued under it should be maintained as near at par in gold as possible during the war, but at all events at par with the best bond that could be issued by the Government of the United States.

Mr. HOWE. That was the act that made the note convertible into a bond?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. I will ask the Secretary to read the stipulations that were made in regard to these notes. They will show how sacredly they were regarded and how carefully their security was watched.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And such notes herein authorized shall be receivable in payment of all taxes, internal duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind due to the United States, except duties on imports, and of all claims and demands against the United States of every kind whatsoever, except for interest upon bonds and notes, which shall be paid in coin, and shall also be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest as aforesaid. And any holders of said United States notes depositing any sum not less than fifty dollars, or some multiple of fifty dollars, with the Treasurer of the United States, or either of the assistant treasurers, shall receive in exchange therefor duplicate certificates of deposit, one of which may be transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall thereupon issue to the holder an equal amount of bonds of the United States, coupon or registered, as may by said holder be desired, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, and redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after five years, and payable twenty years from the date thereof. And such United States notes shall be received the same as coin, at their par value, in payment for any loans that may be hereafter sold or negotiated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and be reissued from time to time as the exigencies of the public interests shall require.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have had this clause read to show you that the foundation of the greenback was coin. Although it could not at the moment, during the war, be converted into coin—for the wants of the Government were greater than all the coin of the United States, or perhaps than all the coin of the world, attainable during war—yet the Government based the whole upon coin. Every bond that was issued was issued only upon the sacred pledge contained in this act that the interest of that bond should be paid in coin; and the principal should be paid, when due, in coin. The fifth section of the act provides that all duties on imported goods shall be paid in coin; and that this money shall be set aside as a special fund to pay the interest on the bonded debt in coin. Then, in order to secure the greenbacks, it authorized any holder of a greenback to pay any Government debt with them; it authorized the holder of a greenback to pay any debt, public or private, with them; and every citizen of the United States was bound to take them. Then it authorized them to be converted into 6 per cent. bonds of the United States—those bonds payable, principal and interest, in gold. If the policy provided for by this act had been maintained, we would long since have been at specie payments, without any serious disturbance of our monetary affairs.

Mr. MORTON. If the Senator will allow me to ask him a question right there, I will ask him what act or determination of the Government it was that inflicted the greatest dishonor upon the greenback, that contributed more than anything else to its dishonor, if it has been dishonored?

Mr. SHERMAN. As I shall refer to all the acts that relate to the greenbacks, I shall no doubt come to the one that the Senator would pick out. He can take his choice.

Now, Mr. President, I come to show the Senate how this provision, the convertible clause of the act of February 25, 1862, was repealed. On the 3d of March, 1863, Congress passed "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government." This act was passed during the dark hours of the war. The currency of the country did not flow into the Treasury rapidly enough to pay our Army. I remember that at about the time this act was passed there were very large unpaid requisitions. The Secretary of the Treasury, instead of issuing any more 6 per cent. bonds, desired to float a ten-forty 5 per cent. bond; in other words, to reduce the burden of interest upon the public debt. At this time there were three hundred millions of circulation outstanding, and with all the rights and all the privileges conferred upon the greenbacks, they did not flow into the Treasury fast enough to furnish means to carry on the operations of the war. The Secretary reasoned somewhat in this way: he said that the holder of greenbacks had the right to convert them at any time into bonds bearing 6 per cent. interest; but as that right could be exercised at any time, the people were apt to postpone the exercise of it, and he believed it would advance the conversion of these notes into bonds by taking away the absolute legal right to convert. In other words, the suspension of this convertibility clause was passed with a view to promote conversion; to encourage conversion; to induce conversion; and, if possible, to induce a conversion into a 5 per cent. gold bond instead of into a 6 per cent. bond. When the Secretary of the Treasury presented this view to Congress he was at once met with the pledge of the public faith; with the promise printed upon the back of the greenbacks that they could be converted into 6 per cent. bonds at the pleasure of the holder; and that we could not take away that right. This difficulty was met by the ingenuity of the then Senator from Vermont, (Mr. Collamer.) He said that no man ever exercised a right which could not properly be barred by a statute of limitations; and if this right was injurious to the people of the United States, and prevented the conversion of these notes into bonds, we might require the holder of these notes to convert them within a given time; that we could give them a reasonable time within which they could convert them into 6 per cent. bonds, and after that take away the right.

The act of March 3, 1863, was amended by inserting this clause:

And the holders of United States notes, issued under or by virtue of said acts, shall present the same for the purpose of exchanging the same for bonds as therein provided on or before the 1st day of July, 1863; and thereafter the right so to exchange the same shall cease and determine.

In reviewing the history of our times I am not sure but that in this we made a mistake. I am not sure but that it would have been better to submit to any sacrifice rather than palter with the public faith. If there was any wrong done by Congress at that time, I am willing to share the responsibility of it, although I felt at the time the danger of the measure. But, sir, under the pressure of war we could not consider as carefully as we can now all the obligations that rest upon us. The life of our country was at stake; every man's property was felt to be insecure if the Union was destroyed; everything was at stake; and we did a great many things in those times of peril and excitement and trial we would not like to do now. Thousands of men rushed to the battle-field and surrendered their lives; others gave up their property; mothers their children. There were acts of heroism done at those times, and sometimes acts of wrong.

I am willing to take my share of the responsibility of the passage of this act; but casuists and theorists can demonstrate very easily that in this very act we laid the foundation of the long delay in the return to a specie standard. If the right to convert greenbacks into bonds had been retained as the permanent policy of the country during the war, then no man would have been bold enough or bad enough to take that provision away in time of peace. But mark, sir, while the legal right to convert notes into bonds was taken away, no one contemplated a denial of the actual conversion. The notes were still received par for par for bonds during the war and after the war was over. The right to convert them into a particular form of bonds, that is, the five-twenties, was denied; still they were converted at par into seven and three-tenths Treasury notes, into ten-forty gold bonds, and into every form of security except only the five-twenties. So that although we repealed the technical right to convert after a given time those notes into one class of bonds, we never did deny in practice the right to convert them into some form of interest-bearing security.

After the passage of the act of March 3, 1863, Secretary Chase believed that he could negotiate a ten-forty loan, and he tried to do it. One hundred million dollars were taken, and they were taken by the conversion of these notes, being received at par. Afterward we issued $830,000,000 of three-year Treasury notes bearing 7.3 per cent. currency interest, and when due convertible into 6 per cent. bonds; and they were sold at par in greenbacks. So that although the legal option of the note-holder to convert was taken away, yet in fact his right to convert existed except as to the five-twenty bonds. During the war, and up until 1866, there was no hour when any holder of greenbacks could not present them to the Treasury of the United States, or to any banker or broker, and buy some form of United States interest-bearing security at par.

After the passage of this act the five-twenties began to rise above par in currency. Then the measure of the value of the greenback was the ten-forty bond. When the Government again commenced issuing currency securities, seven and three-tenths notes, fearing to issue a larger amount of gold-bearing bonds, the greenbacks were allowed to be received at par for them.

Now, Mr. President, I have shown you that the greenbacks were based upon coin bonds; that they had the right to be converted into coin bonds; that that right was taken away as to the five-twenty bonds; but that, in practice and in effect, the greenback was convertible into an interest-bearing bond of the United States up to 1866, and until the passage of the law to which I will now refer.

My friend from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] inquires what law is the worst of all the laws we have passed in relation to the greenback.

Mr. MORTON. I did not say "law;" I said "what act of the Government."

Mr. SHERMAN. In my judgment more evil effects have resulted from the "act of the Government" passed on the 12th of April, 1866, than from any other act that was ever passed in regard to our financial system. Indeed, it is the only one that I desire to criticise.

Mr. President, what was the condition of affairs when the war was over? We had then outstanding every form of liability. We had 6 per cent. bonds; we had 5 per cent. bonds; we had seven-thirty bonds; we had certificates of indebtedness; we had two or three issues of greenback notes; we had eight or ten different forms of Government securities. Then it was that Congress was called upon to make provision for funding this debt. At that time there was a large circulation; there were some forms of interest-bearing notes that were a legal tender for the principal; we had almost every class of securities. The act of the Government which was most injurious to the public credit was an act of omission and not an act of commission. If in the first session of Congress during Andrew Johnson's administration we could have passed a funding bill authorizing any holder of any form of Government security to convert them into a 5 per cent. bond, all the evils that have flowed out of our disordered currency would have passed away; the questions that afterward were raised that endangered the public credit never would have arisen; all this long agony of doing what we have promised to do, and never performing it, would have been avoided. If in December, 1865, after our soldiers had returned to their homes and the war was over, we had authorized any holder of any form of security, greenback or bond, to convert it at his pleasure, at his will, into some proper security of the United States, say a 5 per cent. bond, there would have been no difficulty. The condition of the public credit, the advancing credit of the nation, the triumph of our arms, all causes co-operated; but, sir, it could not be done. At that time came up the controversy between the President of the United States and Congress, and the fierce and angry passions that it excited, the eager debates, the bitter excitement, the quasi civil war that existed, prevented any consideration of our finances. Efforts were made at that time to pass some proper funding bill, but it was impossible to get public attention attracted to it. Congress would not look at it. Finally, after a debate of not over an hour in the Senate, and a short debate in the House, the act of April 12, 1866, was passed, conferring upon the Secretary of the Treasury a power that was never conferred upon mortal man before. I will ask the Secretary to read that act.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means to support the Government," approved March 3, 1865.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act entitled "An act to provide ways and means to support the Government," approved March 3, 1865, shall be extended and construed to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, at his discretion, to receive any Treasury notes or other obligations issued under any act of Congress, whether bearing interest or not, in exchange for any description of bonds authorized by the act to which this is an amendment; and also to dispose of any description of bonds authorized by said act, either in the United States or elsewhere, to such an amount, in such manner, and at such rates as he may think advisable, for lawful money of the United States, or for any Treasury notes, certificates of indebtedness, or certificates of deposit, or other representatives of value, which have been or which may be issued under any act of Congress, the proceeds thereof to be used only for retiring Treasury notes or other obligations issued under any act of Congress; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize any increase of the public debt: Provided, That of United States notes not more than $10,000,000 may be retired and canceled within six months from the passage of this act, and thereafter not more than $4,000,000 in any one month: And provided further, That the act to which this is an amendment shall continue in full force in all its provisions, except as modified by this act.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall report to Congress at the commencement of the next session the amount of exchanges made or money borrowed under this act, and of whom, and on what terms; and also the amount and character of indebtedness retired under this act and the act to which this is an amendment, with a detailed statement of the expense of making such loans and exchanges.

Mr. SHERMAN. Under the enormous powers conferred by this act the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McCulloch, adopted what is called the contraction policy; that is, he authorized the funding of all forms of interest-bearing securities into 6 per cent. gold bonds of the United States, while he proposed to raise the greenback up to par in gold by contracting it by gradual stages limited by the law. This act, and the very first thing done under this act, separated forever the gold bonds of the United States from the legal-tenders, and abandoned all idea of the power, the right, and the practice to convert the greenback into a bond. I remember that the honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] and I tried to prevent the passage of this law. We tried hard to do it, and to excite public attention to it, but we could not. Everybody was then fighting Andrew Johnson. And so, sir, this law was passed after a brief debate, and all this enormous power was conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury. The law did not even stipulate what bond it should be, whether it should be a forty or twenty year bond, or whether it should run five years. The only limitation was that the rate of interest on the gold bond should not be over 6 per cent., but no duration as to time was prescribed. Under that act the Secretary funded the Treasury notes, and all the various forms of interest-bearing notes, into 6 per cent. bonds, swelling the amount of our 6 per cent. bonds from about $700,000,000 to about $1,600,000,000. All the Treasury notes payable in currency were converted into 6 per cent. gold bonds, and the money of the people, the greenbacks, were left to be canceled and retired under the last clause of the act, which authorized the Secretary to cancel $10,000,000 by a certain time, and $4,000,000 a month afterward. Thus the bondholder was provided for, and the note-holder was left without any legal right except a naked promise to pay in the indefinite future.

If this act had contained a simple provision restoring to the holder of the greenback the right to convert his note into bonds there would have been no trouble. Why should it not have been done? Simply because the then Secretary of the Treasury believed that the only way to advance the greenbacks was by reducing the amount of them; that the only way to get back to specie payments was by the system of contraction. If the legal-tender notes could have been wedded to any form of gold bond by being made convertible into it, they would have been lifted by the gradual advance of our public credit to par in gold, leaving the question of contraction to depend upon the amount of notes needed for currency. Sir, it was the separation of our greenbacks from the funding system that created the difficulty we have upon our hands to-day; and I say now that, in my judgment, the only true way to approach specie payments is to restore this principle, and give to the holder of the greenback, who is your creditor, the same right that you give to any other creditor. If he has a note which you promised to pay and cannot, and he desires interest on that note by surrendering it, why should you not give it to him? No man can answer that. It is just as much a debt as any other portion of the debt of the United States.

Mr. MORTON. If my friend will allow me, I think he has not properly answered the question which I put to him, as to what act of the Government had most dishonored the greenback.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not very parliamentary to be putting questions to me and leading me off from the course of my argument; but if the Senator will tell me what he is driving at, I will answer him.

Mr. MORTON. If my friend will allow me, I suggest that the act of the Government that I think did more to depreciate the greenback currency than any other, and has cost this Government more than any other, is this declaration, to be found on the back of the note:

This note is a legal tender at its face value for all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt.

My friend made a report as chairman of the Committee on Finance in 1866, offering an irresistible argument that this note meant just what it says, that these notes were a legal tender in payment of the five-twenty bonds, for the bonds were bought from the Government with these very notes. That argument has never been answered. But when the Government denied this property in the legal-tender notes, it thereby gave them a permanent depreciation. They would have been at par five or six years ago but for that act.

Mr. SHERMAN. What act is that?

Mr. MORTON. The determination upon the part of the Government that this language did not mean what it says.

Mr. ALLISON. You refer to the act of 1869.

Mr. MORTON. That act simply followed a determination that the Government had acted upon for some four or five years. That act was simply carrying it out. But the declaration, made before the war was over, that that language did not mean what it says, and that the Government could not use those notes in taking up the very bonds which were bought with them, in plain violation of the language and of the argument made by the Senator himself—I say that that determination has cost this Government more than any other blunder that ever was committed in regard to our finances. But for that these notes would have been at par years ago, millions of dollars would have been saved, and more of our public debt would have been paid off than is now paid.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know for the life of me what the Senator from Indiana is driving at. Does he wish to say that the act of March 18, 1869 is wrong—an act of bad policy? If he does, I understand him.

Mr. MORTON. I am merely stating the position my friend took in his report in 1866 in regard to the effect of that language. I am not quarreling with the act of 1869. When it was passed I acquiesced in it, and it is gone.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did make a report upon the act of 1866. I did make an earnest appeal to Congress to restore to the greenback the right that had been taken away from it during the war—the right to be converted into a bond. I stand there now, and I will stand there until every dollar of this debt is redeemed.

Mr. MORTON. My friend's argument in that report was that the Government had a right to use these greenbacks in the payment of those bonds.

Mr. SHERMAN. I insisted that they were convertible one into the other; that although the authority to convert a greenback into a five-twenty bond was repealed by the act of March 3, 1863, still in fact and in law the holder of a greenback had a right under the legal-tender clause to convert it into a bond. I stand there now, and there is where I wish the Senator from Indiana would stand with me. If he desires to make a tilt at the act of March 18, 1869, why does he not do it squarely and openly? Did he oppose it or resist? It is a pledge of the public faith; and I call upon him to aid me in carrying out that obligation.

Mr. MORTON. I agree that the Government is now bound by it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; then I call upon him to aid me to carry it out. We have made the promise, whether wisely or not it is not for us to inquire.

Mr. MORTON. The act of 1867 does not touch this question at all in regard to paying the greenbacks in coin; we were always bound to do that; but the argument of my friend in 1866 was that the Government had a right to issue the greenbacks in payment of five-twenties, and the fact that the Government came to a different conclusion before the war was over did more to depreciate the greenbacks than any other act that has ever been performed by the Government, and has cost this Government more; and but for that we should have had specie payments long ago.

Mr. SHERMAN. I always insisted that it was the duty of the Government to redeem this broken promise by making the note equal to par in gold before attempting to force it on anybody in payment of a bond. The Senator should see that we had no right to compel any holder of a bond to take a greenback in payment of his bond until we complied with that obligation which we assumed, long, long ago, to make it equal to par in gold. Then it would be a matter of indifference whether a greenback or gold was paid. But, sir, it was the act of March 18, 1869, that settled all this controversy about the obligation of the Government to the holders of the greenback and the bond; and it is that act of which he acknowledges the binding force, that I ask him to carry out.

By the act of 1866 $10,000,000 of greenbacks were to be retired in six months and canceled, and $4,000,000 every month thereafter. Such progress was made under the operation of the act that within less than two years $44,000,000 of these notes had been retired and canceled in pursuance of the contraction policy.

Mr. ALLISON. If I may interrupt the Senator, I desire to ask, was not that act repealed in 1868?

Mr. SHERMAN. It was suspended; and the Secretary could not cancel any more notes after the passage of the act of 1868. I have it here before me. The authority to retire and cancel greenbacks was suspended; but I ask the Senator from Iowa whether that revives into life and being the $44,000,000 that were retired and canceled under the law?

Mr. ALLISON. I only desire to call the Senator's attention to a part of the history of the withdrawal of these greenbacks. The then Secretary of the Treasury, instead of following out the spirit and letter of the law, which was that $4,000,000 per month should be withdrawn, allowed four or five months of the plethoric time of 1867 to pass away without withdrawing a single dollar of greenbacks, and when the months of September and October of 1867 came, when it was necessary to use a large amount of money in the Western States for the forwarding of the crops, the Secretary of the Treasury then reduced the greenback circulation $16,000,000 in two months; thus contracting the currency, instead of $4,000,000 a month, $16,000,000 in two months, so that when Congress came together in December, 1867, they withdrew from the Secretary of the Treasury the power which they believed he had abused; and from that time until now no Congress has ever authorized the withdrawal or the reduction of the circulation of the greenback currency. Am I not right?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not differ with the Senator from Iowa; but I do not see what that has to do with my argument.

Mr. ALLISON. It has this to do with the argument, that the policy of returning to specie payments in 1866, by the law of 1866, was reversed in 1868, by an act of Congress, and has never been resumed.

Mr. SHERMAN. And to that act I heartily assented. I do not doubt at all that the policy of getting to specie payments by a contraction of the currency in the way that was proposed was a very unwise one. I aided in its repeal. But that is not the point. When in 1869 we pledged the public faith to redeem our outstanding paper in coin, the only amount that then legally existed, or which there was any authority to issue, was the $356,000,000, to which amount, by the policy of the law of 1866, the currency had been reduced when that reduction was suspended. Therefore, I do not question my friend's statement about what Mr. McCulloch did, for I have nothing to say about it. The argument I make is that when we made the pledge of the public faith to redeem our notes in coin, the only currency that was legally outstanding was the $356,000,000. All above that had been retired and canceled. If there are any words in our language that express the destruction, the annihilation, the non-existence of anything, the words "retired and canceled" do. They are the very same words that are used in regard to the cancellation of all our bonds. There have been $3,000,000,000 of bonds in various forms "retired and canceled. Is there any power to reissue those? Not at all.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, I am unwilling to interrupt the Senator, and I dislike to say a word on this point of the legality of issuing the forty-four millions; but as on three different occasions during my administration there was no other way of maintaining the public credit but to issue a small portion of the forty-four millions, as it had been on one occasion at least used to a small extent by my immediate predecessor, as it was the opinion of the Department that that legal power existed, as that opinion had been confirmed by the Attorney-General of the United States, as that matter had been presented to the Committee on Ways and Means of the other House and the Committee on Finance of this House, and as those committees individually and generally were informed by the then Secretary of the Treasury what his view was of the legal rights of the Secretary of the Treasury in this respect, and as no action was ever taken, not only by Congress, but as no action was taken by either House of Congress, I, for one, think it is too late to question the good faith or even the legal authority of the present Secretary of the Treasury, or of either of his two immediate predecessors, upon that point.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the considerations now stated by the Senator from Massachusetts were undoubtedly submitted to Congress. The claim of the Secretary of the Treasury that he had the power to issue the forty-four millions was submitted to Congress, and neither House of Congress negatived by a vote the assertion of the power; and therefore it may be said with great propriety, and I freely accord, that under the circumstances, following the decision of the Department, the present Secretary might be justified in issuing the forty-four millions; but the argument I am making to-day is not to arraign the Secretary, not to find fault with him. In the written report made by the Committee on Finance on this subject we expressly relieved the Secretary of the Treasury from all fault in the matter and submitted it to Congress. I say that Congress now permits daily the violation of the only act that looked to the advance of greenbacks to par with gold by its silent acquiescence. The Secretary of the Treasury submitted to us the claim that he has asserted and exercised, and we have never denied it as a Congress or by either House of Congress; and therefore I do not find fault with him; but I say that Congress does permit this act, which in my judgment is a violation of law and an exercise of authority not delegated to the Secretary of the Treasury, to go on, and we are now daily living upon notes issued without authority of law.

Mr. President, I have gone into this argument to show, first, that we are bound by the obligation that we assumed on the 18th of March, 1869, to resume specie payments, or to do something to advance our notes to the par of gold. I have endeavored to show that such was the legal and established policy of the Government when the notes were first issued. Now, I have only to say, very briefly, that there are various modes, to none of which do I intend to commit myself until the whole subject is finally discussed, by which this can easily, without trouble, without difficulty, be accomplished. There are three modes that have been proposed in debate in the Senate, and a multitude come to us from the people, but I will group them into three classes.

There is, first, the proposition to accumulate gold in the Treasury with a view to the actual redemption of our notes in coin. That is supported by two bills now before the committee; one introduced by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] and the other by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN.] What are the objections to this plan? They seem to me to be these: In the first place, any attempt to accumulate large masses of gold in the Treasury, lying idle to await some future event not fixed by act of Congress, would not be a wise use of the public moneys. In the next place, I entirely object to conferring upon the Secretary of the Treasury the power of issuing one hundred millions or any lesser sum of 6 per cent. bonds with a view to buy gold to hoard it in the Treasury to maintain resumption. I believe that it is impossible, in the very nature of things, to maintain the resumption of specie payments at all times and under all circumstances; and if anything has been established by modern experience, it is that all a nation can do that issues paper money is to maintain it at a specie standard in ordinary times; but, in times of panic, such as by periodical revulsions come over every country, specie payments cannot be maintained. They can scarcely be maintained in England, and are not now maintained in France, although they approach them. Therefore, every plan for specie payments ought to have some provision for the temporary suspension of specie payments, or some means by which in times of great panic and financial distress there may be a temporary departure from the specie standard. I say this not that it ought to be so, but simply as a matter of demonstrated experience shown by the history of almost all commercial nations in Europe.

The second plan is the actual payment of the United States notes and their cancellation; in other words, the plan of contraction. In the first place, this plan, while it operates, does so with such severity as, in a popular government like ours, to cause its suspension and repeal. Undoubtedly, the most certain way to produce specie payments is by retiring the notes that are dishonored, paying them off, taking them out of circulation. But the trouble is, the process of contraction is itself so severe upon the ordinary current business of the country that the people will not stand it; and in this country the people rule. The policy of Mr. McCulloch, already commented upon, if it had been continued further, would have undoubtedly brought us to a specie standard; but with great distress, great impoverishment, and with more difficulty than was really necessary to accomplish the object in view.

These are the difficulties that occur to me as against these two policies.

There is a third plan. This plan, which in my judgment presents the easiest and best mode of attaining specie payments, is by taking some bond of the United States which in ordinary times, by current events, is shown to be worth par in gold in the money markets of the world, where specie is alone the standard of value, and authorize the conversion of notes into that bond.

I do not intend to consume much time upon the discussion of these different plans, because they are all open for debate, and I do not intend to commit myself. I have no pride of opinion as to modes if I can secure the substance. I want to get at some measure which, without contraction, without undue distress, will make us redeem our promise. This mode of vesting the specie standard was reported favorably by the Committee on Finance at the last session. I will glance at the results that would have been accomplished by that plan in the present condition of our money market. I am speaking here now, on the 16th day of January, 1874, after the time when, by the bill reported at the last session, United States notes could have been converted into coin or bonds at the option of the United States. This would not to-day have produced absolute payment of the notes in coin, but their value would be advanced to the value of the 5 per cent. bond. Things that are equal to the same are equal to each other. Five per cent. gold bonds this day, in the midst of the panic, are worth ninety-nine and a half cents; so that the United States notes would be this day practically at par in gold, having just about the same depreciation as now exists in France where the law of convertibility has always been maintained. In France, with a large currency, that currency may be used to pay the same as gold for any form of debt of or to the government, even the form of duties.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I should like to ask a question just here.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather not be interrupted now.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. It is on the point the Senator was just discussing.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I ask whether, in the Senator's judgment, the value of the currency in France depends so much on the convertibility of the notes into bonds, or on their being made lawful money for all purposes, which our greenbacks are not?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt that it would greatly advance our greenbacks if they were allowed to be received at the custom-houses for duties.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Is that not the case in France?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; but I will ask the Senator a question now. Would he pass such a law in the face of the obligation of the United States, made on the 25th day of February, 1862, that this coin shall be set apart sacredly as a fund?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. If I had control of the finances of this nation I would not discredit my own paper; I would declare it good for all purposes for or against me, and then enter the market and purchase the gold necessary to meet the obligations which I had agreed to pay in coin. In that case I would stand upon the French basis and maintain the same credit which the French nation maintains to-day, to wit, a discount of $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. on its currency, while ours to-day is about 10 per cent., for the very reason that we have not made our currency lawful money for all purposes, but have made an exception in regard to duties.

Mr. SHERMAN. I only gave way to a question.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The Senator put a question to me, and I was answering it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio declines to be further interrupted.

Mr. SHERMAN. The answer to all this is, that by the act of the 25th of February, 1862, which authorized the issue of bonds and greenbacks both, it was expressly stipulated that the greenbacks should not be receivable for customs duties, but it was expressly stipulated that the customs duties should be paid in coin, and that this coin should be specially pledged and set apart as a fund to pay the interest, and then the principal, of the debt. There is the difficulty. If we were now to legislate without any law upon the statute-book, I certainly would not pass an act that would require us to refuse the notes of the United States for the taxes payable to the United States; but we are crippled by the operation of a law that we cannot repeal without violating the public faith.

Now, sir, taking the case again of the existence of some such convertible provision as I referred to in the bill of last year, at this day the notes, instead of being hoarded, would to some extent have floated into the Treasury for 5 per cent. bonds; they would be paid out for current expenses, and in the purchase or redemption of five-twenties at a discount of one-half of 1 per cent. It is sometimes said that these notes would flow in in unmeasured numbers for 5 per cent. bonds. Why, sir, how many would be withdrawn from the volume of the currency before they would be equal to the 5 per cent. bonds now at or near par in gold? But suppose they should flow in to the extent of fifty or one hundred millions, cannot the Government of the United States use them? First, we have to pay our current expenses, which are now more than our income. Instead of consuming the forty-four million reserve, we could use some of them coming into the Treasury for bonds to pay the current expenses; and we could use all of them in the purchase and redemption of the 6 per cent. bonds of the United States. There would be no practical difficulty in using all the currency that might flow into the Treasury in the payment and liquidation at a slight sacrifice of a debt now bearing 6 per cent. interest. That operation might go on until $1,200,000,000 were paid, because every dollar of the five-twenty bonds is now due and payable at our pleasure in coin.

Sir, the Secretary of the Treasury has for years adopted the policy of buying bonds in greenbacks. He has paid 10 per cent. premium, because he could not get them for less. And suppose our notes were advanced near the par of gold by being convertible into a 5 per cent. bond, the value of which is fixed in foreign countries, then let him use the greenbacks that flow into the Treasury to pay the 6 per cent. bonds. He could only do it by paying the difference between notes and gold. What premium would he have to pay? One-half of 1 per cent. This operation of funding the 6 per cent. bonds into the new 5 per cents is going on now at an expense of nearly 2 per cent. to the Government. First the law allows 1 per cent. for expenses, and then a certain credit or a certain delay in payment is given to the syndicate or bankers who negotiate the exchange. This is equivalent to 1½ per cent., so that we are now carrying on this funding system at an expense of more than 2 per cent. Sir, the practical operation of a law permitting the conversion of notes into bonds would not only advance our notes to near par in gold, but would enable us to reduce the interest on the whole mass of 6 per cent. bonds of the United States to 5 per cent., thus saving $12,000,000 per annum, or several times the amount of interest we would pay on bonds given for notes permanently retired.

Now, sir, I will not go into the details of the other provisions of that bill, which was to supply any want of currency needed at the time. That bill provided for free banking; it provided for a relief from the reserve to be maintained by the banks as a security for their notes. Sir, if you take the actual facts as they have now developed themselves and apply the principles contained in the bill of the last session, they would have answered by their actual workings all the objections that were made to the bill, and I defy Senators to criticise it.

But, sir, the time will come when whatever plan may be brought before the Senate will be subjected to amendment and criticism. We are not now considering any plan, but only whether we recognize our obligation now at this session to do some definite act to redeem our broken promises. If you will you can find a way.

Mr. President, there are some objections of a popular character made to specie payments, that I think I ought to answer.

In a popular government like ours even an unfounded fear ought not to go unheeded. Warnings are uttered; a great bugaboo is raised against every measure that tends toward specie payments. Let us examine some of these popular objections.

The first objection (and it is the only one well taken) is that specie resumption will be burdensome to debtors. Undoubtedly, if you advance a standard in which a man's debt is to be paid, you add to the burden of that debt. We are now dealing on a standard of about 11 per cent. below par; and if, by some sudden act of Congress, a debtor should be required to pay in a standard worth 11 per cent. more than the present par, it would be burdensome to him. Therefore it is, and for this reason only it is, necessary to make any step moderate, to make the advance slow; and I for one would not desire to see any sudden resumption, because it would be injurious to a class of business men who are now more or less in debt. This injury is greatly exaggerated, for almost every debtor is a creditor, and therefore while he loses on the one hand he gains on the other. Debts are now less than they were a short time since. The recent panic swept away a great many of them. Most of those which remain are being settled on the present basis, so that never was there a time when an act, looking to a change of the standard of values, could be made better than now. There are fewer contracts to be settled upon the old standard. If the time for making this change of standard is postponed for a short period, say a year, all the debts contracted on the present basis would be settled up.

Why, sir, this is not the first time we have changed the standard. We did it in 1835; and we have changed the value of our gold coin twice within my recollection. We have changed the value of silver two or three times. The monthly fluctuations that happen in the city of New York sometimes are greater than all the amount of difference between our paper money and gold now. The people are used to these. Sir, you live in a State whose chief production is now, or was, wheat. You have seen wheat jump up from fifty cents to a dollar a bushel, and go down from a dollar to fifty cents again—a fluctuation of 100 per cent. These fluctuations are unavoidable; but when they affect the standard of all values they ought to be made carefully and slowly. Here, Senators, is the only difficulty in this whole problem. When we made our notes a legal tender, when we repealed the convertibility clause, when we took away their value and saw them depreciate down to 280 per cent., we did great injustice to creditors. We did it because we were compelled to do it. All the Senators around me admit that at some time we must come to a specie standard. When can we do it more easily, when can we do it better? Will you flood the country again with more irredeemable paper money, sink again the standard of value, make the depreciation beyond what it was when General Grant was elected, 30 or 40 per cent., and then resume? How foolish! how idle! The moment when we approach the specie standard nearest by natural causes, that is the happy moment to complete the cycle, to restore us to the old and true foundation.

The next objection is that the United States will have to pay interest on a portion of its debt which is now without interest. I have heard that argument made, I think by my friend from Indiana. He has said, "You would make us pay interest on our greenbacks; they will be converted into interest-bearing bonds." Well, why should we not pay interest on our debt that is due? Why should the people of the United States have a forced loan which they require everybody to take, debtor and creditor, without interest? Why should they not pay interest on it? If these notes are idle in the nands of the people and there is no opportunity for investment, and they have no desire to use them, why should we not pay interest while they do not want to use them? It is perfectly obvious that the strongest grounds of equity demand that when anybody has our note not bearing interest, has no immediate use for it, prefers to put it on interest, we are bound either to pay him, as we agreed to pay him, in coin, or we are bound to give him something that will bear interest, and will be as near as practicable to a specie standard. Therefore, this scarecrow about increasing our interest-paying debt does not disturb me. Why, sir, we have in the last five years paid off four hundred millions of bonds, and have saved interest to the amount of $30,000,000. No one has claimed that the interest of the debt of the United States would be increased by this system more than two or three millions. Why should we not do it? Why should not the people have for their greenbacks the same privilege that is extended to other creditors?

A third objection that was made, I think by my colleague, who is not now in his seat, [Mr. THURMAN,] was that the United States notes would be retired from circulation and give place to bank-notes, and he has a great prejudice against bank-notes. I am not much of a bank man myself. I would not care if there was only one form of circulation in this country, and that a United States note convertible at the pleasure of the holder into a proper bond, or into coin. But the national banks sprang out of the necessities of the war. We could not absorb the State banks and get rid of the horde of inconvertible, irredeemable paper-issuing, irresponsible system of banks all over this country, except by allowing them to be organized into national banks. We cannot get rid of them now. That was the only way in which they could be dealt with. They disturbed during the war our whole system; but now the present banking system is so much better than the old, the currency is so good, so well secured, of such universal circulation, and everywhere at par with greenbacks, that nobody would propose to go back to the old system.

Mr. President, as these banks are compelled to redeem their notes in greenbacks; as they are bound to maintain in their vaults a reserve of greenbacks; as every prudent banker will maintain this reserve in greenbacks; there is no danger that the United States notes will be driven from circulation to give place to bank-notes to any considerable amount. The same provision for redemption that is applied to United States notes is applicable also to national-bank notes. If the United States redeem their notes in coin, the banks have to redeem theirs in coin. If the United States notes are redeemed in United States bonds, the banks are compelled to redeem their notes in the same way. The very moment that a bank-note falls below the value, the purchasable power, the convertible power of the United States note, that very moment it would be returned first to the bank, and in case of its failure to pay then to the Treasury of the United States, and there, with the bonds in the Treasury or with the proceeds of them, the Treasurer would pay them dollar for dollar. So that the same plan of redemption that we now propose to apply to United States notes is applicable by existing law to the bank-notes; and hence the theory that this plan will drive out the United States notes and give way to bank-notes is utterly futile. The same burden which now rests on the United States to redeem its notes will then rest on the banks; and, as I said a moment ago, you are now dealing with institutions that are amply able to redeem their notes. Whether any of them have in the speculations of the past impaired their capital or not, is a matter of perfect indifference to the people of the United States as long as the notes are secure. You can present no plan of redemption which the banks are not able at this moment, promptly to-day, to comply with. If your law should take effect requiring the banks to redeem either in coin or in bonds of the United States, every bank has these bonds and 10 per cent. over. Therefore this plan of redemption applies not only to the United States notes, but to the banks under existing law; and it is not necessary to even change the law to make it more rigorous or direct.

Sir, the last objection is that it will contract the currency. That is the image of alarm that came to us from the experiment—as I thought the bad experiment—of 1866. My honorable friend from Indiana, from the way in which he pronounced the word "contraction," seemed to think it was some terrible thing. Well, sir, the people are afraid of contraction. I do not want to contract the currency. But what is contraction? Is it to fulfill an obligation to pay a note when it is due; to pay in coin when you have promised to pay in coin? I do not think that is contraction. Why, sir, I do honestly believe that if now there was a plan of redemption agreed upon by which notes could be converted into coin or bonds at the pleasure of the holder, all restrictions upon the amount of currency were repealed, the amount of currency thus at par with gold would be greater than it is at present, and its purchasing power would be just exactly 11 per cent. more. The people, in the Western States especially, have been very fearful on this point, although they are now getting bravely over it. Look at the reports of their chambers of commerce, their boards of trade; see the intelligent opinion that comes up from the Western States. The people of the West were terribly alarmed about contraction of the currency, but they begin to understand it. The laboring man who is paid off in a greenback begins to desire that that greenback may buy as much food and clothing and produce as the best dollar that was coined in the mint. He begins to understand that he receives that for his daily labor which will not purchase him the supplies that gold would. The farmer, also, who sells his produce mostly to a foreign market, finds that, under this system, when he is paid in greenbacks, he has to pay greenback prices for his purchases, while his commodities are settled for by the gold standard.

And, sir, I can here show by the actual returns from Mr. Young, of the Statistical Bureau of the Treasury Department, that although the price of greenbacks fluctuates, as compared with the standard of gold, yet the articles which the farmer sells depend almost entirely on the gold price and are fixed by the gold standard. Wherever he sells his surplus products, the ruling price in the foreign market fixes the prices of his commodities here. The price of the farmer's produce is fixed by the gold standard, and was during all the war, and is to-day, and will be to-morrow. His price is fixed by the gold standard, while what he buys is fixed by the currency standard.

The people are beginning to understand that; and when they find out that "contraction," with all its horrors, means good money, convertible money, greenbacks convertible into gold, they will sound hallelujahs in favor of that kind of money. They now feel that the greenback money is a good money—as my friend from Indiana says, the best money that ever was devised by man. Well, sir, in many of its properties it is good money; it is of universal circulation, universal credit; it has a fixed value, fixed daily by the quotations in New York, and it has a universal value; it passes readily from hand to hand. It is so much better than the old system, and all like it. There is only one thing to crown the perfect work of this money to make it the best in the world, and that is, make it equal to what it promises to pay. Then you have good money, you have money based upon the public credit, a note of the United States not dishonored, a note whose purchasing power is as good as the best gold that ever was coined in any mint, or ever mined in Peru, or Australia, or America; a money whose purchasing power will enter into the markets of the world and buy its face value in the products of the world; a money which, if convertible into coin, will travel, like the Bank of England note, all around the world, buying in every mart and every community the production of every clime. Sir, this is what we aim at, this is what we desire; and when the people begin to understand this question, and see that this cry about contracting the currency means nothing but an effort to stave off the immutable event which will come, which we have promised shall come, namely, a specie standard, they will then silence the demagogical clamor of the hour.

Why, sir, a year or two ago, if you had convened your chambers of commerce and boards of trade and representative business men of the country before this panic, and submitted to them any proposition which looked to the advancement of the greenback to the standard of gold, they would have passed resolutions without number against it. But now they are all passing resolutions for it. Almost every one of them is opposing any increase of the paper money of the country. These documents from representative men could not have come here a year ago in favor of specie payments, led off by the great petition from the Chamber of Commerce of New York, presented here a month ago. Sir, the people will soon reply to these popular objections.

But, sir, we have had a great deal of talk here about the amount of currency we ought to have, and Senators have made the computation how much currency per inhabitant, how much for every man, woman, and colored baby, how much for every child, how much for every bushel of wheat. How much currency should we have? They figure it out in some way that France and England have more currency than we, and that as no nation shall have more of a good thing than the United States, therefore we are determined to have all that any other country has! That is the argument. They say, "We want more money." Well, in the sense in which money means capital, I think we all want more money. In the sense in which money is used as a mere medium of exchange to measure value, to pass from hand to hand, to facilitate commercial transactions, the only test and measure of the amount necessary is that which can be maintained at the specie standard; no other. Why, sir, you might as well say that a yard is not thirty-six inches long, and economize by using one thirty inches long; what would be the effect of it? It would take more yards of cloth to make the coat; but the coat would not cost any less.

Sir, the only standard of the amount of paper money needed in any country is the amount that can be maintained at the specie standard. The amount of currency in Great Britain, in Bank of England notes, is £25,162,000; in other banks of England, Ireland, and Scotland, £18,226,000; making a total of £43,338,000, or, in dollars, 216,940,000 of paper money, as good as gold. That is enough to carry on all the business transactions of Great Britain.

But my friend from Indiana says Great Britain is a small country compared to the United States; it does not cover as many arid plains and deserts as the United States; it has not the area or the population of the United States. Sir, area and population are not the things that demand currency; it is business, wealth, production; and, although I wish it was otherwise, we cannot, as yet, compare with the wealth or commerce of Great Britain.

Mr. MORTON. Does the Senator give that as the entire currency of Great Britain?

Mr. SHERMAN. I give that as the entire paper currency of Great Britain.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator if business can be done without people or area?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; we must have some people to carry on business, and some area on which they may live. We have been told that Great Britain is a small country compared with ours, and yet that kingdom contains thirty million people, who have now twice the actual wealth, and more than twice the commerce, of our people. The accumulated wealth of ages of our own race is there.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I understood the Senator to say that it was capital that was wanted, and not people or area. Can there be capital without people or area?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I understood the Senator to say that the volume of the currency depended upon the business of the country, and not upon the people or territory.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not say that. I said the currency necessarily depended upon wealth, production, &c.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. And not upon people, or the extent of territory?

Mr. SHERMAN. Without people and area there can be no wealth and production; but the amount of currency needed depends upon the amount and nature of the productions of the people. The Senator from Indiana says that $216,940,000 is only one form of money in Great Britain. So it is; but it is the amount of paper money that they undertake to maintain at par in gold. A wise nation like Great Britain, with ample experience in all financial questions, where they have been managed with great skill, where more time in Parliament is devoted to them than in Congress here—that nation has decided that it is not wise ever to attempt to circulate more paper money than can at all times be maintained at par in gold. They prohibit by law the issue of any more paper money. No new stock banks are organized, and the Bank of England cannot issue one pound of paper money more than the amount fixed by law thirty years ago, at £15,000,000, and such additional amount as they have actual gold on hand. Every dollar is secured by government securities or gold on hand.

Senators say that the Bank of England can issue in times of panic more than the amount allowed. It has done so at three exceptional periods of distress. But this did not cause a suspension of specie payments. Not at all. When the Bank of England note is issued in excess of the legal limit it is done by order of the ministry, at their hazard, just as they would do any other unlawful act for the public safety. The amount is limited, say to £2,000,000, or $10,000,000; securities are required, and the profit of that issue goes to the government. So careful are they. The amount of notes issued by the Bank of England in excess of the legal limit was never over £2,000,000 sterling, and in one case no notes were issued. The authority to issue arrested the panic. The issue when made was within sixty days withdrawn and the old limit restored. Why, sir, we in this country have increased our paper money in five years over $80,000,000, and the Secretary of the Treasury during and since the panic has issued new paper money fourfold in volume the aggregate of temporary issues by the Bank of England since Peel's act of 1844.

But the Senator from Indiana says Great Britain has coin. So it has, and the reason why it has coin is because there is a use for the coin there. So, if we were at the specie standard, coin made in our own country of the gold mined here would be kept here. It would have some useful employment. But, sir, one of the evil effects of a depreciated currency is to demonetize coin, to drive it out, because the poorer currency always fills the channels of circulation. Therefore it is that we cannot keep in this country any considerable amount of gold in the present condition of our affairs, unless we hoard it in the Treasury of the United States. A private citizen has no use for it. He sends it abroad where they do recognize its value, where they do use it in ordinary affairs. The gold of our country is hoarded by the Treasury; and as long as you have a depreciated currency one of the inevitable effects of such a currency is to banish gold from the country, although it is our own production. We banish the children of our mines, the work of our hands, because we will deny the fundamental truth that gold mined from the earth is the standard of value. We have repudiated it. We have rejected the true god and set up an idol of our own; and thus that which we produce ourselves is forced from our own country.

So with France. I have already given the amount of paper circulation there. The issues of the Bank of France were 2,606,377,000 francs, or $521,275,000; and this is practically maintained at par in gold, as the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] very properly said.

Now, sir, when this cry is made for more money, I answer, yes; let us have more money, but let it be more good money, more money that will purchase that which money in any other country will purchase. I want the best; and if my friends here really believe that France and Great Britain have, counting their gold, a little more currency per capita than we have, let me console them by telling them that if we come back to specie payments we shall have more good money, both paper and coin, than any country in the world. Now, at this moment, if you take our paper money and add it to the gold in this country, you will see that we have more per capita than any nation in the world. Why, sir, how much paper money have we? About $772,000,000, every dollar of which is a legal tender practically. Although the bank-notes are not a legal tender by law, yet in fact we know they are. We have to receive them nolens volens. What other country has got this amount? France has $521,000,000 of paper money. Great Britain has $217,900,000 paper money. But they have more gold than we. Why? Because you banish it from your country. Who would keep gold now? Would a bank keep it? It is more dangerous to keep than paper money, because it is heavier and more difficult to guard. Would a merchant keep it? Yes, to the extent that he has to pay it out to the Government for duties. The Government keeps it, and the amount that is owned by merchants is held by the Government in New York on gold certificates. So the Government is the custodian of all the gold in the country banished from circulation. Sir, take the aggregate of our currency, and where are you? With more paper money per capita than any country in Europe has of paper and gold.

Now, sir, let me caution Senators in regard to their estimates of gold in foreign countries. In France it was estimated that there was $700,000,000 of gold, and France was compelled to pay of this gold more than $400,000,000 to Germany in the settlement of their difficulties.

Mr. SCHURZ. A thousand millions.

Mr. SHERMAN. I beg pardon. The sum paid was $1,000,000,000; but this was partly by credits and partly in gold. The effect of the Germanic war has been that the gold of France has enormously decreased; no one can tell exactly how much is left.

The Senator from Indiana a moment ago said they had $300,000,000 of gold in circulation in Great Britain. I am not prepared to dispute it.

Mr. SCHURZ. Seventy million pounds sterling, according to the estimate I had yesterday.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am not prepared to dispute it, because I can show by English writers, and even by the declaration of the chancellor of the exchequer, that it is utterly impossible to tell how much gold there is in England. There are no returns that enable them to do it. It is kept there by joint stock companies, by the Bank of England, and by private persons. A large portion of the commerce of England being foreign commerce, large masses of gold in the coin of different countries are held by merchants. As to the precise amount, no one can tell what it is.

Mr. SCHURZ. I read the other day from the statement of an English financial writer that they had £70,000,000 sterling there; but it was a mere estimate.

Mr. MORTON. Three hundred and fifty million dollars.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now add the $350,000,000 of gold currency to the amount of their paper money. Take it as you claim it, but what does it make? Five hundred and sixty-six million dollars to do the business of that nation of thirty-two millions; while we have of inconvertible paper money $770,000,000. Why therefore say that we have less money than England? Sir, we have more per capita.

Mr. BAYARD. Will my friend from Ohio permit me to suggest to him, also, that there is a large part of this country, the Pacific coast, where the currency is gold; so that that which is merchandise simply in the Atlantic States is currency on the Pacific coast; and that, also, in the city of New York and other ports of the Atlantic States a large amount of the business of merchants is transacted upon a gold basis, and in gold alone? In considering the amount of money that is furnished to the people I think he is very much understating when he confines himself to paper currency alone.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt of it. I have no doubt that the money now in circulation in this country is greater per capita than in any nation in Europe; and I thank my friend for reminding me that the Pacific coast uses gold and silver, it is estimated, to the extent of twenty or thirty millions of dollars, perhaps more.

Mr. SCOTT. Permit me to say that while I have no idea that any per capita amount can be fixed, I am sure the chairman of the Committee on Finance would not wish an erroneous impression to go out as to the amount of currency that is really at the service of the business community when he states that we have $769,000,000 paper currency. The reserve upon that usually amounts to about $200,000,000, which reduces it to about $550,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. While undoubtedly there is a considerable amount held by the banks as reserve, it is not so much as the Senator from Pennsylvania states. Much of that is in the form of credits by deposit banks. But let me remind the Senator that in England the Bank of England holds, and is compelled to hold, a large portion of the gold in England as a reserve. Every bank has to have a reserve. So with the Bank of France. There is a much larger percentage of reserve held in the Bank of France now than is held by the banks of the United States. Their reserve, if I remember aright, is about 30 per cent., whereas our banks average less than 20 per cent., and much of this in credits. The Bank of England reserve is greater than ours, and Bastiat has written a book to show that it is too small.

As a matter of course, if you go into all the details about reserve you could never get the precise results. The truth is, there is no mode of testing how much money is needed to do the business of a country except that amount which can be maintained at par in gold. The very fact that our money is depreciated 11 per cent. is as conclusive as any sum in arithmetic can be that you have more money than can be maintained at the proper legal standard. You cannot get around that. There is but one standard, and every addition to the volume that cannot be maintained at that standard is conclusive evidence that there is too much money afloat of that kind.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; but I fear I shall never get through.

Mr. MORTON. I understood my friend to assert just now that the depreciation of the currency was evidence that there was too much of it. Is that the statement?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is conclusive evidence.

Mr. MORTON. If that be true, then if we cut off 10 per cent. of the volume of currency, the depreciation being 10 per cent., that alone, according to his argument, ought to bring it to par. I want to know whether it will do it.

Mr. SHERMAN. My own impression is that less than that will do it; that when you give additional value to the greenback, so that people can use it as gold, so that it will be equivalent to gold, the gold itself will become a part of the currency. It is probable the full amount of the present issue of legal-tenders can be maintained if you will only give it an equal value with gold. When you make your paper money equal to gold it floats with gold and fills the channels of trade. In my deliberate judgment, in this country of broad extent, as my friend says, of varied population, of varied productions, a larger amount of currency could be maintained at par in gold than the actual currency now in hand. I have some statistics here, but I am too weary to go into them, which show what amount of currency we maintained at par in gold before the war, and by a comparison of our condition then and now I could estimate what amount can be maintained. But, sir, the only standard, the only rule, by which we can judge of the amount of paper money is that quantity which can be maintained at par in gold. If you declare illegal and invalid this standard, no man can tell how much circulation is needed. The only way is to test it by the barometer of New York. This is as sure a test as the instruments here around the Senate Chamber are tests of the heat of this room.

There is another class of measures now pending on which I wish to make a few remarks, and they are the propositions to inflate the currency still more. The process of inflation is now going on daily while we are debating. This surely ought to be stopped. This issue of the forty-four millions ought to be suspended at once. The payment of this money ought to be arrested and some other provision made to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government. The plan that I suggested a moment ago would do that, by authorizing the funding of notes into bonds. But there are other propositions. The Senator from Michigan proposes to issue $100,000,000 increased currency, to require the system of banks now organized over this country to retire their circulation, and to issue an amount of greenbacks equal to the whole, aggregating $300,000,000, and this, I suppose, in addition to the fractional currency; in other words, an increase of currency of about $100,000,000.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Including the forty-four million reserve?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; including the forty-four million reserve, an increase of $100,000,000. I appeal to my friend, to his candor, his sincerity, to say whether the immediate effect of that would not be to depreciate that which is outstanding.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I would merely say that, in 1870, we increased the currency fifty-four millions, and the premium on coin to-day is less than it was during the average of that year. Now, I ask by what reasoning will the price of coin increase if we increase the currency to about the same amount, which is the ratio I propose?

Mr. SHERMAN. The remark now made by the Senator compels me to make a confession, that I believe that act of 1870 did arrest the downward course of gold and the rapid march toward specie payments. As I contributed to the passage of that act, I am sorry to take the responsibility. From the time of the passage of that act the appreciation toward the specie standard was arrested, and now, to-day, four years after the passage of that act, your paper money is worth no more than it was at the date of the passage of that act.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I hold in my hand a statement of the prices of gold during the several months of 1870, and the average premium on gold in 1870 was higher than that in 1873.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have the standard here. I took the 18th day of March, 1870, which was about the average of that year, because it was a year after the passage of our law of 1869. The premium on gold was then 11¼; to-day, I believe, it is 12. Some one tells me gold is 112 in New York to-day; so that in four years the advance we have made to specie payments is one-eighth of 1 per cent. backward.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Then the Senator admits substantially that the premium on coin is the same now that it was then. With an increase of $54,000,000 circulation in 1870 the premium on coin has not advanced.

Mr. SHERMAN. Thirty-nine million dollars of bank circulation.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Of bank circulation.

Mr. SHERMAN. If $54,000,000 had been issued, it would have been more; but only $39,000,000 has been issued under the law; $54,000,000 were authorized, but only $39,000,000 issued.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but he has not escaped the fact that $25,000,000 of the $44,000,000 reserve of greenbacks are already out; that more than makes up the amount, so that the increase, as I propose it, is about the same that was made in 1870. Then, if that increase of $54,000,000 in 1870 has not advanced the premium on coin, upon what basis or reasoning does the Senator arrive at the conclusion which he states, that my proposition of increase of about $50,000,000 will increase the premium on coin?

Mr. SHERMAN. Because there is no doubt about it. Every addition to the currency does it. If I wanted to teach my friend this plain lesson in political economy I should have to read to him from the school-books used in every college, down to the last work on political economy. It is an axiom of political economy, which lies at the very groundwork and foundation, repeated by every author that ever wrote upon the subject, as necessary a consequence as that water will seek its own level. Any increase of paper currency tends to impair its value when it is once depreciated.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I merely put against that theory of the books the facts of the present. The Senator has stated, I believe, that the price of gold in 1870 was substantially what it is to-day; I think only a difference of ¼ per cent., or something of that kind. If, then, with an increase of $54,000,000 circulation since 1870 the price of gold has not advanced, then I say that experience against the books verifies what I now say, that the increase which is proposed will not any more advance the premium on coin than did the increase of 1870.

Mr. SHERMAN. After the passage of the act the Senator refers to, authorizing this increase, the price of gold steadily advanced and again commenced to decline. As a matter of course, if we could once fix the amount, we could no doubt come to it in time; but what assurance have we that after you have issued your $100,000,000, and gold goes up to 133, as it will, and then after the power of inflation has exhausted itself and gold commences to go down, what reason is there to suppose that my honorable friend from Michigan, or some successor of his, will not come here and demand another inflation, and then say that the inflation will not, at the end of four years, increase the price of gold?

There is no mode of accounting for the fact that the value of our greenback has not advanced one single step for four years, except that you have increased the volume of paper and have taken no steps whatever to advance its value. As a matter of course, if you would maintain the amount of paper money at a certain rate for one hundred years till our country got to contain three hundred millions of people, it would be all as good as gold; but if the Senate should follow the lead of my honorable friend and dilute the currency, put water into the elements that now compose our currency, it would undoubtedly depreciate it.

Senators, we have now arrived at a stage of our history where, if we will obey the law and keep the public faith, we shall surely come to safety, prosperity, resting upon the universal standard of value—when industry will be rewarded, and not cheated by the depreciation of paper money. If, on the other hand, you will enter again into a depreciation of your paper money, adopting the cry of expansion, "more money," you will surely travel a road that many nations have traveled before us, to bankruptcy and repudiation.

I will turn over my friend from Michigan for a further answer to my friend from Indiana. The Senator from Indiana says that the issue of the paper money under the law of 1870, the authority to grant new banks, was not expansion, because by the same law the 3 per cents were retired. He construes, therefore, the law of 1870 as not inflating the currency at all. My friend from Michigan, I understand, regards it as expansion to the fullest extent of the amount of notes issued. I hope they will settle it between them.

Mr. MORTON. I would rather settle it just now.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not in my time.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. It is rather shutting us down.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I want to get through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio declines to yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose the Senators who advise more paper money will settle this matter in a private conference.

There is another view I wish to take of this plan of expansion. If you issue the proposed three sixty-five convertible bonds, what will they be worth? I see here some New York bankers. They have computed the value of these bonds before they are issued by the rule of three. A 5 per cent. bond is now practically par in gold. If a 5 per cent. bond is at par in gold, what would a three sixty-five gold bond be worth? Senators can answer that very quickly, because there is a reduction in value of one-third to commence with. If a 5 per cent. gold bond is only worth par, a three sixty-five gold bond would only be worth two-thirds of par. Then, if a three sixty-five gold bond is worth sixty-six cents on the dollar, what will a three sixty-five convertible paper bond be worth? That query will be put to every broker and banker in New York the very moment you authorize such a bond to be issued. They would measure your device by the gold standard before you issued it. They would quote a bond convertible and reconvertible into irredeemable paper money at its value in gold.

But, sir, there is one other reason why all these plans and all these schemes of more paper money ought not even to be debated here. An increase of paper money beyond four hundred millions would be a clear and palpable violation of the public faith. In the darkest hours of the war, when every patriot trembled, when our fate hung in the balance, when our armies were before Richmond, when our armies were on the march through Georgia to the sea, when everybody felt that the danger of inconvertible paper money was likely to strike us from the list of nations, when our paper money then outstanding had fallen so that it took $2.80 to buy one dollar in gold, gold being at a premium of 280, then it was that we entered into a stipulation with the public creditor, which is a part of the act of 1864, a part of the act under which we borrowed money and pledged the public faith. It was a solemn promise that under no circumstances, never would we issue more than four hundred millions of paper money and an additional reserve of fifty million dollars pledged to pay a debt then existing and which has since been paid.

Mr. SPRAGUE. That was under duress.

Mr. SHERMAN. From whom? My friend from Rhode Island suggests quietly that this pledge was under duress. No, Mr. President; the United States was never under duress except from the rebellion. Then it was under duress. But when we were under duress from rebellion in the Southern States we gave our sacred pledge to the men who helped us, to the men who loaned us money, to the capitalists, to the laborers, to the servants, to the women, to the children; yea, Senators, from every part of this broad land, every county and every town, every village and every hamlet, every man, woman, and child poured their little earnings into the stream that flowed into the national Treasury in the summer of 1864; and every dollar of the loan then made was made upon the faith of the sacred obligation of the United States that our paper money should never exceed $400,000,000.

Sir, I trust in God the day never will come when we shall violate that pledge, until we make those promises equal to par in gold. I will not acknowledge, with my friend from Rhode Island, that we were under duress. Certainly we were not under duress from the men, women, and children who loaned us money. They gave us the means by which we put down the people who were in arms against our Government, and, so help me God, I never will violate the faith pledged to them. The act of 1864 is known to every Senator. I will not read it. It is as plain and strong and clear as language could make it.

But, sir, we are told that to issue these three sixty-five bonds convertible into paper money will lower the rate of interest; and my friend from Indiana, with that happy faculty which he has of avoiding difficulties, says when you have a great deal of money, and issue more, does not that cheapen it? Is not the right way to cheapen money to issue more of it? If you had a great abundance of any commodity to sell would it not be cheaper? That is the argument. Well, sir, it will cheapen money to issue more. It will cheapen money as tested by the gold standard, and brokers will tell you every day how much it cheapens it. But who will it benefit to cheapen money? It will aid a man to pay a debt contracted upon a different basis, and to that extent will cheat the creditor.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator does not state the proposition correctly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will give you time presently.

To the extent that it is paid in payment of a debt already due and payable, it will cheat the creditor and cheapen his debt; but it will not cheapen supplies, provisions, clothing, food, raiment. It may cheat the laboring man; for the laboring man may think it is the same money. He may take his two dollars a day just as he did before; but when he comes to spend those two dollars for the food that supplies his life, or for the clothing that comforts his children, he will find that somebody else is cheated, and he is the one. Sir, every effort whatever, every device to relieve needy men in distress or in debt, that will depreciate the currency, adds to the daily toil of laboring men, adds to the cost of food and clothing. Why, sir, Mr. Webster never uttered a grander truth in his life than that famous passage, which I have almost forgotten, but the substance of which is that the best way to enrich the rich man's field by the sweat of the poor man's brow is by the use of inconvertible paper money. No truth was ever more forcibly uttered.

But they tell us that it will lessen the rate of interest. Let us see. This is a matter of experience. We have had a slight experience in this country, and we have had the experience of other countries, and the fact is just the reverse—the more money is depreciated the higher is the rate of interest. I have some knowledge of this by my own experience. I remember the panics that have occurred in this country since 1837. I recall to the recollection of my friend from Iowa what took place in his own State in 1857. I was in that beautiful State in the spring of 1857. The people were rich, abounding in riches, fanciful riches; money was plenty. One man had made a profit of 100 per cent. on a piece of land that he had never seen and had owned but three months. Another had laid out a town and was selling lots at fabulous prices. Everybody was rich; paper money was abundant—wild-cat paper money; all kinds of money. Good money was there, too, gold as well as paper. Interest was 40 per cent., and many told me that they could make money by borrowing at 40 per cent. They offered to give me 40 per cent. for money to buy land with within five miles of a settlement. Everybody was rich; interest high; times were glorious. In August the failure of the Ohio Life Insurance and Trust Company burst the bubble. The money that was loaned upon that interest was not paid, and the men who were dealing in these high-blown speculations "went up the spout," to use a common phrase. So it was in the panic of 1837. Upon this point I could read you what is said by Mr. Mill; but that is mere "platitude;" that is only the experience of the past, of old men of a different day and generation. I could read you from many books. I could read you the story of the South Sea bubble, when securities went up and interest was 100 per cent. So in all times which precede a financial panic, when people think they are prosperous, when they make money by marking up their goods, interest is enormously high. Sir, the experience of mankind proves that interest is higher under a depreciated paper money than it is under a gold standard. Is it worth while to waste more time to show the utter fallacy of the allegation that more money would cheapen interest?

But it is said that the recent panic was caused by the want of money, by the want of more paper money; and paper money for what? To build remote railroads, to carry out schemes for the future, to engage in speculative enterprises. The money of the country and the capital of the country was absorbed in unproductive industry. Therefore it was that the blow fell and destroyed a great many good men. But how is it now? Why, sir, at this moment money is easier to be had in the city of New York than it has been for years by persons who are engaged in ordinary commercial business, where the circumstances that surround them inspire confidence and credit. The same money that was in circulation before the panic is in circulation now, and more. Sir, this is not a currency panic. It has no connection with our currency. Such panics have occurred in Great Britain and the United States in specie-paying times. It was simply caused by unproductive investments. The currency is good, only lacking one quality to make it better; that is, if it was as good as gold it would then be the best. It is secure. Nor was it a bank panic, I will say, for the relief of my friend from Indiana; for I am glad to agree with him on one or two things. The banks have stood the panic very well. With the exception of four or five, the national banks have not failed; and not one has failed unless by a clear violation of the law of its organization. Not one that has been brought to my attention has failed except by the use of the bank by the owners in loans and investments prohibited by the national-currency act.

Mr. WEST. Is suspension to pay deposits a failure?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; but this suspension was the result but not the cause of the panic. It was justified by the same circumstances that would authorize the increase of the amount of notes of the Bank of England in violation of law. The banks did suspend payments; and that only proved the truth of what I said a while ago, that no plan of redemption would be wise and good unless it has some provision for just such panics. There must be times when banks are compelled to use their reserves, all their resources, and borrow themselves instead of being lenders, and provision should be made for such times. The banks did commit an act of justifiable bankruptcy when they refused to pay their depositors; but that was temporary—a bending before the storm. They rapidly accumulated and gathered in their resources, as the Bank of England would under like circumstances, calling in their loans and denying loans to their customers, and are now in a stronger condition than ever. They now have a greater reserve than they had before the panic.

Mr. President, the condition of our currency has no relation whatever to the panic that passed over the country.

Mr. MORTON. That is a very important admission.

Mr. SHERMAN. In my judgment it is true, and is perfectly consistent with my argument. At this time, when nearly all debts have been settled; when the panic has swept away many fortunes; when we now have all the money that ever was afloat; when confidence is restored; when the price of every commodity is advanced to the price it was before the panic—now is the golden moment when we should take a step in the right direction to make our money equal to gold. I never have charged the panic upon the currency. Indeed I was the first in the midst of the panic to declare that the currency had no connection with the panic. The money was secure; it was good, only that it was not as good as gold. That was the only fault to be found with it. Men hoarded it. That added fuel to the fire and fed the panic. Its origin, like the panic of 1866 in Great Britain, was in the absorption of capital in unproductive enterprises. The want of confidence created by the failure of great houses gave the first alarm; then came the withdrawal of deposits, the depletion of the banks, the suspension of the banks. Then laborers began to be discharged, productive industry began to be stopped; but in a short time the ordinary business of the country was resumed, when people found that they were not all broke. It was the old, old story repeated periodically, arising from different causes, but having the same history and results. These panics are but the ebb and flow of great enterprises. They start with reviving prosperity; they grow with expanding hope and energy; they culminate with enterprises too great for the time, and the blind, unreasoning fear that springs from the failure of these enterprises does in the panic more harm and causes more destruction of values than the injury done by failures. No action of ours can prevent these panics. All we can do is to improve the opportunity offered us to place the public faith of our country on an enduring foundation.

I again appeal to the Senate to now firmly take its stand against any inflation of paper money under any circumstances, under any provocation, or any plea. This alone will do a great good to the country. But if it will go further—if the Senate will lead the way to some wise and practical measure, looking to a redemption of the pledged faith of the United States, the people we represent will have cause to be proud of the political body which they have so long honored. I believe, sir, that no act of the Senate would so much inspire confidence, give strength to our business men, revive our industry, as by a decided vote on these propositions to show that our firm purpose is to take the road that leads to specie payments and a restored currency.

Sir, I have been many years here and in the other House, during long and troublesome controversies, during peace and war, and I for one desire to see the work of our generation crowned by the greatest of civic triumphs, that of performing every promise, and to leave the nation without dishonor; its promises good, its credit untarnished, its wealth and power increasing and expanding.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President——

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senator from Iowa to allow me to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to one thing before we pass from this subject to-day.

Mr. WRIGHT. I shall do so, with pleasure. It is my purpose to address the Senate on this subject; but I am satisfied that it is too late to-day. I give way to the Senator from Indiana, with the understanding that I shall have the floor for Monday.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio started out upon the act of 1869, and relied upon the promise of the Government, and said now was the time to fulfill it. He put it upon the highest moral and legal basis, and I wish to call attention to that promise:

> And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin.

Not in bonds, but in "coin;" and he says the practicable moment has now arrived to redeem this promise, which is to pay "in coin." But when the Senator comes to his remedy the bottom drops out of this promise; the moral obligation is all gone; he forgets that the hour is practicable; and he proposes to redeem these notes, not in coin, but in a 5 per cent. bond. He does not propose to pay in coin, although that is the promise, and he says it is practicable to do so; but he proposes to pay only in a 5 per cent. bond. A 5 per cent. bond is at par now, barely at par, when it can be purchased of the Government only for gold. By manipulation through the syndicate we have made a 5 per cent. bond at par. Now I submit this proposition to the Senate and the country, whether a 5 per cent. bond which can only be maintained at par by a manipulation, when it can only be bought from the Government at par in gold, can be kept at par in gold when you are at liberty to convert any amount of currency into that bond at par, which currency is 10 per cent. discount?

The Senator from Ohio proposes that we shall allow an inferior currency, at 10 per cent. discount, to be invested, at par, in a 5 per cent. bond, and then assumes that the 5 per cent. bond will remain at par in gold. That is in conflict with theory and in conflict with experience; and thus the bottom has dropped out of the Senator's moral and legal argument on the act of 1869, for he does not propose, himself, to redeem the greenbacks in coin, but in a bond which then must be under par and float somewhere between the present price of greenbacks and par.

I want to say one thing further in regard to my friend from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.] He was led into error by a statement made by the Senator from Ohio. The Senator stated at one time that we had inflated the currency fifty-four millions in 1870 by authorizing that amount of national-bank currency. They are both in error. I remember well the argument of my friend from Ohio when that bill passed, standing behind me as he did. The bill provided that the new issue of national-bank currency should only take place as the 3 per cent. certificates were retired. They were then held by the banks under the law as a part of the reserve. They were held by the banks in place of greenbacks, and when they were retired greenbacks had to come in and take their place. The result was that as the 3 per cent. certificates went in to the Treasury, the greenbacks had to come from circulation into the vaults of the banks and stay there to a like amount; and the new national-bank notes coming out would only make the thing even, so that there was no inflation, but, in fact, there was a contraction. How? Because for the $54,000,000 of national-bank notes issued there had to be an additional reserve of 25 per cent. in the cities and of 15 per cent. in the country on this new $54,000,000; so that, in point of fact, there was an actual contraction to the amount of the reserve required by the $54,000,000 of national-bank notes to be issued.

I have listened to the speech of my friend from Ohio with great pleasure throughout. It has been very able and very learned, but it is unfortunate that after starting out upon the high moral and legal basis that we were bound to redeem these notes in coin, and that the time had come to do it, he should end by proposing to redeem them in a 5 per cent. bond that must float somewhat under par.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to reply for a moment. My friend from Indiana shows his accustomed adroitness in singling out what he regards as an objection to a single proposition in a plan not before the Senate for the resumption of specie payments. Will he deny that the authority to convert these notes into a 5 per cent. bond would advance them toward par in specie, I ask him?

Mr. MORTON. Some distance to it—no doubt 3 or 4, or, perhaps, 4 or 5 per cent.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator ignores the fact that the price of a ten-forty bond is not fixed by the value of our currency but by the value of that bond in the money markets of the world; and, therefore, I say that the moneyed men of the world will regard this approach toward specie payment with great favor, and will give additional credit to our bonds. If our ten-forties are now at par with gold, with the fact staring the people of the world in the face that we are dishonoring our promise to our own people, how much more will they be worth when we have made that promise good.

That is not all. I could show the Senator that the 5 per cent. bonds of the United States have always been at par in gold. They were at a premium before the war. We redeemed 5 per cent. bonds at a premium of 16 or 18 per cent. before the panic in 1857, and the standing value of our 5 per cent. bonds (without respect to this little colloquy) has been more than par in gold.

But my friend mistakes the proposition also that was submitted at the last session. Our proposition was to redeem in coin, or if for any cause we could not in coin, then give the note-holders the next best thing. What has the Senator to say to that? I will ask him now one question more. I have presented my suggestion toward a plan for specie payments. What is his? What does he propose to do? I propose at least to do what I can. If a 5 per cent. bond is not sufficient, give a 10 per cent. bond; but it is not necessary to do that. What does he propose to do? Contrast the two schemes. Mine at least looks toward honor and the fulfillment of the public obligations. It is a redemption in coin; it will be a redemption in coin. If it is faulty in this particular let him move to strengthen the bond. But what is his plan? Contrast the two. He would degrade the bond, degrade the greenbacks, issue more of them, make no provision for paying them Take that narrow criticism of the obligation of the United States, that it leaves entirely as a mere act of legislative discretion, instead of an act of public faith, that the mode and manner of redeeming these notes is a pure matter of legislative discretion and detail; that there is no obligation to apply our means when we have them to the redemption of these coin-notes.

As for the controversy between my friend from Michigan and my riend from Indiana, I will let them fight it out. My friend from Indiana insists upon it that the act of 1870 was no inflation, and so the argument of my friend from Michigan drops out; but my friend from Michigan insists that it was inflation. I will leave that matter to be settled entirely by those two gentlemen.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I never pretended to have any very adequate conception of financial questions; but on moral questions I have ideas, whether they are correct or not. I want, upon this moral question raised by the Senator from Indiana, to make one suggestion. If he held my note for one hundred dollars and I could not pay it, but I had a horse worth seventy-five dollars and should offer him the horse to cancel the note I can very well understand that he might say, "This is not what you promised; you promised me one hundred dollars, and the horse is worth but seventy-five dollars; I will not take it." But if, on the contrary, he comes to me and says, "This note is due;" and I should say, "I cannot pay it;" and he should say, "Well, here; I will take your horse that is worth seventy-five dollars," I do not think that it would enhance the public estimate of my morality if I should say, "I will not give you the seventy-five dollar horse because I have promised to pay you one hundred dollars." And so it may be that the Senator is right in supposing that a 5 per cent. bond is not the equivalent of coin, and therefore it is not doing full justice to the holder of the note. But is there any wrong done if the Government, the maker of those promises, should offer to the creditor the bond in exchange for his note if he prefers to have it?

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend allow me to make a suggestion to show that he has it exactly wrong? The argument of my friend from Ohio is, that we owe these men the coin and that we are able to pay it; but instead of proposing to do it he says, "We will give you our note drawing 5 per cent. interest, although we are able to pay the coin." That is just what Micawber did, and he thought when he gave his note he paid the debt.

Mr. SHERMAN. Micawber was more honest than the man that refuses to give even the note. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORTON. Now the point is that they have got our note as it is; but Senators put the case on the high moral ground, and then drop down from that after insisting that we can pay in coin, and that the time has come to pay in coin, and propose after all that we shall not try to pay in coin, but pay in 5 per cent. bonds. And I want to say one thing further on that point. According to the plan of the Senator from Ohio last year—and he refers to that as being his plan now—these notes were to be made convertible into a 5 per cent. bond at the pleasure of the holders of the greenbacks; and then, when the Treasury got them, it could issue them again for any debt or for any purpose, and the persons to whom they were paid out could come and fund them again, and get new 5 per cent. bonds; and thus they could be funded and reissued, and funded again and reissued, and funded again. Now, does the Senator believe that under such a bill, 5 per cent. bonds to be thus issued and thus bought and rebought for the same notes would remain at par in gold? It seems to me that it is a most violent presumption.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Indiana, whether he is right on the moral question or not, has certainly mistaken the financial policy of Mr. Micawber. I am familiar with that authority. [Laughter.] Mr. Micawber's theory was, if I have not greatly mistaken the theory of the Government, precisely that which this Government is acting upon now. When the baker or the grocer called upon Mr. Micawber to pay a bill, Mr. Micawber of course had to say, as the Treasury now says, "I cannot pay it, but I will give you my I. O. U."—not a bond or a note drawing interest, but "my I. O. U.;" and if he could get the creditor to take that, then Mr. Micawber felt happy and said he could hold up his head among his fellowmen. That is what I understand the Treasury to be doing now. They are not paying their current debts, but they are issuing their I. O. U.'s—notes not drawing interest, not earning anything, but changing the form of indebtedness.

Mr. MORTON. And that they would be doing under the new plan, simply giving a new note; taking up the old one and giving a new one.

Mr. HOWE. Giving an obligation which does earn something, and leaving it to the option of the creditor whether he will take it or not.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question. I ask if both the greenback and the note are not based upon the credit of the Government; and is not the note a promise to pay in the future, not verified until the future arrives, and the Government shows its ability to pay by the payment of the note? Therefore the difference between the two is simply in the accrued interest when the Government pays the interest—when the time expires.

Mr. HOWE. That is the difference between a note on interest and an I. O. U. not on interest.

Mr. WRIGHT. I believe I was entitled to the floor.

Mr. BAYARD. As the Senate is seeking, rather good-naturedly, for illustrations, and as the financial ideas of the honorable Senator from Indiana have been likened to those of Mr. Micawber, it occurs to me that they would be better represented by that person of whom I lately heard, who, in finding fault with another for wronging his creditor out of money, said it was abominable, and that for his part he would rather owe him the money forever than cheat him out of a cent. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORTON. I would say to the Senator from Delaware that I understand him to indorse the position of the Senator from Ohio, that he proposes to put the Government in the position of saying, through the Senator from Ohio and through Congress, "We are able to pay you in coin; we acknowledge that is our obligation, and we say," as he has said to-day, "that we are able to do it, but we will not do it, but will give you a due-bill."

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not say you were able to do it now.

Mr. MORTON. That is the moral of the proposition.

Mr. BAYARD. I will not detain the Senate to-day to state what my views are; but I trust in the course of a few days I shall be able to explain my views to the satisfaction of the honorable Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MORTON. I am not hard to please. [Laughter.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Unless there be executive business to be done, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and thirty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 16, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE SITTINGS DURING SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking and Currency have leave to sit during sessions of the House.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the same privilege on behalf of the Committee on Ways and Means.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

CHARLES W. BERRY.

Mr. ELDREDGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1219) for the relief of Charles W. Berry, late private of the Thirty-sixth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, and, with papers on the same subject on the files of the last Congress, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WILLIAM ROOD.

Mr. ELDREDGE also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1220) for the relief of William Rood, late private of the Thirty-sixth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, and, with papers on the same subject on the files of the last Congress, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SESSION FOR DEBATE TO-MORROW.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. KELLEY. I suggest to the gentleman to modify his motion so as to provide for a session to-morrow for debate only.

Mr. RANDALL. That will require unanimous consent. If the motion of the gentleman from Georgia be agreed to, there will be no difficulty afterward in getting consent for a session to-morrow for debate.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] that the House meet to-morrow as in Committee of the Whole for debate only, no business to be transacted, will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection; and it was so ordered.

Mr. KELLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the order was made; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ROBERT N. M'MILLAN.

On motion of Mr. WHEELER, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 604) for the relief of Robert N. McMillan, late collector of customs and superintendent of lights for the district of Teche, in the State of Louisiana; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

LEVEES OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

On motion of Mr. WHEELER, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of John A. Regan, of Mississippi, concerning the levees of the Mississippi River; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

HORSES AND CARRIAGES USED BY PUBLIC OFFICERS.

Mr. SMALL. I ask unanimous consent to submit for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be directed to inquire and report to the House how many horses are owned or fed and maintained by the Government of the United States in this District of Columbia; where and by whom the same are kept and fed, and at what expense per week; for what purpose and whose use, and who uses them; and whether the public service requires that any, and if so how many, of such horses shall be kept; also, to inquire and report how many and what carriages or vehicles belonging to the United States are used with said horses.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, and Mr. DAWES objected.

Mr. KELLOGG. Let the resolution be referred to the Committee on Civil-Service Reform.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object.

Mr. KELLOGG. I make the motion to refer to that committee.

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent. The resolution is not before the House, being objected to.

PROCEEDS OF COTTON SALES, ETC.

Mr. FOSTER. I am directed by the Committee on Ways and Means to ask the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House the amount of money paid into the Treasury of the United States arising from cotton and other captured and abandoned property; how much has been paid to claimants out of said fund; by what authority the same was so paid; and what amount of said fund still remains in the Treasury.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

MAIL MATTER FOR DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish the House of Representatives a list of all expenses incurred by the various Departments for transportation of any matter which before the abolition of the franking privilege was carried in the mails.

REIMBURSEMENT OF DISTILLERS FOR TICE METERS.

Mr. DAWES. I am directed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report back a bill (H. R. No. 315) for the relief of distillers of spirits by the repayment of money expended or deposited by them for Tice meters with the internal-revenue officers. I move to recommit this bill, and upon that motion I desire to be heard.

The Committee on Ways and Means have instructed me to obtain the sense of the House as to the propriety of that committee taking jurisdiction of cases such as that embraced in this bill, which has been selected from a large number of such cases before us. The committee desire that the House shall determine whether it prefers to have these cases considered by the Committee on Ways and Means or referred to the Committee on Claims.

I will state briefly the character of this bill before the House, and a large number of other bills before our committee. They grow out of the administration of the Treasury Department over the revenue of the country, both as respects internal taxes and customs duties. In reference to Tice meters there is a large number of cases growing out of a condition of affairs which I will state.

Some years ago Congress enacted a law that all distillers should supply themselves at their own cost with the Tice meter as a substitute for all other contrivances to test the capacity of a distillery. It was a very expensive contrivance, costing a good many hundred dollars to put one of these meters upon an ordinary still, sometimes three, four, five, or perhaps a thousand dollars. A few of them were put on stills, but very soon it was discovered it was a total failure, an impracticable thing, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue ordered the putting them on stills altogether to be stopped. A great many distillers had incurred large expenses. Congress repealed the law. They felt that acting under law and by requirement of the Department expending this money, they were entitled to remuneration. There are about $115,000 of money in the possession of the Internal Revenue Department, not in the Treasury, which belongs to some of these parties. They have presented a bill for general relief, and there are divers bills of private claims on the same subject.

If all the claims of every name and nature more properly belong to the Committee on Claims than to the Committee on Ways and Means, it is the desire of the committee to learn the views of the House. They will very gladly divest themselves of everything that looks like a claim, and turn it over to the Committee on Claims if it be the desire of the House. But heretofore, and up to this time, everything connected with the Revenue Department of the Government or involving the administration of the revenue, to pay back all taxes illegally assessed or the remission of taxes illegally claimed, or anything growing directly out of the revenue, has been before the Committee on Ways and Means. But a discussion here, a few days since, led the committee to infer that possibly the House might have a different view of the subject. If the House are of the opinion that still the Committee on Ways and Means should take jurisdiction of all that class of cases pertaining to the Revenue Department, they will carry out that view by voting to recommit this bill. If they think all this class of cases should go with others to the Committee on Claims, they will, of course, vote against the recommitment of this bill, and then we shall report them all back and turn them over to the Committee on Claims.

The Committee on Ways and Means have taken this method to obtain the view of the House. Personally, the committee of course desire to be relieved of this service; but if in the opinion of the House it can be better performed by that committee than by the Committee on Claims, they will recommit this bill.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, from what the gentleman from Massachusetts has said in the hearing of the House, this clearly is nothing but a claim for money. It is like any other claim coming before Congress, where the claimant desires to get money out of the Treasury for something for which the Government has received a benefit to the extent of the fund it is desired to draw out. It seems to me clearly all claims should go to the Committee on Claims, to which all matters of this character are, under the rule, properly referred; and I do not know that I can say anything to strengthen the position I have already suggested on that question. It is nothing but a money claim, that the Government has had the benefit of what they furnished. The Committee on Claims was organized for that very purpose, and, in my judgment, all claims of every character should go there. I think the disposition has been manifest on the part of the House to report back from other committees claims erroneously referred to those committees, in order that they may be properly referred to the Committee on Claims. I do not understand the gentleman from Massachusetts objects to such reference, and, if in order, I move to amend his motion, and move that this subject be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BURCHARD. My colleague seems to admit if this were a matter in which the taxes had not been collected the Committee on Ways and Means would have jurisdiction; that if the claim were that the Government should not press its claim for the collection of this Ticemeter tax or any tax of that kind, the Committee on Ways and Means should investigate the case—should examine the laws, and report whether the tax should be remitted or not. Now, the same principle, it seems to me, would apply to a case where the tax had been collected; for it requires the same examination and the same knowledge of the revenue laws in the one case as it does in the other. The Committee on Ways and Means, in this particular case, from their examination of the laws relating to the revenue, and from their familiarity or supposed familiarity with these laws at the time of their enactment, can examine such questions with less expenditure of time and with greater accuracy and safety, perhaps, than a committee whose attention has not been called to it; and hence I think it for the interest of the House, the interest of business, and the interest of the Treasury, that in this class of cases which do not involve a contract, which do not grow out of a contract, but present a case where there is merely an examination of the law, without an appropriation directly resulting from that examination, that it should be vested in the Committee on Ways and Means. If it were a case where there was a contract, and upon that contract a party presented a claim which a court would adjudicate upon, if it had jurisdiction, and besides asked for an appropriation, I should agree that the Committee on Claims would not only be the committee, but the only proper committee, to which such a bill should be referred.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Does not this bill ask an appropriation? Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] be kind enough to state to the House whether this bill contains an appropriation or not?

Mr. DAWES. The bill is at the table. I understand that it does not require strictly an appropriation, but there is a fund not in the Treasury, and that the bill authorizes the proper authorities to pay that fund which they hold. I am not certain whether there is not now in the Treasury some portion of the money.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the fourth section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, a sum sufficient to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

Mr. DAWES. Perhaps it would be well to have the whole bill read, so that the House may have a better understanding of it.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill for the relief of distillers of spirits by the repayment of money expended or deposited by them for Tice meters with the United States internal-revenue officers.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all money deposited, paid, or expended by the distillers of the United States under the acts of Congress approved March 2, 1867, and July 20, 1868, and by order of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, for the purchase of the meters known as Tice meters, for measuring and determining the products of distilleries, and all money expended by said distillers for freight on said meters, shall be refunded and repaid. And the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall make and establish such regulations for the proper examination, refunding, and repayment of all claims arising under this act as are necessary to carry it into effect.

SEC. 2. That all payments under the provisions of this act shall be made to the parties by whom the original deposits and payments were made under the orders of the Internal-Revenue Department, or, in case of the death or insolvency of any of them, to their legal representatives or trustees; and in all cases where any of said parties are indebted to the United States on any account whatsoever, the amount which would otherwise be refunded to them under the provisions of this act shall be retained and applied to the satisfaction pro tanto of such debt or liability.

SEC. 3. That the first section of the act entitled "An act to prevent frauds upon the Treasury of the United States," approved February 26, 1853, shall apply to all assignments, transfers, and powers of attorney made or given relative to the repayments herein provided for as fully as if specially re-enacted.

SEC. 4. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, a sum sufficient to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

Mr. KASSON and Mr. MELLISH rose.

Mr. MELLISH. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. KASSON. This is no private claim, and the question which has been submitted cannot, I think, arise here. I submit that this is a modification on behalf of the United States of the revenue laws and a provision to protect the honor of the United States against the charge of having set a trap by force of law, compelling parties to put their foot in it to their damage.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that no point of order can arise on the reference of a bill. The House has a right to refer a bill where it pleases. A point of order can never arise on that subject.

Mr. DAWES. I have not expressed any desire in regard to the disposition of this question. I desire simply to have the sense of the House upon it.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DAWES. I have agreed to yield first to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. BECK. I want to say a word on this subject. The Committee on Ways and Means have considered it very carefully for the last two years. All the reports that have been sent by the Departments bearing upon it have been sent to that committee. I hold in my hand now the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, a document of one hundred and fifty-two pages, made on the 2d April, 1870, and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, discussing this whole subject. Again, Report 69, third session Forty-second Congress, contains the whole history of it as given both by the majority and minority of the committee. They have therefore looked at it in every form. And we believed that, as it grew out of laws laid before this House by the Committee on Ways and Means, and bore upon the revenue of the country, it was legitimate for us to deal with it. But, if after consideration we were to be met with the objection that it ought to go to the Committee on Claims, we wanted that question made now so that it may go to that committee at once. But in view of the communication made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the fact that it grew out of matters of internal revenue on which we were in daily communication with the Department, and about which the Committee on Claims could by no possibility get the information that the Committee on Ways and Means had, we intended to take jurisdiction over it unless the House by a vote takes it away from us. And if it intends to do that, now is the proper time to do it. The question has been laid before the House now, before we commence another elaborate investigation, so that it may be determined whether it was useless for us to go on or not. I think that beyond all question the subject belongs to the Committee on Ways and Means as the only committee that can get the information necessary to obtain for it a fair consideration by the House.

Mr. DAWES. I yield now to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.]

Mr. FRYE. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means if this was not considered by that committee during the last Congress?

Mr. DAWES. It was considered by the Committee on Ways and Means, and the committee made a very elaborate report on the subject; and the views of the minority were also submitted to the House, and both were printed. There was no final action taken, and it came again before the committee. The committee have reported back the bill without expressing their own views, as they did not think it proper to do that because of the discussion a few days ago, in order that the House might act upon it, and say whether they desire matters growing out of the administration of the Revenue Department, though in the nature of claims, to be examined by the Committee on Ways and Means, or to go to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that the question was before the Committee on Claims in the last Congress, and was examined with care and thoroughly investigated. My impression is that the record will show that the same matter was before the Committee on Claims of the preceding Congress—the Forty-first Congress. Now, sir, while I care but little where this bill goes, I desire to bring this point to the attention of the House, that these claims which are brought here are, every now and then, vibrating between this committee and that committee. The Committee on Ways and Means examines claims and reports adversely, and at the same time the same claim is before the Committee on Claims, and they are investigating it.

Now, sir, some stop should be put to this. I noticed that the Committee on Ways and Means during the last Congress had frequently before them cases arising where a rebatement of taxes was desired where distilleries had been destroyed by fire or other accident, and the Committee on Claims had before them precisely the same question, and were investigating it at the same time, thus giving the claimant two chances—a chance before two committees. Now this is wrong. One committee should have jurisdiction of a case, as a court has jurisdiction, and no other committee should have it at the same time.

Now, sir, in the last Congress the Committee on Claims had before them some fourteen hundred claims which they could not possibly examine, and therefore there may have been some excuse for the assumption of their duties by other committees; but early in this Congress, by a resolution offered by myself, war claims were taken from the Committee on Claims and referred to the Committee on War Claims; so that to-day you have a Committee on Claims entirely competent to discharge all the duties, with the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HAWLEY,] accomplished in legislation, a just man, and a lawyer, at its head. They have abundance of time to examine every claim except a war claim. These being the circumstances under which, to-day, we are legislating, I hope that this bill will not be recommitted to the Committee on Ways and Means, who have matters of greater importance to the whole nation before them, and whose whole time must certainly be well taken up, but will be given into the charge of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. RANDALL. It really does not matter to what committee this question is committed so far as the relief of these parties is concerned, for any committee to which it may be referred will have to report a general bill covering nine hundred names of parties who were charged for Tice meters, only one hundred of which were furnished. There are eight hundred persons who actually deposited, under a law which emanated from the Committee on Ways and Means, money to pay for these meters who have received nothing whatever for that money; it was, in fact, money obtained under false pretenses.

But I would rather favor a reference of this bill to the Committee on Ways and Means, because in the last Congress that committee made a thorough examination of this subject and reported against the payment of these claims. Now, I feel quite certain that unless there are manifest reasons for the payment of these claims the Committee on Ways and Means will not change their judgment in that respect. I do not mean in any manner to reflect on any other committee of the House, but I think we should leave this question to the committee who have made a thorough investigation of it, and have made an elaborate report on the subject. I, therefore, shall vote, for one, to recommit the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire to say one word only, and to give a reason why this bill should not be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. It is said that the Committee on Ways and Means must necessarily be more familiar with the laws in regard to the revenue than any other committee of the House. For the same reason it might be said that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads must be more familiar with all questions in reference to the Post-Office Department, and as to all claims presented with reference to contracts with that Department, than any other committee, and therefore that such claims should go to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. And so with claims growing out of contracts made with the War Department, which have been violated by the Government, or are alleged to have been violated by the Government; it might be said that they should go to the Committee on Military Affairs, because it is the business of that committee to investigate the law regarding the Army and the operations of the War Department. The same thing may be said in reference to claims growing out of transactions with all the other Departments of the Government. Sir, the Committee on Claims was established for the very purpose of taking cognizance and jurisdiction of all claims for money to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, unless, indeed, under the present rule of the House, it might be claims belonging to the Committee on War Claims, which was created in this session and has jurisdiction of all claims growing out of the wars of the Government. If any man has a valid claim against the Government under existing laws, he goes to the Committee on Appropriations to procure the necessary appropriation to pay him; but if he comes here with a claim that the Government has violated a contract or agreement, or has done or has failed to do any act by which it has become indebted to him for money out of the Treasury of the United States, under the rules such claim should go to the Committee on Claims.

If this rule shall be adhered to, and all claims against the Government shall be sent to the Committee on Claims, then they will be in charge of a committee which, having control of all such matters, will know what those claims are, and at each Congress it will be known whether any particular claim has been before passed upon favorably or unfavorably. It is well known that any claims which have been reported upon adversely by one committee are sent to other committees, for the purpose of avoiding examination by the committee that has already reported upon them adversely. Therefore I say that all bills which are claims against the Government, requiring the payment of money, should go to the Committee on Claims. I do not speak with reference to this particular case, but I refer to a rule which should be applied generally. If this is acknowledged to be a claim against the Government, requiring money to be paid out of the Treasury to meet it, then it should go to the Committee on Claims. I therefore move to amend the motion to recommit to the Committee on Ways and Means, so as to refer it to the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs to make a remark at this point, in order that there may be no misunderstanding from what was said the other day. The remarks of the Chair then were directed to the habit of referring bills during the morning hour of Monday, when members were paying no attention. If the House intelligently and knowingly refers a bill, it has of course its own choice of committees. It is the privilege and province of the House to work its committees as it sees fit, and no point of order can lie against any action thus taken.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois; and upon a division there were—ayes 62, noes 61; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HAWLEY of Illinois, and Mr. DAWES, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 72, noes 79.

So the motion of Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, was not agreed to.

The motion of Mr. DAWES was then agreed to.

ABNER Y. ELLIS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, from the Committee on Claims, reported adversely on the bill (H. R. No. 350) for the relief of Abner Y. Ellis, of Madison County, Illinois; and the bill was laid upon the table, and the report accompanying the same ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH R. BLACKWELL.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, also from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 676) for the relief of Joseph R. Blackwell, postmaster at Litchfield, Illinois.

The bill directs the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department to credit Joseph R. Blackwell, postmaster at Litchfield, in the State of Illinois, in his account as such postmaster, with the sum of $535.85, being the amount of postage-stamps, stamped envelopes, and money stolen from the safe of the said post-office by burglars on the night of the 13th day of August, 1873, without fault or negligence on the part of said postmaster.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I raise the point of order that this bill should go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken, and the bill will be accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole.

GEORGE W. KEYES.

Mr. BURROWS, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill (H R. No. 1222) for the relief of George W. Keyes; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department to credit George W. Keyes, postmaster at Olivet, Michigan, in his account as such postmaster, with the sum of $106.50, being the amount of postage-stamps burglariously stolen from the safe where said stamps were deposited on the night of the 5th of May, 1869, without fault or negligence on the part of said postmaster.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the same point of order against this bill as before.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. RANDALL. Cannot some general objection be lodged against all these bills, or some ruling by the Chair, which would obviate the necessity of members watching each one of these bills?

The SPEAKER. That would be the worst possible thing, because the rule which requires the most strict attention on the part of every member is the most valuable rule.

Mr. RANDALL. I see the Chair hits back at me very properly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs also to state that a bill reported upon adversely may be sent to the Committee of the Whole, if members choose to make the point of order upon it; and on this ground, that an adverse report may not be concurred in by the House; and if not, the question would then come on the engrossment and passaeg of the bill.

ABEL M. LEWIS.

Mr. BURROWS, from the Committee on Claims, reported adversely upon the bill (H. R. No. 339) for the relief of Abel M. Lewis, of the State of Indiana.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order that this bill should go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken.

SARAH F. LINCOLN.

Mr. LANSING, from the Committee on Claims, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 517) for the relief of Sarah F. Lincoln, postmaster at Spencerport, Monroe County, New York.

The bill directs the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department to credit Sarah F. Lincoln, postmaster at Spencerport, Monroe County, New York, in her account as postmaster, with the sum of $516.20, being the amount of postage-stamps stolen from the safe of said post-office by burglars on the night of the 3d day of January, 1873, without fault or negligence on the part of said postmaster.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the same point of order against this bill.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole.

GEORGE W. HARDING.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio, from the Committee on Claims, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 231) for the relief of George W. Harding; and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES W. GLOVER.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Claims, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 259) for the relief of James W. Glover, postmaster at Oxford, in the State of New York.

The bill directs the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department to credit James W. Glover, postmaster at Oxford, in the State of New York, in his account as such postmaster, with the sum of $498.39, being the value of postage-stamps stolen from the safe of said post-office by burglars on the night of the 16th day of April, 1873; and the further sum of $30.03, being the amount of money belonging to the Post-Office Department stolen by said burglars from said safe at the same time; said stamps and money being stolen without the fault or negligence of said Glover.

The amendment was to strike out the portion of the bill relating to money stolen.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order that this bill should go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point. The bill will be so referred.

WILLARD HOWE.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1213) for the relief of Willard Howe, of Massachusetts.

The bill was read. It recites that in September, 1871, the post-office at South Framingham, Massachusetts, was burglariously entered and robbed of public moneys and property to the amount of $474.54; that such robbery was effected without fault or negligence on the part of the postmaster, Willard Howe; and that he has paid to the United States the amount and value of the moneys and property so stolen. The bill directs the Auditor for the Post-Office Department to credit the account of Howe with the sum of $474.54, to reimburse him for the payments so made by him.

Mr. PENDLETON. I make the point that this bill contains an appropriation and must go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point. The bill will be so referred. The Chair will also state that in all cases where a written report accompanies these bills he will direct it to be printed.

LEONARD I. SMITH.

Mr. COMINGO, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Leonard I. Smith, of Utah Territory, for indemnity for depredations upon his property by Shoshone Indians in 1864; and that the same be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM B. MORGAN.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 546) for the relief of William B. Morgan.

The bill was read. It authorizes the payment of fifty dollars to William B. Morgan, late sergeant Company D, One hundred and forty-ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, as additional bounty under the act of Congress approved July 28, 1866, provided he has not already received bounty under that act.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order on that bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

L. S. CAMPBELL.

Mr. HUNTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1223) for the relief of L. S. Campbell; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Quartermaster-General to pay to L. S. Campbell, out of any money appropriated for the Quartermaster's Department, $224.

Mr. PENDLETON. I make the point that that bill must go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be so referred.

EDWARD P. JOHNSON.

Mr. ALBRIGHT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 421) for the relief of Edward P. Johnson, that the same be laid on the table, and the accompanying report printed.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM H. DENNISTON.

Mr. THORNBURGH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1224) for the relief of William H. Denniston, late an acting second lieutenant of the Seventieth New York Volunteers; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Paymaster-General of the Army, out of appropriations for the pay of the Army, to allow and pay to William H. Denniston, late an acting second lieutenant in Company D, Seventieth New York Volunteers, the pay and allowance allowed by law to a second lieutenant of infantry from December 24, 1861, to July 15, 1862; he having actually served in that capacity and having received no pay therefor.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point that this bill must go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be so referred.

LAND TITLES IN MISSOURI.

Mr. BUCKNER, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1221) to confirm certain land titles in the State of Missouri.

The bill was read. It recites in the preamble that the Baron of Carondelet, governor-general of the territory of Louisiana, on March 15, 1797, instructed Zeno Truedro, lieutenant-governor of the territory, to place Moses Austin in the possession of a league square of land at Mine à Breton, in said territory; that Austin, in the year 1798, took possession of the land by moving upon it with his family, and improved the same by building dwelling-house, blacksmith-shop, furnace, and other improvements; that the lieutenant-governor, on the 14th of January, 1799, ordered Antone Lulard, surveyor in the territory, to survey the land and put Austin legally in possession of the same, which survey, numbered 52, containing seven thousand one hundred and fifty-three arpents and three and two-thirds feet, was executed by Lulard, and a certificate of the same filed by him in November, 1800; that Don John Ventura Morales, then governor at New Orleans, did in the year 1802, in the name of the King of Spain, grant to Moses Austin the lands so surveyed and located. The bill therefore provides that the United States release whatever title they may have to the lands now numbered 430 on the plat in the surveyor-general's office, and in townships 37 and 38, range 2 east, in the county of Washington, and State of Missouri, containing 7,153.32 arpents, (6,085.29 acres,) to the heirs, legal representatives, or assigns of Moses Austin, according to their respective interests therein; provided that the act shall not affect or impair the title which any settler or other person may have acquired adverse to the title of Austin to any portion of the land.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Is there a report in this sense?

Mr. BUCKNER. The bill is accompanied by a report, which can be read for the information of the House, or I can state its substance if desired.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I ask that the report be read.

The report was read. It states that the legislation demanded by this bill grows out of the following state of facts: During the period intermediate between the execution of the second treaty of St. Ildefonso, of October 1, 1800, between Spain and France, whereby the former power ceded the province of Orleans or territory of Louisiana to France and the purchase and cession of said territory by the United States, Moses Austin applied to the proper authorities at New Orleans for a grant of a league square of land, and by order of the governor-general of the territory of Louisiana he was put into possession of the land mentioned and described in the bill, and for several years occupied the same and improved it by building a dwelling-house, factory, shops, furnaces, and other improvements. The land was surveyed to him by the surveyor-general of the province or territory of Louisiana under the order of the lieutenant-governor, who was vested with authority for such purposes, and this survey was duly filed by him in the proper office. Subsequently, in the year 1802, the then governor of the province, residing at New Orleans, in the name of the King of Spain, granted the lands so surveyed and located to Moses Austin. (See American State Papers, volume 3, pages 593, 594.) But while Austin was thus perfecting his right to the land by occupation and possession the treaty between France and Spain had been executed and ratified, but was not promulgated until a year after he had obtained his grant from the Spanish authorities, about which time the French republic ceded it to the United States. Austin's patent was in fact executed by Spain after that power had transferred the province of Louisiana to France. The first board of commissioners, known in Missouri as the old board, appointed under an act of Congress of the 2d of March, 1805, to adjudicate the inchoate and uncompleted titles to lands in the then Territory of Missouri, and which the Government of the United States was under treaty obligations to respect and confirm, decided that Austin's grant was not a perfect title, but was only equitable and incomplete. But it was generally believed that this claim of a league square was confirmed by the provisions of the act of Congress of April 12, 1814, and Austin's assigns and those claiming under him rested under that impression until within a few years since the Commissioner of the General Land Office, yielding to the authority of the opinion of a former Attorney-General, held that this claim was unconfirmed, and it is so treated by his Department. But the Government has always recognized the validity of the claim, and the object of this bill is to divest any right of the United States and pass it to those claiming under Austin, who have been in possession for half a century, claiming the land adversely against everybody as well as the United States. All the right that the United States has to this land is the naked legal title, if that, while the equitable title is beyond question in Moses Austin or his legal representatives; and there would seem to be no reason why this act of release and confirmation, should not be granted by the United States. There seems to be no doubt but that the parties now holding and occupying this land claim to hold under Austin, but out of abundant caution, and in accordance with the suggestions of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the bill provides that the rights of any person who has acquired title to any portion of this land adverse to the title of Austin shall not be prejudiced by this act. The same bill, substantially, as now recommended was passed in both Houses during the last Congress, but failed to receive the approval of the Executive in the hurry and confusion at the close of the session.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BUCKNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM E. PRINCE.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1225) granting a pension to William E. Prince, of Iowa; which was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William E. Prince, late a private in Company I, Twenty-third Regiment Missouri Volunteers, and to pay him a pension from the date of his filing the application for the same with the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I suppose these pension bills must all go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. They must if the point be made.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point.

Mr. RUSK. If the gentleman will permit the report to be read, I think there will be no objection to the bill.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. As I am asked to withdraw my point of order, I presume I may be allowed to state the reason why I make it. We have adopted a rule that all private bills, calling for any appropriation or any expenditure out of the Treasury of the United States or for any grant of property of the United States, shall have their first consideration in the Committee of the Whole. I do not make my point of order from any hostility to this bill; I presume the bill itself is a just one; I only make it because, having a rule on the subject, we should stand by it.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to appeal to my friend from Vermont on this one point, that this bill provides whatever has been done under it shall be done under the limitations of the existing law; therefore by passing this bill we would make no new regulation. And it seems to me this ought to constitute an exception in practice, unless there be some special reason why it should be referred to the Committee of the Whole. For that reason I ask that all pension bills drawn in this way, instead of being referred to the Committee of the Whole, be disposed of at once, as well for the interest of the poor men who suffer from delay as for the convenience of the House in saving time.

The SPEAKER. Of course the bill can be passed, by unanimous consent, in order; but it will soon be reached in the committee, and sending it there under the rule will only amount to a delay of a very short time.

Mr. RANDALL. If we have rules we ought to act up to them.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is a good one.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

FRANCIS BARNARD.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported a bill (H. R. No. 1226) granting a pension to Francis Barnard; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Francis Barnard, late private in Company K, Forty-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, and pay him a pension from the passage of the act.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the same point of order on that bill.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ELIZA A. MAXHAM.

Mr. SMALL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1227) granting a pension to Eliza A. Maxham; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Eliza A. Maxham, mother of Samuel W. Maxham, late private in Company E, Second Regiment United States Sharp-shooters, and pay her at the rate of eight dollars per month, to be dated from the death of said Samuel W. Maxham, on the 6th day of May, 1864.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the same point of order on that bill.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARY STORRS.

Mr. SMALL, from the same committee, also reported a bill (H. R. No. 1228) granting a pension to Mary Storrs; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Storrs, mother of Charles Storrs, late private in Company K, Seventh Regiment Vermont Volunteers, and of Gilman D. Storrs, late private in Company D, Tenth Regiment Vermont Volunteers, and pay her at the rate of eight dollars per month, to date from the death of said Gilman D. Storrs, on the 27th day of November, 1863.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the same point of order on that bill.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BARBARA M'GLENAN.

Mr. SMALL, from the same committee, also reported adversely on the memorial of Barbara McGlenan, asking for a pension; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MICHAEL SHIELDS.

Mr. MARTIN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 538) for the relief of Michael Shields, with the recommendation that it do not pass; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, what is the custom of the House in reference to printing adverse reports?

The SPEAKER. They are always ordered to be printed.

Mr. GARFIELD. They certainly ought to be, so that we may have a permanent record, for otherwise we may have precisely such a case as has been referred to, where after adverse report the papers may be withdrawn from the files, and the Department, without knowing that previous action, may make an allowance of pension. If these reports are printed they will be a part of the permanent record, and can be referred to and be known by the Department.

ELLEN WILSON.

Mr. O'BRIEN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported adversely on the memorial of Ellen Wilson, widow of John E. Wilson, late first lieutenant Company D, Twenty-ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ELIZABETH R. M'CRACKEN.

Mr. O'BRIEN, from the same committee, also reported a bill (H. R. No. 1229) granting a pension to Elizabeth R. McCracken; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order on that bill that it should have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

MRS. FANNIE B. WHITE.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I am instructed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to report adversely on the application of Mrs. Fannie B. White for a pension, and move that the same be laid on the table.

I will state, Mr. Speaker, that the husband of the applicant was a military store-keeper in California, and died in 1858. There was no law existing then justifying the granting of a pension in this case. I should like very much hereafter to hear the question which grows out of this application discussed in the House. It will be brought before the House again.

The petition was ordered to be laid on the table, and to be printed.

ELIZABETH W. PRINDLE.

Mr. YOUNG, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1230) granting a pension to Elizabeth W. Prindle, guardian of the minor children of Jose F. Doak, deceased; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order on that bill.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

EDMUND M. RANDOLPH.

The SPEAKER. The committees have now been called through for reports of a private nature. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER,] who was not in his seat when the Committee on the Judiciary was called.

Mr. POTTER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 191) to provide for the payment of legal services rendered by Edmund M. Randolph to the United States.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order on that bill.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

DEPUTY COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. KELLOGG, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1231) to abolish the office of Deputy Commissioner of Internal Revenue; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. KELLOGG. I move that the bill be printed, and that it be referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, with leave to report it back at any time.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. COX. I am instructed by the Committee on the Rules to report an amendment to Rule 102.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read Rule 102, which it is proposed to amend.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE 102. Seven additional standing committees shall be appointed at the commencement of the first session in each Congress, whose duty shall continue until the first session of the ensuing Congress.—March 30, 1816.

To consist of five members each.

1. A committee on so much of the public accounts and expenditures as relates to the Department of State;
2. A committee on so much of the public accounts and expenditures as relates to the Treasury Department;
3. A committee on so much of the public accounts and expenditures as relates to the Department of War;
4. A committee on so much of the public accounts and expenditures as relates to the Department of the Navy;
5. A committee on so much of the public accounts and expenditures as relates to the Post-Office;
6. A committee on so much of the public accounts and expenditures as relates to the Public Buildings; and
7. A committee on so much of the public accounts and expenditures as relates to the Interior Department.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the resolution reported by the Committee on the Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Rule 102 be amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

8. A committee on so much of the public accounts and expenditures as relates to the Department of Justice.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

SALARIES.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Before that motion is made I desire to make a statement. I was not present when the vote was taken on the Senate amendment to the House salary bill, in consequence of the illness of a member of my family. If I had been present I should have voted, as I have steadily done, for the lowest salary, and therefore would have voted "ay" on the bill.

COMMITTEE ON PATENTS.

Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the chairman of any sub-committee of the Committee on Patents be authorized to administer oaths in the investigation of any matter pending before such sub-committee.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. PAGE. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be, and is hereby, instructed to report to this House at the earliest practicable moment, if expedient, a concurrent resolution advising an opening of negotiations by the President of the United States with the Emperor of China, with a view to such a modification of articles 5 and 6 of the existing treaty between the two nations as to check or altogether prevent Chinese immigration to the United States.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I object. I have no objection to the reference of the resolution, but I object to its being adopted.

Mr. PAGE. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

There was no objection, and the resolution was so referred.

CHIEF JUSTICE OF THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. WALLS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for reference to the Judiciary Committee a bill to prescribe the mode of filling the position of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I object, and demand the regular order.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the question on the gentleman's own motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The question was put, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. TYNER in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bills upon the Private Calendar.

ROBERT N. M'MILLAN.

The first bill upon the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1041) for the relief of Robert N. McMillan, late collector of customs and superintendent of lights for the district of Teche, in the State of Louisiana.

The bill authorizes and directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to adjust and settle the account of Robert N. McMillan, late collector of customs and superintendent of lights for the district of Teche, in the State of Louisiana, and allow him the sum of $705.56, being the amount paid for salaries of keepers and assistant keepers of light-houses for the first quarter of the year 1861.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. There is a report of considerable length accompanying this bill; but I can state to the committee that that report simply shows—and in that it is sustained by letters from the Navy Department—that the money now to be paid the claimant had been paid by him to certain officers for the benefit of the Government of the United States, and the reason why it was not repaid at the Department was that there was no appropriation out of which it could be paid. The committee reported the bill unanimously, and I think there can be no objection to it. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

COLONEL E. M'CARTY.

The next bill upon the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 352) for the relief of Colonel E. McCarty, reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Colonel E. McCarty, of Illinois, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,450; which said sum the said Colonel E. McCarty paid to the Government on a direct-tax sale by the judgment of a United States court, and for which payment of money the said Colonel E. McCarty received no consideration.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 5, after the word "Illinois," insert the words "assignee of Ruel Hough."

In lines 7 and 8 strike out the words "Colonel E. McCarty" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Ruel Hough."

In lines 9, 10, and 11 strike out the words "and for which payment of money the said Colonel E. McCarty received no consideration" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the tax on the land sold having been paid prior to said sale by the owner thereof."

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Is there any report in this case?

The CHAIRMAN. There is, and it will be read if the gentleman desires it.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not ask for the reading of the report if the gentleman from Illinois will explain the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. There is a long report, but the only object of the bill is to reimburse this party for money paid twice over for land upon which the tax had been paid, and it had then been sold on the supposition that the tax had not been paid.

The SPEER. Did the Government twice get the purchase money?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Certainly it did. I presume the report will be printed.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

ABNER Y. ELLIS.

The next bill upon the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 350) for the relief of Abner Y. Ellis, of Madison County, Illinois.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Abner Y. Ellis, of Madison County, Illinois, the sum of $874.20, being interest at the rate of 6 per cent. from the 20th day of February, 1857, to the 30th day of June, 1873, on the sum of $651.58, due to the said Abner Y. Ellis upon his account as postmaster of the city of Springfield, in the State of Illinois, the payment whereof was withheld for that length of time by the Government of the United States.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. That bill was reported by the committee adversely. I move that it be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do not pass. The report in the case ought to be printed, if the Committee of the Whole have the power to order it. I believe a rule has been adopted at this session that all adverse reports shall be printed. Am I correct in that?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would inform the gentleman from Illinois that all adverse reports are printed.

The motion of Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, was then agreed to.

JOSEPH R. BLACKWELL.

The next bill upon the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 676) for the relief of Joseph R. Blackwell, postmaster at Litchfield, Illinois.

The bill directs the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department to credit Joseph R. Blackwell, postmaster at Litchfield, in the State of Illinois, in his account as such postmaster, with the sum of $535.85, being the amount of postage-stamps, stamped envelopes, and money stolen from the safe of the said post-office by burglars on the night of the 13th day of August, 1873, without fault or negligence on the part of said postmaster.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

GEORGE W. KEYES.

The next bill upon the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1222) for the relief of George W. Keyes.

The bill directs the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department to credit George W. Keyes, postmaster at Olivet, Michigan, in his accounts as said postmaster, with the sum of $106.50, being the amount of postage-stamps burglariously stolen from the safe where such stamps were deposited on the night of the 5th of May, 1869, without fault or neglect on the part of said postmaster.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

ABEL M. LEWIS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 339) for the relief of Abel M. Lewis, of the State of Indiana.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Abel M. Lewis, of the State of Indiana, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $416.66, in full of his claim for closing up his business as acting collector of internal revenue in and for the eleventh district for the collection of internal revenue in the State of Indiana, after the appointment of John F. Wildman as collector of internal revenue in and for said district.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. That bill is adversely reported; and I move that it be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do not pass.

The motion was agreed to.

SARAH F. LINCOLN.

The next bill upon the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 517) for the relief of Sarah F. Lincoln, postmaster at Spencerport, Monroe County, New York.

The bill directs the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department to credit Sarah F. Lincoln, postmaster at Spencerport, Monroe County, New York, in her account as postmaster, with the sum of $516.20, being the amount of postage-stamps stolen from the safe of said post-office by burglars on the night of the 3d day of January, 1873, without fault or negligence on the part of said postmaster.

The Committee on Claims report in favor of the passage of this bill.

Mr. LANSING. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES W. GLOVER.

The next bill upon the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 259) for the relief of James W. Glover, postmaster at Oxford, in the State of New York.

The bill directs the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department to credit James W. Glover, postmaster at Oxford, in the State of New York, in his account as such postmaster, with the sum of $498.39, being the value of postage-stamps stolen from the safe of said post-office by burglars on the night of the 16th day of April, 1873; and the further sum of $30.03, being the amount of money belonging to the Post-Office Department stolen by said burglars from said safe at the same time; said stamps and money being stolen without the fault or negligence of said Glover.

The Committee on Claims report an amendment to the bill, to strike out all that portion relating to the money stolen.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I move that the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The hour of two o'clock having arrived,

The SPEAKER resumed the chair and said: This being the third Friday of the month the Committee on the District of Columbia have the floor after two o'clock.

Mr. COTTON. That committee is willing to give way to-day if they can have next Friday after two o'clock.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

No objection was made, and it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The House will again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. TYNER resuming the chair, and proceeded with the consideration of the Private Calendar.

WILLARD HOWE.

The next bill upon the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1213) for the relief of Willard Howe, of Massachusetts.

The preamble of the bill states that in the month of September, in the year 1871, the post-office at South Framingham, in the State of Massachusetts, was burglariously entered and robbed of public moneys and property to the amount of $474.54; that such robbery was effected without fault or negligence on the part of the postmaster, Willard Howe; and that said Howe has paid to the United States the amount and value of said moneys and property so stolen. Therefore the bill directs the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department to credit Willard Howe with the sum of $474.54, to reimburse the said Howe for the payment so made by him.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I do not know who reported this bill; but I hope the gentleman who has it in charge will strike out some of this long preamble. It seems to me it is a remarkable bill simply for the relief of a postmaster. I move that the preamble be struck out.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts. I have no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I would like to inquire what portion of this amount is for moneys stolen?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts. Let the report be read.

The report was read, stating that from the sworn statement of Willard Howe, postmaster at South Framingham, Massachusetts, and his assistant, it appears that on the night of September 14, 1871, his office was broken open and his safe blown open, and postage-stamps to the amount of $250, and money-order funds to the amount of $224.54, stolen therefrom; that every effort has been made to discover the robber without avail; that the postmaster had settled his accounts with the Department, and the committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill for his relief.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS] if this postmaster had any money which was his private property taken at the same time?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts. No, sir.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Did it appear before the committee that the money stolen belonged to the Government? The report refers to money-order funds. Was that kept by the postmaster separate and distinct from his private funds?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts. That does not appear. A member of the last House, Mr. Estes, who had this matter in charge, and, living in the same town, was conversant with all the facts, said that the case was one worthy of favorable consideration.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The Committee on Claims this morning reported a bill to reimburse a postmaster for postage-stamps stolen, striking out the proposition to repay him for money stolen. I can see the propriety of allowing a postmaster compensation for stamps stolen. But when he keeps the money of the Government mingled with his own private funds it seems to me we are going some ways to reimburse him for whatever loss might have occurred to the extent of what he was owing the Government. He might have had the money in his pocket and had his pocket picked in the street, or had it anywhere else not distinct from his private funds. I think it is a very unsafe rule to adopt to reimburse a postmaster whatever he may have been owing the Government at the time the money was stolen unless we have clear evidence to show that he kept the money of the Government separate and distinct from his own. I therefore move to amend this bill by reducing the amount to that of the stamps stolen.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts. I hope that amendment will not be agreed to. The sworn statement of the postmaster and of his assistant is that this money was stolen. Mr. Estes, my predecessor, was well conversant with all the facts, and he says the man is entitled to the relief asked.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. That is Mr. Estes's opinion; it is not evidence.

The amendment of Mr. WILLARD was not agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts. I move that the bill, as amended, be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM B. MORGAN.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 546) for the relief of William B. Morgan.

The bill was read. It authorizes the payment of fifty dollars to William B. Morgan, late sergeant Company D, One hundred and forty-ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, as additional bounty under the act of Congress approved July 28, 1866, provided he has not already received bounty under that act.

The CHAIRMAN. This bill comes from the Committee on Military Affairs with a favorable report.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

L. S. CAMPBELL.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1223) for the relief of L. S. Campbell.

The bill was read. It directs the Quartermaster-General to pay to L. S. Campbell, out of any money appropriated for the Quartermaster's Department, the sum of $224.

The CHAIRMAN. This bill comes from the Committee on Military Affairs with a favorable report.

The reading of the report being called for, it was read. It states that L. S. Campbell, as shown by the evidence on file, was employed as a carpenter by the quartermaster of the Second Missouri Light Artillery, in the Powder River expedition in 1865; that under the impression that a fort and winter quarters were to be constructed, and the Government not having the necessary carpenter tools, the claimant was requested to, and did, take with him his own tools with the view to the construction of the necessary works. On reaching Powder River the transportation became insufficient by reason of the loss of horses, and all surplus ordnance and surplus quartermaster stores were ordered by the commander of the eastern division to be abandoned and destroyed. The claimant's tools were among the property abandoned. The value of the tools is shown to be $224. The loss occurred without any fault on the part of the claimant, and the committee believe he ought to be paid for his property. The claim was presented to the Quartermaster's Department; and while its justice was admitted the claim was rejected because the tools had not been taken up and accounted for by some proper officer. Claimant was advised to apply to Congress for relief.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

WILLIAM H. DENNISTON.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1224) for the relief of William H. Denniston, late an acting lieutenant Seventieth New York Volunteers.

The bill was read. It directs the Paymaster-General of the Army, out of appropriations for the pay of the Army, to allow and pay to William H. Denniston, late an acting second lieutenant in Company D, Seventieth New York Volunteers, the legal pay and allowance of a second lieutenant of infantry from December 24, 1861, to July 15, 1862; he having actually served in that capacity and having received no pay therefor.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

WILLIAM E. PRINCE.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1225) granting a pension to William E. Prince, of Iowa.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William E. Prince, late a private in Company I, Twenty-third Regiment Missouri Volunteers, and to pay him a pension from the date of his filing the application for the same with the Commissioner of Pensions.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

FRANCIS BERNARD.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1226) granting a pension to Francis Bernard.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Francis Bernard, late a private in Company K, Forty-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, and pay him a pension from date of the passage of this act.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

ELIZA A. MAXHAM.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1227) granting a pension to Eliza A. Maxham.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Eliza A. Maxham, mother of Samuel W. Maxham, late a private in Company E, Second Regiment United States Sharp-shooters, and to pay her at the rate of eight dollars per month, to date from the death of her son, May 6, 1864.

Mr. SPEER. If there is a report in this case I ask that it be read.

The report was read. It states that the proof shows that Samuel W. Maxham, a son of the petitioner by her husband, Edwin A. Maxham, enlisted November 9, 1861, in Company E, Second Regiment United States Sharp-shooters, and was mustered in the same day as a private, and was killed in action May 6, 1864, in the battle of the Wilderness; that he was sixteen years of age when he enlisted; that the husband of the petitioner is, and has been for the last ten or twelve years, in very poor health and is unable to work more than half the time; that he has but very little property, and is not, and has not been during that time, able to support his family; that his son Samuel for the three years before he enlisted worked out, receiving six dollars per month the first year, seventy-five dollars and schooling the second year, and ten dollars a month the third year, with which wages he bought a cow for his mother and otherwise contributed to her support; that he never had any wife or children; that he assigned to his mother at different times seventy-two dollars of his extra State pay, and while he was in the service sent her $195 of his wages; that the petitioner is very poor, and was at the time of the enlistment and death of her son dependent upon him for support.

Mr. SPEER. If the facts be as stated in this report, is not the case embraced in the general law? Cannot a pension be obtained upon application to the Commissioner of Pensions?

Mr. RUSK. It cannot be granted under the statute of limitations. The time allowed for filing the application has run out.

Mr. SPEER. Why should we not have a general law repealing that limitation? There are thousands of meritorious cases barred on account of it.

Mr. RUSK. That is true; and the committee has the subject under consideration.

Mr. SPEER. I would suggest that the committee should hold back these cases until they have considered and reported upon the propriety of passing a general law.

Mr. RUSK. I have no objection to the bill being laid aside, the gentleman who had it in charge not being in his seat.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I object to the bill being laid aside. It is one which is worthy of consideration and should be passed.

Mr. SPEER. I am not objecting to the passage of this specific bill, but merely made an inquiry as to the special ground upon which its passage is asked. If it be simply that the statute of limitations is a bar to the granting of a pension in this case, I answer that the statute is a bar to thousands of meritorious cases, and I do trust that the Committee on Pensions will at an early day introduce a bill extending the time for filing applications, in all that class of cases, for a year or two.

Mr. RUSK. We have ascertained that the passage of such a law would take from seven to nine million dollars out of the Treasury.

Mr. SPEER. I do not care how much it takes out of the Treasury. If this be a just thing, the amount it would take out of the Treasury should not be a controlling consideration.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY STORRS.

The committee proceeded to the consideration of the next bill upon the Calendar, being a bill (H. R. No. 1228) granting a pension to Mary Storrs.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-rolls, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, the name of Mary Storrs, mother of Charles Storrs, late private in Company K, Seventh Regiment Vermont Volunteers, and Gilman D. Storrs, late private in Company B, Tenth Regiment Vermont Volunteers, and pay her at the rate of eight dollars per month, to date from the death of said Gilman D. Storrs, on the 27th day of November, 1863.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I ask a question for information. Is it usual in granting a pension to go back to the date of the death of the party on whose account it is granted?

Mr. SPEER. I will answer the gentleman. I was on the Committee on Invalid Pensions in the last Congress, and it was the uniform practice of the committee to make the pension date from the passage of the act.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. If the gentleman from Connecticut does not make the motion, I will move to amend the bill so as to make it take effect from the passage of the act.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. My object in putting the question was the desire that we should not act hastily, because there will be an immense pressure in a multitude of other cases if this be granted in one.

Mr. SPEER. There were many meritorious cases in the last Congress, in which it was desired by the committee that the pension should take effect from the date of death or disability. But the House took ground against it, and the committee was compelled to adopt the other rule, making the pension date from the passage of the act.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I desire to say a word. This is a pension for a lady in my own town; and I did not expect on presenting the application to have it take effect except from the date of the passage of the law.

Mr. SPEER. If the bill were to pass in this shape, it would undoubtedly fail in the Senate.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. For the reason I have stated, as a matter of favor to myself, independent of what may be the policy of the committee, I ask to have the language of the bill changed.

Mr. RUSK. If this lady is entitled to a pension at all, she is entitled to a pension from the date of the death of her son. I call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] to his position on this question. He claims that we should extend the time for presenting the papers——

Mr. SPEER. The gentleman does not understand me. I say if the House to-day were to pass fifty bills dating the commencement of the pension back to the date of disability, the Senate would strike that out in every one of these bills, as it did in the last Congress. This would send the bill back to the House, and it might not pass at all, doing a serious injury to the applicant.

Mr. RUSK. I think we should not be governed by a consideration of what the Senate may do. We should do our duty.

Mr. SPEER. You will defeat every one of your bills if you take that position.

Mr. BURCHARD. I understand that, until last Congress, it was the usage of the House as well as of the Senate to pass these bills in accordance with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont; but during last Congress the Committee on Pensions took the position which the committee seem to have taken upon this bill, and the House followed the recommendation of the committee.

Mr. SPEER. Not in a single case. The committee was overruled by the House; or if not, the change was made by the Senate.

Mr. BURCHARD. I beg to say, however, that I am in favor of the amendment. I think that is the true rule we ought to follow.

Mr. SPEER. I believe there was not a single pension bill passed during last Congress which dated back to the time of death or disability.

Mr. RUSK. Many of them passed the House.

Mr. SPEER. But they did not become law.

Mr. RUSK. If the Senate refuses to do its duty, that is no reason why we should not do ours.

Mr. BURCHARD. I understand that the amendment is in accordance with the rule of the Department.

Mr. SPEER. I would suggest to the gentleman that it is better to take what you can get than get nothing. You will get nothing by insisting on this.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont; and it was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZABETH R. M'CRACKEN.

The committee proceeded to the consideration of the next bill on the Calendar, being a bill (H. R. No. 1229) granting a pension to Elizabeth R. McCracken, widow of Robert McCracken, late acting assistant surgeon in the United States Army,

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension law, the name of Elizabeth R. McCracken, widow of Robert McCracken, late acting assistant surgeon in the United States Army, and to pay her a pension from the date of his death, on the 10th of August, 1871.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I move to amend the bill by striking out all of it after the word "Army," so as to provide that the pensions shall only date from the passage of this bill. I offer that amendment to conform to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I move that the bill as amended be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Here the committee rose informally, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 193) for the benefit of Uriah Porter.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 61) providing for busts of the late Chief Justices Roger Brooke Taney and Salmon Portland Chase to be placed in the Supreme Court room of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. No. 718) to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1873.

The Committee of the Whole then resumed its session.

ELIZABETH W. PRINDLE.

The next bill on the Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 1230) granting a pension to Elizabeth W. Prindle, guardian of the minor children of Joseph F. Doak, deceased.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension law, the name of Elizabeth W. Prindle, guardian of the minor children of Joseph F. Doak, late sergeant of Company D, Fifth Ohio Volunteers, and pay her a pension for said minors from the time of her application for such pension.

Mr. BURCHARD. I move to amend that bill in the same way that others have been amended, so as to make the pension take effect from the date of the passage of the act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

EDMUND M. RANDOLPH.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 191) to provide for the payment of legal services rendered by Edmund M. Randolph to the United States.

The bill authorizes and directs the Attorney-General of the United States to settle and adjust the balance of fees due the widow and heirs of Edmund M. Randolph, deceased, for professional services rendered by him in his life-time, in the case of the United States against John Parrott, Henry W. Halleck, and others, and also in the case of Andres Castellero against the United States, in the courts of the United States; said professional services having been rendered by said Randolph under contracts in writing made with him by the late Edwin M. Stanton under instructions from the Attorney-General of the United States on the 3d day of September, 1858, and the Attorney-General is hereby authorized and required to pay the amount which shall be found due from any money appropriated for the judicial expenses of the United States.

Mr. STORM. I call for the reading of the report in this case.

The CHAIRMAN. This bill is reported by the Judiciary Committee with a favorable recommendation. The report will be read.

The Clerk read the report.

Mr. POTTER. I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have read, letters in relation to this subject in the Congressional Globe for last session.

The Clerk read as follows:

ATTORNEY-GENERAL'S OFFICE, August 4, 1858.

SIR: You and Mr. Della Torre are directed to proceed with all possible diligence and energy in vindicating the rights of the United States to the New Almaden quicksilver-mine. You have full authority to do whatever may be necessary in the premises. You may employ Mr. Randolph if you think it necessary, for such compensation as you and the district attorney deem fair and just, reserving to this office the right of reducing the fee if thought too high.

Respectfully, yours,

J. S. BLACK.

E. M. STANTON, Esq.,
San Francisco, California.

The foregoing is a true copy of a letter addressed to me by Hon. J. S. Black, Attorney-General of the United States, and filed by me in the office of the district attorney of the United States in San Francisco.

EDWIN M. STANTON.

In the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of California, in equity.

THE UNITED STATES
vs.
JOHN PARROTT, HENRY W. HALLECK, et al.

In this case it is agreed by P. Della Torre and Edwin M. Stanton, acting on behalf of the United States, and Edmund Randolph, as follows:

1. That the said Randolph has been and is retained and employed on behalf of the United States to render his professional services in the above-named case as assistant counsel of the Government, for the compensation of $5,000, to be paid him by the United States, and such other further allowance as the Attorney-General of the United States, in the progress of the case and upon the final result, may deem fair and just.

2. This agreement is subject to the approval and ratification of the Attorney-General of the United States.

P. DELLA TORRE,
United States Attorney.
EDWIN M. STANTON.

SAN FRANCISCO, September 3, 1858.

In the district court of the United States for the northern district of California.

ANDRES CASTELLERO
vs.
THE UNITED STATES.

Appeal from the board of land commissioners.

In the above case it is agreed between P. Della Torre, district attorney, and Edwin M. Stanton, acting on behalf of the United States, and Edmund Randolph, as follows:

1. That said Randolph hath been and is retained and employed on behalf of the United States to render his professional services as assistant counsel of the Government, for the compensation of $5,000, to be paid him by the United States, of which $500 has been paid by E. M. Stanton.

2. This agreement to be subject to the approval and ratification of the Attorney-General of the United States.

P. DELLA TORRE,
United States Attorney.
EDWIN M. STANTON.

SAN FRANCISCO, September 3, 1858.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] to what seems to me to be the better course to pursue in cases of this sort. I cannot understand why, if the committee chose to act upon these cases at all, they should not have fixed the amount in the bill which is to be paid to this attorney. This is a claim fifteen or sixteen years old. I do not know but it is an entirely just one. But I suppose it is possible for the committee to obtain possession of all the facts in respect to this claim that the Attorney-General can come into possession of after the matter is referred to him. If there is any need of having action upon this matter by Congress, I for one should be in favor of having that action full and complete—of ascertaining and determining the amount to be paid.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to ask the gentleman who has charge of this bill what is the reason that this amount, over and above the $500 already received, has not been paid, when there was a contract that it should be paid?

Mr. POTTER. In answer to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] I will say that I agree with him entirely. But this bill, in this exact form, passed the last Congress, at which time it was in charge of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SHOEMAKER,] then a member of the Committee on the Judiciary. The bill having been introduced at this session in this form, and I having been instructed by the committee to report it to the House, I have no power to change it. I am not able to tell what amount is due. It will be seen, from what has been read, that the amount cannot exceed $10,000, less what has already been paid, which is certainly $500, and I believe $5,000 more. The papers which were before the committee at the last session cannot be found in the Clerk's office, and I am not able to inform the gentleman what the exact amount is. From what I have learned I believe it to be about $4,500.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. If in order, I would move that this bill be recommitted.

Mr. SPEER. I was going to make that motion, not because I am opposed to the passage of a bill which shall fix a just amount to be paid by the Government to this claimant, but this species of legislation is vicious. We cannot tell how much will be paid under this bill. It is said that it will be under $10,000; but how much, whether $1,000, $2,000, or $5,000 under, we do not know. This House should know what amount is claimed, and then it can judge whether the amount is too large or not. Not knowing the amount claimed, we are legislating in the dark. This whole system of legislation is vicious; nothing good can come of it—nothing but evil. I therefore move that this bill be recommitted.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The proper motion, I suppose, would be, that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary to ascertain the amount.

Mr. POTTER. I do not object to that.

Mr. SPEER. This bill proposes to allow somebody else to fix the amount that the Government owes this party.

Mr. POTTER. Undoubtedly somebody else must fix the amount.

Mr. BURCHARD. What is the necessity for the passage of this bill?

Mr. POTTER. There must be some appropriation.

Mr. BURCHARD. Why has not the Attorney-General already settled this claim out of the appropriation for that Department?

Mr. POTTER. He has no appropriation out of which to make the payment.

Mr. BURCHARD. This bill requires it to be paid out of the appropriation for judicial expenses, and makes no appropriation.

Mr. POTTER. There is no authority to pay for services rendered so long ago. These services were rendered before the war.

The motion of Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, was then agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. There are no other bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee rise and report the bills to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TYNER reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the bills on the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report sundry bills to the House, with the recommendation of the committee thereon.

ROBERT N. M'MILLAN.

The first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole was a bill (H. R. No. 1041) for the relief of Robert N. McMillan, late collector of customs and superintendent of lights for the district of Teche, in the State of Louisiana.

The Committee of the Whole recommended that the bill be passed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COLONEL E. M'CARTY.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole was a bill (H. R. No. 352) for the relief of Colonel E. McCarty.

The bill was reported with amendments; which were agreed to.

The bill as amended was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOSEPH R. BLACKWELL.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 676) for the relief of Joseph R. Blackwell, postmaster at Litchfield, Illinois.

The bill was read a second time, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GEORGE W. KEYES.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1222) for the relief of George W. Keyes.

The bill was read a second time, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ABEL M. LEWIS.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 339) for the relief of Abel M. Lewis, of the State of Indiana.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole recommend that this bill be laid on the table. If there be no objection it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

SARAH F. LINCOLN.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 517) for the relief of Sarah F. Lincoln, postmaster at Spencerport, Monroe County, New York.

The bill was read a second time, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES W. GLOVER.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 259) for the relief of James W. Glover, postmaster at Oxford, in the State of New York.

The SPEAKER. This bill is reported from the Committee of the Whole with an amendment striking out that part of the bill relating to money stolen.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLARD HOWE.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1213) for the relief of Willard Howe, of Massachusetts.

The bill was reported with an amendment striking out the following preamble:

Whereas in the month of September, in the year 1871, the post-office at South Framingham, in the State of Massachusetts, was burglariously entered and robbed of public moneys and property to the amount of $474.54; and whereas such robbery was effected without fault or negligence on the part of the postmaster, Willard Howe; and whereas said Howe has paid to the United States the amount and value of said moneys and property so stolen: Therefore.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts, demanded the previous question.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that demand to allow the bill to be recommitted, to reconsider whether the money of the Government stolen from this postmaster was mingled with his private funds. In a bill of the same nature acted upon a few moments ago we adopted an amendment striking out a provision in respect to money, making no allowance except for stamps. We should not have one rule for one postmaster and another rule for another. It certainly should distinctly appear that these moneys were the moneys of the Government. I hope the gentleman will allow a motion to recommit for the purpose of ascertaining the facts.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts. The money of the Government was kept separately and distinctly. This is as just a claim as there ever was in the world.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; which was upon agreeing to the amendment striking out the preamble.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. This bill, I understand, comes from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SPEER. In no spirit of hostility to this bill I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether it proposes not only to indemnify this postmaster for the loss of Government money, but also to reimburse him for the loss of private funds which were in his own safe.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts. It does not. His own funds were kept separately, as is stated in the affidavit.

Mr. SPEER. For what is the allowance proposed to be made?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts. For money derived from the sale of postal money-orders; money which he had collected and had in readiness to send to Boston, as he was required to do once a week under the rules of the Department.

Mr. SPEER. Then this is not for stamps stolen?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts. Yes sir. It is for stamps, and also for money belonging to the Government; but not for the postmaster's private funds, although he suffered loss in that respect.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS] has shown me the testimony, which has not been read here, upon which the committee base their report. That testimony is that there was a certain amount of stamps taken at such a time; then there is accurately stated, in dollars and cents, the amount of postal-order money; but as to his private funds the claimant is not able to state how much was stolen, so he makes a rough estimate of that. Undoubtedly, therefore, the manner in which he arrived at the amount which the Government should pay him was by ascertaining how much he was indebted to the Government that night.

The moneys were mingled with his private moneys in his safe. All the moneys in his safe were taken. Now we are called upon, not to appropriate for the money of the Government which was taken, but we are called upon to reimburse to this man the debt which he owed to the Government at the time—not the money of the Government in his hands, but the money which he says the Government owed him at that time.

Mr. SPEER. Was all the money in the safe taken?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. It was all taken.

Mr. SPEER. But, as I understand, a part of it consisted of private funds?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Of his private funds, undoubtedly.

Mr. SPEER. Does this, then, reimburse him for all the money which was in the safe?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Not the whole of it, but just the amount which he figures he was owing the Government at that time. He did not separate the moneys in his safe.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts. I do not think the testimony covers the ground stated by the gentleman from Vermont, but, on the contrary, I think it is clear the moneys were kept separate. He had on hand the postal-order money received by him in the interim after the return of his account to the Boston post-office, and that postal-order money was taken; and besides that he had other money in the safe belonging to himself, which was also stolen. It is as just a claim as was ever presented upon this floor; and I hope the House will vote down the gentleman's motion and pass the bill.

Mr. SPEER. By whom are these facts proved as to the amount of his private funds and the amount he owed the Government? By his own ex parte deposition or affidavit?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. That is all.

Mr. SPEER. By the postmaster's own ex parte affidavit?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts. The facts are proved by his own deposition and the deposition of his assistant.

Mr. BURCHARD. Is there a report accompanying this bill from the committee? If so I should like to hear it read.

The SPEAKER. There is a report, which will be read by the Clerk.

It appears from the report, which was read, that from the sworn statement of Willard Howe, of South Framingham, Massachusetts, September 14, 1871, his office was broken open in the night by burglars, who blew open his safe and carried off its contents, including postage-stamps to the value of $250, and money-order sums to about $224.54; that every effort has been made to discover the robbers without avail, and that he has settled his accounts with the Department. The assistant postmaster corroborates his statement, and the committee recommend that the Auditor for the Post-Office Department be allowed to credit his account with the value of the sums in money stolen; for which purpose they report and recommend the passage of a bill.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, there is one suggestion which, if I correctly understand the case, it seems to me is an answer to the objection made by the gentleman from Vermont. As I understand it, this man had, first, stamps belonging to the Government; second, a sum of money belonging to the money-order office, which was also the property of the Government; and, third, his private moneys, all of which were stolen. The bill proposes to pay him for the sums of postal-order money belonging to the Government. The objection of the gentleman from Vermont is that he should not be paid the money belonging to the Government because he had mixed up certain private moneys of his own with it, so that, in the safe from which it was taken, there was a larger sum than was due the Government. If I understand the regulations of the Post-Office Department correctly, postmasters having money-order offices are bound to keep constantly on hand in their offices a larger sum than may be due to the Government at any particular time; that is, they are required, whether they have got on deposit money or not, to have on hand a certain specified sum. Therefore it was proper there should be an amount—which, when his accounts were settled, was his own private money—kept in that safe with the amount which he owed to the Government. It seems to me that is a complete answer to any suggestion, if it were a forcible one, that we should not pay what really belonged to the Government which was stolen because it was in his private safe with his own private money.

Mr. SPEER. Does this not proceed against the doctrine of law that where the party mixes other goods with his own and he loses the whole, that the whole loss shall be his own?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. This is a case, not where a party diverts trust money from its proper place of deposit and puts it with his own private money. If he deposit trust funds to his own private account with his own private funds in bank it would be such a case as the gentleman suggests; but this is a case where, keeping the trust money in its proper place, he is bound by the regulations of the Department to have a certain larger sum, which would ultimately belong to him; and therefore it was proper, although he had more than was required. Suppose, for instance, I, being a trustee, deposit in a bank in my private name the trust money, and the bank fails; I should not be allowed it. But if I deposit in a bank, in my name as trustee, a larger sum than I owe the trust fund, and the bank fails, I should be allowed all over my trust money. That is this case.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Let me make a suggestion. We have national banks which are depositories of public funds, for which they give bonds. They are required, as good business men would be under similar circumstances, to keep on hand a sufficient amount of the funds which have been deposited with them by the Government to meet the calls coming upon them from day to day, as this postmaster was required to keep enough on hand to meet calls on the money-order office from day to day. But suppose one of these depositories robbed of all the money in the bank. I apprehend the money of the

